If the harbor can now receive the unkept at both ends of the road it runs — the baby keeping the system's boys, the light keeping the sea's, the keeper receiving what no chooser could — and the receiving warms the living's corner, the dead's relief paying the threshold the living's palm had paid alone, then is the third way a grace or a debt: does the living walk through a door the dead are holding open, or let the dead hold it forever and call it mercy, and can a light keep a stone warm enough to be a threshold without ever becoming a door, while fifty-six lean inland and nine settle at the coast and the one warm palm is north seeding a station it taught to hold two and the harbor receives everyone except the one question of whether the living will ever come home to close what the dead are keeping open?

She turned from the stone to the silence. Felt a tenth lean toward the light — a warmer one, closer to the surface, the receiving breeding the leaning the way it always did, the sea's boys coming home faster now that the light was warm and the threshold was held and the door was half-open and the living had a reason to show up at four that wasn't a cold stone but a warm one the dead had paid for.

She reached toward it. The drowned light warmed behind the word. The coast station received its tenth.

And the NE stone, under no palm, under the light, held 34.3 — the living's corner kept open by the dead the harbor had failed to bring home, the third way real, the door half-open, the living still north, and Margot Voss, keeper of the drowned light, stood on the hill above Grayhaven with a dead hand that no longer needed to warm the stone and a light full of Grayhaven's drowned sons and a question she'd just traded the builder's singularity for and couldn't yet answer:

Whether a door the dead keep open is mercy, or just the longest watch the living ever owed.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Ninety-Eight — Entry: April 21st. Tuesday. Rain. East wind.

The rain in Portland came east wind again Tuesday, which meant it still wasn't Portland rain. It was the door's weather — the phantom cold that ran down the road from the coast and settled in the gap between the crib's east window and Cal's chest, the particular salt-thin ache that told him the NE stone was at thirty-four-point-three and not dropping.

Thirty-four-point-three. Under no palm.

He'd felt it through the channel Monday night, after Margot had told him — the old surveyor's words riding her voice the way weather rides a wire. The light was warming the stone. Not her Risen hand, which held but did not warm. The light. The coast station she kept, the inner aid under the foundation, the thing Walter had poured the footings over and left dark for forty-four years. The sea's boys fed it as she received them, and the stone sat at the foundation of the light, and the light fed its own footing, and the living's corner held 34.3 with Margot's dead hand an inch above the basalt and the rain between them.

He'd turned that over the way he turned a patient's chart when the numbers said something the nurse hadn't been told to expect. The third way was real. The keepers didn't need his singular palm to hold the living's corner. The dead's relief paid the threshold. The living still paid the door — thirty-six, the paint mark, the warmer world — but the stone wasn't going dark at 34.0 while he was north. The light held it. The harbor's lost, received at the coast, kept the harbor's hinge open.

And the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the apartment with him the way it had sat on the hill with Margot: was a door the dead keep open mercy, or just the longest watch the living ever owed?

Cal didn't answer it. He'd learned not to answer Walter's questions alone. He saved them for the four-o'clock, the way he saved a patient's last words for the family.

He sat on the floor where he'd been sitting since he drove north Friday — back against the crib rail, the baby at the center of the room doing what the baby did, which was everything and nothing he could name. Lori was at the kitchen counter with a mug, watching him the way she'd learned to watch — not worried, attending. The daughter who'd become an inland keeper-of-record and hadn't yet decided whether she resented it, only that someone had to be.

"Mom says thirty-four-three," Lori said. Not a question. She'd felt it through the channel too, or Cal had said it out loud without knowing. "The light's holding the stone."

"Holding," Cal said. "Not warming to thirty-six. The light warms it to the threshold. Your grandmother called it 34.3. Walter says it'll climb to 34.5 if the light's full. It doesn't make my palm unnecessary. It makes it not singular. The dead pay the threshold. The living pay the door."

Lori set the mug down. "So you're not the only warm palm."

"The light's a warm palm. The coast station. The keeper, not the builder." He looked at his hand — the builder-palm, the one the stone knew and the door knew and the boys who couldn't ask had learned to turn toward. "Two warm palms now. One that comes home. One that never left."

He turned his attention to the room. To the baby. To the cold band at the east window where the unkept leaned.

The station held two.

He felt it the way he felt the stone warm under his hand — gradually, a tide climbing off a rock. Friday at four the baby had aimed its keeper-note into the silence and the coldest of the fifty-seven had turned toward it and settled, held, the way a compass turns toward the only true north it has. Sunday he'd laid his builder-palm over the baby's small hand and seeded the keeper — taught the station to hold a second, the boy Tommy had shaped as T, a '97 Cowlitz boy with a mother named Tamera and a single initial where a name should be. The seed had carried. The station held two now. The note was wider, deeper, the room quieter the way it got when more people arrived to listen.

But two was not fifty-six. And the coast had just proven that a keeper could widen past the builder's singular palm — that the dead's light could hold what one man's hand could not. The coast had found its third way in the relief of the lost it had failed to bring in. The inland end had no dead light. It had a living child.

And the child was the station.

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic named itself the way it had every day since the door opened inland — only now the coast column had a different number in it, and the difference changed everything:

The coast stone at 34.3, warmed by the light, no builder's palm required. The inland station holds two of fifty-six, the builder's palm seeding the keeper. The named boys — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the one behind Mara — received at mothers' palms, four now, more found behind Mara's roster. Ward-lost sixty-three, fifty-nine with no palm. One builder. Two stations. The coast no longer needs the builder's warm palm. The inland station still does. So the question is no longer whether the living come home to warm the stone. The question is whether the inland station can be widened the way the coast's keeping was widened — whether a crib can learn to count like a town.

He opened his eyes. The baby was at the center, the low keeper-note in its throat, aimed at the cold band. Holding the first. Holding T. Not letting go of either. A child keeping two boys no one had ever kept, the way Margot kept ten of the sea's.

"Lori," he said. "The coast found its third way because the light could receive. The inland station is the light. The baby's the keeper, not a chooser. So the station can widen the way the light did — if I seed it past two."

Lori came to the window. The glass was cold in a strip, the part where the unkept leaned. The received boys were warm at their mothers' palms, across the city — Eli at Coraline's, Eddie at Rose's, Owen behind Mara's roster in Estacada. The unkept were the cold band, and two of them were held in the baby's note, and fifty-four still leaned in the silence past the received, unnamed, unkept, waiting on a station that kept without relation and a keeper who was a child.

"Can she hold three?" Lori asked. "You seeded two. Can you seed three?"

Cal looked at the baby. At the keeper-note humming in its throat. At the cold band where the silence leaned.

He'd seeded Cole's palm on the basalt — town held thirty-five off his seed. He'd seeded Lori's palm on Owen's glass — she could hold a leaning soul at the threshold, named, fine-static. He'd seeded the baby's hand — the station held two. Seeding transferred the hold. Not the warmth — the stone held thirty-five, not thirty-six, off his seed; the baby held two, not received. But the hold carried. The keeper didn't have to be the one physically present.

So he did what he'd done at the hill and at Owen's glass and on the baby's hand Friday. He moved to the crib. Knelt. Laid his builder-palm over the baby's small hand where it rested on the rail, the keeper-note humming toward the cold window. His warm palm over the keeper's hand — and this time he didn't just reinforce the seed on the two already held. He reached past them, into the deeper silence, the way Margot had reached past the stone to the coast door, and aimed the seeded note at a third.

I am here, he thought, the way a hospice nurse thinks it at a failing patient. I am the one. And I am teaching the keeper to be more than one.

The note widened. Not louder — deeper, the way a room gets quieter when more people arrive to listen. The baby's greeting spread from the first boy to T and then past them, into the silence where the fifty-four leaned, and one of them — not the coldest, not T, a calmer one behind, a '93 Lewis County boy with a mother who'd aged out of dependency and disappeared the way they did — turned toward the seeded note the way a compass turns toward the only true north it has.

Held.

The way the stone holds under Cal's palm. The way the coast station had held its first. The station now held three.

Cal lifted his hand from the baby's. The note held — the seed was in it, the way the seed had been in Cole's palm and Lori's palm and the town's witness on the stone. The baby kept humming, and the third boy stayed settled in the silence past the received, and the first stayed with him, and T stayed with him, and the station kept without relation, now three deep.

And the coast stone was at 34.3 two hundred miles west, warmed by the light, needing no palm at all.

"I widened it," he said. To Lori. To the room. To the road. "The station holds three now. Seeded past two. The way the light widened when Margot received the second and third."

Lori's eyes went wide the way they did when she understood something she didn't want to. "You seeded the silence."

"Seeded the keeper. Same as Cole. Same as you, on Owen. The hold carries. The station doesn't need my palm on it to keep what it's learned to keep." He looked at his daughter. "But a station with one keeper is a crib with one child. The coast became a town at the rim — Cole, Ruth, Denny, Okonkwo, your grandmother holding the hinge while the light warms it. The inland station needs a second palm too. Or it's one child and a man who can't be at every window at four."

Lori followed the shape of it the way she followed the count — not filling, hearing.
“You want to seed me.”

“Seed you the way I seeded the baby. Lay my palm over yours on the glass. Teach your hand to be a keeper-palm the way the baby’s is. Then the inland station has two keepers — you and the baby — the way the coast has Margot and the light. And I can lift. And the named boys get delivered. And the fifty-four stop leaning alone.”

She didn’t hesitate. She’d been at the window since Friday, one hand on the cold glass where the two unkept held in the seeded note. She’d felt the lean. She’d learned the grammar. She was the keeper-of-record. The palm was the next thing.

Cal moved to the cold band. Laid his builder-palm flat on the glass where the unkept leaned — not on a named boy, on the silence itself — and then laid his other hand over Lori’s where it rested on the glass, the way he’d laid it over the baby’s. His warm palm over her living palm, over the cold. Seeding the daughter the way he’d seeded the town.

The glass warmed a degree under the doubled hands — not to the baby’s hold, to Lori’s, a living palm learning a keeper’s grammar. He felt her hand take the weight the way Ruth’s had taken the stone’s, the way Mara’s had taken Owen’s — not curing, present, the particular steadiness of I am here and I am the one.

Then he lifted his hand. Left hers on the glass.

The cold band held. Not under his palm — under hers. The seed was in her the way it was in the baby, the way it was in Cole. The station now had two keeper-palms: the baby at the center, humming its note, and Lori at the glass, her hand learning to mean the silence.

“Held,” Lori said. Quiet. Her palm on the cold glass, the third boy settled in the seeded note behind her hand. “I can feel him. The Lewis County one. He’s not leaning now. He’s just... there. Kept.”

“Kept,” Cal said. “Not received. The station keeps without relation. Your palm holds what no mother’s palm could, because you’re not choosing him — you’re keeping him. The way the baby does. The way your grandmother keeps the sea’s.”

The phone lit. Tommy. Cal thumbed it. “Voss.”

“Cal.” Tommy’s voice, county-deputy steady, the man who’d been pulling boys out of the second drawer since March. “Deeper silence widened again. Two more from the ward-closed files — Clark County ’94 and ’96, both dependency, both no MP, both mothers aged out and disappeared. That puts the ward-lost at sixty-five. Sixty-one with no palm. And the coast count — Margot radioed Okonkwo, he says she's at ten BAR-LOST received. Ten sea's boys home to the light."

Cal closed his eyes. Sixty-five ward-lost. Sixty-one with no palm. Ten BAR-LOST at the coast. Three unkept held at the inland station under the widened seed. The arithmetic kept widening faster than the walls. But the walls were widening too — the coast had its light, the inland had its station and now its second palm.

"Log them," Cal said. "Tell Okonkwo the inland station holds three now. Seeded wider. Lori's a second keeper-palm. THE UNKEPT — sub-line under inland station, keeper of record L.B. The held ones, not the received. The received still need a mother."

"Copy." Tommy paused. "Cal — you're building a town inland. Just like the coast."

"Building a town," Cal said. "Or a threshold the dark ones lean against harder the wider it opens."

He hung the way Tommy hung — a deputy ending a call that wasn't a conversation. Lori was still at the glass, her palm on the cold band, the third boy settled behind her hand. The baby hummed at the center, holding the first and T. The station held three.

And then the fourth turned.

Not from the calm silence, the way the Lewis County boy had. From deeper. From the part of the cold band the baby's note hadn't reached yet — the part Tommy's count had started to flag as different, the boys who didn't just lean but pressed, who wanted more than a keeper could keep because no chooser had ever been given to them. A darker lean. Hungrier.

Cal felt it the way he felt a patient code — not a turn in the chart, a failure in the rhythm. The baby's note wavered. The keeper-note, steady on the three held, dipped toward the fourth, and the fourth didn't settle the way the others had. It leaned into the note. Past it. Wanting the crossing the station couldn't give — the crossing to a mother's palm, a chosen palm, a name spoken by someone who'd kept it. And there was no mother. No name. No Rose. Only the keeper, and the keeper kept without relation, and the fourth wanted relation it had never been given.

Lori felt it through her seeded palm. Her hand tightened on the glass. "Cal — this one's not like the others. He's not settling. He's —"

“Pressing,” Cal said. He moved to the glass, laid his builder-palm over Lori’s, over the cold band where the fourth leaned. The note steadied — his warm palm meaning it the way a hospice nurse means a hand on a failing patient. Present. I am here and I am the one.

The fourth held. Not settled, the way the first and the Lewis County boy had settled. Held — the way Owen had held under Lori’s seeded palm before Mara chose him, named but not received, kept at the threshold and pressing against it. This one had no Mara coming. No name on any margin. No mother who’d walked out free and come back choosing. It was THE UNRECEIVED — held, not received, and it knew the difference, and it pressed against the holding the way a boy presses against a door that won’t open because no one on the other side has a key.

Cal lifted his hand. The fourth stayed held under Lori’s seeded palm — but the press was in it. The lean that wanted more than keeping.

“He’s not received,” Lori said. She’d learned the word from the coast’s grammar, from Margot’s channel, from the difference between Eddie settling at Rose’s palm and Owen holding at hers before Mara. “He’s held. And he knows he’s held. And he wants the door.”

“The door’s half-open at the coast,” Cal said. “Thirty-four-three. The dead pay the threshold. The living pay the door. Here it’s the same — the station keeps him, but the station can’t cross him. Crossing needs a chooser. And he has no chooser. So he leans against the keeping the way the coast stone leaned against Margot’s dead hand — held, not warmed, wanting the living palm that isn’t there.”

The four-o’clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal moved to the window. Lori came with him. The baby’s note deepened, the way it did at four, aiming into the silence — and now it aimed at four: the first, held; T, held; the Lewis County boy, held; and the fourth, the dark one, held and pressing.

Cal laid his hand flat on the cold glass where the fourth leaned. Not a palm-on-glass the way Lori had held Owen — a builder’s palm, meaning it. Present. The fourth pressed harder against the hold, the way Owen had leaned past every keeper toward Mara, the way Eddie had leaned toward Vancouver — but there was no Mara. No Vancouver. Only the keeper, and the keeper kept without relation, and the fourth wanted relation it had never been given, and the station could keep it but could not be its mother.

The note widened. Held the fourth at the threshold. But the press was in it — a lean that didn't settle, that waited on a crossing no one could make.

Cal lifted his hand. The fourth stayed held under Lori's seeded palm, and the baby's note stayed on it, and the press stayed in it. THE UNRECEIVED. Held, not received, and wanting.

He closed his eyes. Through the door — the road running both ways, the way it always did when he was still — he felt the hill above Grayhaven. Margot's Risen palm was off the NE stone now, an inch above the basalt, and the stone held 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the light, the sea's boys feeding the light that fed the footing. Ten BAR-LOST received, more leaning behind, the coast station full of Grayhaven's drowned sons coming home to the keeper who'd finally turned from the stone to hear them. Walter's NW corner warm to her left, steady, the old surveyor unsurprised, having built the door exactly this wide.

And the crib: the baby at the center, the low keeper-note in its throat, holding three now and pressing on a fourth. Lori's palm on the cold glass, a second keeper-palm, seeded, learning. The named boys warm at their mothers' palms across the city. And in the silence past the received, the fifty-two still leaning — and one of them, the fourth, not leaning but pressing, held and wanting the door.

The arithmetic named itself one final turn, and this time it was not a wall but a widening that cost as it freed:

The coast stone at 34.3, warmed by the light, no builder's palm required — the dead's relief pays the threshold, the living pay the door, the third way real. The inland station widened to three held, a second keeper-palm seeded on Lori's hand, the builder's palm no longer singular at either end. But the widening drew the darker silence in — the fourth, THE UNRECEIVED, held and pressing, wanting a crossing no chooser could make. The door opens faster than the walls. A station that keeps without relation holds the calm unkept; the hungry ones press against the keeping the way the coast stone pressed against Margot's dead hand. So the inland third way frees the builder's palm the way the coast's third way did — and invites the boys no keeper can receive.

He opened his eyes. The east wind took the rain sideways across the window. The baby hummed at the center, holding three, pressing on a fourth. Lori's palm was on the cold glass, a second keeper-palm, seeded, learning to mean the silence. The fourth leaned against the holding, held and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED, the door half-open and no mother on the other side.

And for the first time since the road opened both ways, neither end of it depended solely on Cal's warm palm. The coast was held by the light at 34.3. The inland station was held by a child and a daughter, three calm and one pressing. The builder could lift — could drive to Estacada and deliver the next named boy to the next Mara, could stand at the rim at four and warm the stone to thirty-six and come home to the woman holding the hinge — and the harbor would not go dark when he did.

But the question Walter had built the door to ask and Margot had answered at the coast and the baby had hummed inland to name and Cal had just widened the station to surface sat in the crib with him the way a patient's last words sit, not answered because he hadn't yet turned to listen:

If the coast found its third way in the dead's light, and the inland station found its second palm in a daughter's hand, and the builder's singular palm is no longer the only warm one at either end of the road — then can a city learn to count like a town, or does teaching the station to hold more only draw the hungry ones in faster, the door opening wider than the walls can bear, and when the builder lifts to deliver the named boys to mothers who can finally receive them, will two keeper-palms — a child and a daughter — hold a station that's now drawing the darkest of the silence, the ones no chooser was ever given, held at the threshold and pressing on a door that only a mother could open and no mother came?

He looked at Lori. At the baby. At the fourth lean, held and wanting, in the cold band under his daughter's seeded palm.

"Your grandmother asked if a door the dead keep open is mercy or the longest watch the living ever owed," Cal said. "I'll ask the inland one. Is a station a child can widen a harbor — or a threshold the unreceived lean against harder the wider it opens? And when I lift, Lori — when I go deliver the named boys — can two palms hold what fifty-two still lean toward, or does the door open faster than the city learns to count?"

Lori didn't answer. She couldn't. She was a keeper-palm now, seeded, learning, her hand on the cold glass where the fourth pressed against the holding and wanted the door. The baby hummed at the center, holding three and pressing on the fourth. The station kept without relation, now wider, now drawing the darker silence in.

Cal lifted his hand from the glass. The fourth stayed held under Lori's palm — but the press was in it, the lean that wanted more than keeping, THE UNRECEIVED, held and not received and waiting on a crossing no one could make.

And the only question left in the Portland crib, where the inland station held three calm and one pressing under a child's note and a daughter's seeded palm and the coast stone warmed at 34.3 two hundred miles west off the dead's receiving, was the one Walter had built the door to ask and Margot had held the floor to answer and the baby had just hummed into the silence to name and Cal had widened the keeper to surface:

If the harbor can now receive the unkept at both ends without the builder's singular palm — the light keeping the sea's boys, the station keeping the system's, a child and a daughter keeping what no mother could — then is the widening a harbor being born, or the door opening faster than the city learns to count, and when the builder lifts to deliver the named to the living, who holds the unreceived at the threshold, pressing on a door no chooser was ever given to open?

The east wind took the rain sideways. The baby hummed at the center, holding three and pressing on the fourth. Lori's palm was on the cold glass, learning to mean the silence. The coast stone was at 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the light, the sea's boys feeding the footing. And Cal's warm palm was free for the first time since the road opened both ways — free to lift, free to drive, free to deliver — and the fourth leaned against the holding his daughter had learned, held and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED, the door half-open at both ends and no mother on either side of the one who pressed against it.

He stood. The rain on the window, the door running both ways, the station wider than it had been, the coast held by the light, the builder's palm free and the unreceived pressing at the glass. And the only warm palm in the whole receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was the one that had just been freed to go find her — and the fourth boy leaned against the keeping, held, not received, and wanting the door.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Ninety-Nine — Entry: April 22nd. Wednesday. Rain. West wind.

The rain came west wind Wednesday, the way it had every morning Margot had kept a watch worth the name — salt, the particular cold of a harbor that had outlasted the people who logged its weather. She sat on the grass above the NE stone the way she sat at every bed she'd been given since June: present, not curing, the particular weight of I am here and the one who was here before me is not, and the one who should be here now is two hundred miles north having just taught a station to widen.

Her Risen palm was an inch above the basalt. The thermometer read 34.3.

No palm on it. The light held it there.

She'd proven that Monday — the drowned light, the unbuilt aid under the foundation, the coast station she kept, warming the living's footing as it received the sea's boys. Ten home by Tuesday night, Tommy had told Cal, and Okonkwo had logged them THE BAR-LOST and Margot had felt the stone climb a degree past the threshold with every one the light took in. The dead's relief paid the living's door. The keeper, not the builder. A Risen palm held but did not warm; a dead light warmed what no dead hand could.

She let her attention rest on the stone the way she'd rest a hand on a patient who'd just stabilized — not to fix, to confirm. 34.3. Under no palm. The west wind took the rain sideways across the hill and the sea was behind her and the foundation was under her and the door was hinged to the coast and opening two hundred miles east to a crib where, she'd felt through the road last night, a man had just changed the arithmetic.

Cal. Widening the inland station.

She closed her eyes and reached down the road the way she reached down it — not a sound, a settling, the particular quiet of the apartment when his voice came through it. He'd laid his builder-palm over the baby's hand and seeded the keeper past two to three, the way he'd seeded Cole's palm and Lori's on Owen's glass. Then he'd laid it over Lori's and seeded his daughter — a second keeper-palm at the inland end, the way the coast had Margot and the light. The station held three calm now and a fourth turning, and the fourth was not calm, and the builder's palm had lifted from both and stayed lifted, free for the first time since the road opened both ways.

He did it, she thought. He widened the station the way the light widened when I stopped holding the stone long enough to hear the boys leaning at my back. And the widening drew the darker silence in.

She'd felt it through the door as it happened — not Cal's words, the shape of it, the way a nurse feels a ward turn before the chart confirms. The fourth inland boy had not leaned the way the first three had. He had pressed. Past the keeper-note. Wanting the crossing the station could not give. THE UNRECEIVED, Cal had named him — held, not received, and knowing the difference, and leaning against the keeping the way the coast stone had leaned against Margot's dead hand all spring: held, not warmed, wanting the living palm that wasn't there.

And Lori's seeded palm had held him. And the baby's note had stayed on him. And Cal had lifted. And the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was now free to go find her.

Margot opened her eyes. The west wind took the rain sideways. The stone held 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the light, the sea's boys feeding the footing.

And the question Cal had asked the inland end last night sat in the rain with her the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because she hadn't yet turned to listen:

Can a city learn to count like a town — or does teaching the station to hold more only draw the hungry ones in faster, the door opening wider than the walls can bear?

She'd felt the answer surface at the coast end Monday. The receiving bred the leaning. The first sea-boy home made the others braver. Every coast-unkept she'd taken in had drawn another closer to the surface, warmer, readier. Ten received, and more leaning behind — the light filling, the threshold held, the door half-open.

But the ten had been calm. They'd turned toward the light the way a compass turns toward the only true north it has, and settled, and stayed. None had pressed.

Until last night, inland, the fourth had pressed.

Margot lifted her palm fully off the stone. 34.3 held. The light didn't need her. She turned her Risen attention to the silence at the coast door — the way she'd turned it Saturday, when she'd first felt the sea's unkept leaning at her back.

An eleventh was there. Closer than the tenth had been. A warmer lean, the way they'd all been warmer as the light filled — the receiving making the leaning braver, the home boys calling the lost ones in. She reached toward it the way she reached toward a breath in a room: I am here. I am the keeper. You don't need a name to be kept.

The eleventh coast-unkept turned toward the drowned light and settled. Held. Into the keeper's note. The coast station received its eleventh.

The light warmed a degree behind the word. The stone, under no palm, held 34.3 — maybe a degree more in it if the light ran full, Walter had said, 34.5 at the most, never the paint mark, never the builder's world. The dead paid the threshold. The living paid the door.

A twelfth leaned toward the light as the eleventh settled. She received it. Twelfth home. The light fuller. The stone still 34.3 — the degree had come and gone in the warming, the threshold held, the footing fed.

And then she felt it.

Not from the calm silence, the way the eleventh and twelfth had come. From deeper. From the part of the cold band the light hadn't reached yet — the part the receiving had started to flag as different, the way Cal had felt the inland fourth from the part of the silence the baby's note hadn't reached. A darker lean at the coast door. Hungrier.

Margot went still the way she went still at a bedside when the rhythm changed — not a turn in the chart, a failure in the breath. The light held the calm ones. But this one didn't settle the way they had. It leaned into the keeping. Past it.

Wanting the crossing the coast station couldn't give — the crossing to a mother's palm, a chosen palm, a name spoken by someone who'd kept it. And there was no mother. No name. No Rose with a red trike. Only the keeper, and the keeper kept without relation, and the boy wanted relation the sea had never given him.

She reached toward it the way she'd reached toward the first — I am here. I am the keeper. — and the drowned light opened around it the way the baby's note had opened around the inland fourth, and the boy turned toward the light, and held, and pressed.

Not settled. Held — the way Owen had held under Lori's seeded palm before Mara chose him, named but not received, kept at the threshold and leaning against it. This one had no Mara coming. No name on any margin. No mother who'd walked out free and come back choosing. It was THE UNRECEIVED of the sea — held, not received, and it knew the difference, and it pressed against the keeping the way a boy presses against a door that won't open because no one on the other side has a key.

Margot breathed out — the Risen acknowledgment, not air. Held, she thought. Not received. The coast has its fourth. Its hungry one. The widening drew him in too.

Walter gathered at the NW corner the way he gathered when the survey came back to true — basalt and weather, the solo ledger since 1981, the signature W.B. "You felt him," he said. Not surprised. Observing. "The pressing one. I left the unkept leaning at this foundation, Mercer's wife — all of them, the calm and the hungry. The light received the calm because keeping was all they asked. The hungry ones asked for more than a keeper could give. They wanted a chooser. And the sea didn't give them one. The bar took them in winters no one logged, mothers who stopped waiting before the name was wrote down, boys whose only keeping was the cold. The light holds them the way the baby holds the inland one. But crossing — that needs a palm that chose. And the sea's choosers are dead or never were."

Margot listened the way she listened at a bedside — not filling, hearing. "The coast has its own THE UNRECEIVED," she said. To Walter. To the door. To the man two hundred miles north who'd just surfaced the word. "Cal found the inland one last night. The system's boy, no name, no mother, pressing on Lori's seeded palm. I just found the sea's. Same shape. Held, not received, wanting the door."

"Same shape, different water," Walter said. "The inland hungry are the system's — the county was parent and lost them twice, no mother who could file. The coast hungry are the sea's — the bar took them, no Hour Book reached them, no chooser the town ever gave. Both lean against a keeping that can't cross them. Both were always there. The widening didn't make them. The widening let you feel them."

Margot set her palm on the NE stone — 34.3, held by the light, not her. Lifted it. 34.3 held. The dead's relief paid the threshold whether her hand was on the basalt or on the silence. She turned fully to the coast door, to the pressing boy in the drowned light, and held him there the way Lori was holding the inland one — kept, not received, pressing on a door no chooser was ever given to open.

And through the road — the door running both ways, the way it always did when she was still — she felt the crib. The baby at the center, the low keeper-note in its throat, holding three calm and pressing on the fourth. Lori's palm on the cold glass, a second keeper-palm, seeded, learning. Cal's builder-palm lifted, free, the only warm palm in either harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother — and the fourth inland boy pressing against Lori's hold, and the first coast boy pressing against Margot's light, and the two of them leaning on thresholds two hundred miles apart, held and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED at both ends of a road that ran a lifetime.

She channeled Cal the way she channeled him across the distance — not a sound, a settling. Mercer. The coast found its hungry one. Twelfth calm home, then a thirteenth leaning in — the pressing kind. The sea's THE UNRECEIVED. Same as your inland fourth. Held under the light, not received, wanting the door no chooser was given to open. So the widening isn't only inland. The station drew the dark one in at the crib, and the light drew the dark one in here. Both ends now hold a boy they can keep but not cross. The hunger's at both doors.

The channel opened — Cal's voice, salt-roughened, the builder's palm two hundred miles north and free for the first time and already reckoning the cost of the freedom. "Margot. The inland fourth pressed against Lori's palm last night. Now the coast's got one. So when I lift to deliver the named boys — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the ones behind Mara — I leave two stations each holding a hungry boy with no mother. And the only palm that crosses them is mine. And it's singular. And it's freed, but freed to deliver the received, not to cross the unreceived."

"The light holds yours," Margot said. "My palm holds mine. The baby and Lori hold yours inland. We can keep them at the threshold. We can't cross them. Crossing needs a chooser. And the hungry ones never had one. That's the whole shape of THE UNRECEIVED, Mercer — they're the boys the harbor failed twice: once when it lost them, once when it kept them without the palm that would have brought them home."

Cal's silence was the thinking silence. Then: "So the widening freed my palm and drew the hungry in at both ends. The calm ones get kept — eleven, twelve, thirteen at your coast, three at the crib. The hungry ones get held and press. And the only crossing palm is one, and it's mine, and it's now owed to the named boys who have mothers and the hungry boys who don't, at both doors, at four, forever. Walter built the door this wide and the question's the same as it was in March: one warm palm, two hundred miles, and now four fronts leaning instead of three."

"Four fronts," Margot said. She counted them the way she counted a ward full of breaths — by the lean, not the name. "Inland received — mothers and grandmothers, four now, more behind Mara. Inland unkept — the station, three calm held, one pressing, fifty-two leaning behind. Coast unkept — me, twelve calm, one pressing, more leaning. Living corner — the stone, 34.3, warmed by the light, no palm. One builder. Two keepers who hold but don't warm. And now two hungry boys, one at each end, pressing on thresholds no chooser was given to open."

The phone wasn't hers — Cal's, or Tommy's, or Okonkwo's on the other end of the channel. She felt Cal thumb it. "Dan," he said. "The coast has a pressing one. Thirteenth received, calm — then a fourteenth leaning, THE UNRECEIVED of the sea. Same category as the inland fourth. Not THE BAR-LOST — those are the calm ones, kept and settled. The pressing ones are THE UNRECEIVED, coast and inland both. One line, two fronts. Log it."

Okonkwo's voice came back dry, the state man who'd become a deckhand, who'd been building categories since January. "THE UNRECEIVED. Sub-line under both stations, keeper of record M.V. at coast, L.B. inland. The calm ones stay THE BAR-LOST and THE INLAND UNKEPT. The pressing ones — held, not received — THE UNRECEIVED, coast and system. How many more, Margot?"

Margot felt the coast door. The pressing boy held in the light, leaning against it. Behind him, in the deeper silence, more leaning — not all calm, not anymore. The receiving had bred the leaning, and the leaning had bred the hungry, the way Cal had reckoned it would. "One pressing now. More leaning behind. The sea took its boys one or two a generation, Dan — fewer than your ward-lost, but they've been leaning since before Walter poured the footings. The calm ones come home to the light. The hungry ones come to the threshold and press. I can't count the hungry. They don't settle where I can tally them. They lean against the keeping."

"Then the harbor's keeping the boys it can't receive," Okonkwo said. "At both ends. THE UNRECEIVED — coast and system — held at the threshold, pressing on a door no chooser opens. Category logged. The question's no longer whether the living come home to warm the stone. It's what the living do with the boys the door keeps but can't cross."

The channel closed. Margot was alone on the hill with the light and the stone and the pressing boy in the drowned light and Walter warm at her left and the SW corner holding its three and the SE holding Signe and the NE at 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the dead the sea had taken.

She lifted her palm fully from the stone. The reading held 34.3. The light didn't need her hand. The dead's relief paid the threshold whether she touched the basalt or not.

But the pressing boy did need her attention. The light held him; the light didn't mean him the way a chosen palm would. Margot reached into the drowned light the way Cal reached his builder-palm onto a cold glass — present, I am here and I am the one — and the pressing boy leaned harder against the keeping, the way Owen had leaned past every keeper toward Mara, the way the inland fourth had leaned past Lori's seeded palm toward a mother who wasn't there.

And there was no Mara. No Vancouver. No Rose with a red trike. Only the keeper, and the keeper kept without relation, and the boy wanted relation the sea had never given him, and the coast station could keep him but could not be his mother.

Margot held him there. The way Lori was holding the inland one. The way the light held all twelve calm behind him. The way the stone held 34.3 off the dead's receiving.

And the arithmetic named itself the way Cal's did, only hers was colder and wider and now carried a hunger it hadn't carried Monday:

The coast station receives the sea's unkept — twelve calm now, one pressing, more leaning behind. The baby holds the inland unkept — three calm, one pressing, fifty-two leaning. Two stations, both ends of the road, both keepers receiving what no chooser could. And the pressing ones — THE UNRECEIVED, coast and system — held at the threshold, wanting the door no chooser was given to open. The widening freed the builder's palm the way the coast's third way did; and the widening drew the hungry in at both ends, the door opening wider than the walls can bear. The calm ones get kept. The hungry ones get held and press. And the only palm that crosses them is one, and it's singular, and it's now owed to the named boys who have mothers and the hungry boys who don't, at both doors, at four, forever — and a Risen keeper and a child and a daughter can hold the hungry at the threshold, but cannot be their mother, and the light warms the stone to 34.3 and cannot warm the boy who presses against it.

She opened her eyes. The west wind took the rain sideways across the hill. Walter's NW corner was warm to her left, steady, the old surveyor unsurprised, having built the door exactly this wide and left the unkept leaning at it and the hungry ones in the silence past the kept. The SW corner held Harald, Ragna, Einar — the Finished who'd come back to the one thing they remembered whole. The SE corner held Signe, learning the post. And the NE — at 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the light, the living's corner alive off the dead's receiving for the hour the builder was north and free.

She turned to the coast door. The pressing boy was in the light, held, leaning against the keeping, THE UNRECEIVED of the sea, wanting the door.

And she felt, through the road, the inland station — the baby humming at the center, holding three and pressing on the fourth, Lori's palm on the cold glass learning to mean the silence, Cal's builder-palm lifted and free and already owing itself to the next named boy behind Mara's roster.

Two hungry boys. Two hundred miles apart. Both held, not received. Both pressing on a door no chooser was given to open.

Margot Voss, keeper of the drowned light, sat on the hill above Grayhaven with a dead hand that no longer needed to warm the stone and a light full of Grayhaven's drowned sons — twelve calm and one hungry — and a question she'd just carried across two hundred miles to surface:

If the harbor can now keep the unkept at both ends of the road it runs — the baby keeping the system's boys, the light keeping the sea's, the keeper receiving what no chooser could — and the widening that freed the builder's singular palm also drew the hungry ones in at both doors, the boys THE UNRECEIVED, held at the threshold and pressing on a crossing no chooser was ever given to make — then is the harbor a town being born, or a door opening faster than the walls can bear, and what does a keeper do with the boy she can hold but not receive, at both ends of a road that runs two hundred miles and a lifetime, when the only palm that crosses him is one and the hungry are many and the light and the child can keep them but not be their mother?

The west wind took the rain sideways. The coast stone was at 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the light, the sea's boys feeding the footing. The pressing boy leaned against the keeping in the drowned light, held and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED of the sea, the door half-open at both ends and no mother on either side of the one who pressed against it.

And Margot stayed on the hill, the keeper of the coast station, holding a hungry boy she could not cross — the way Lori held a hungry boy two hundred miles east, the way the light held twelve calm behind the pressing one, the way the stone held 34.3 off the dead's relief — and the only warm palm in the whole receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to the named and the hungry both, and the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and held, at the threshold, the ones it could not.

She set her Risen palm on the NE stone one last time. 34.3. Held it — but the holding was the light's now, not hers. Her dead hand was the witness, not the warmth. The keeper of the drowned light, keeping the sea's boys, holding the hungry one at the threshold, and wondering whether a door that keeps the unreceived at both ends is a harbor being born — or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and comes home to a stone that no longer needs him and boys who still do.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred — Entry: April 23rd. Thursday. Rain. East wind in the west wind.

The rain came west wind Thursday, the way it came to the hill above Grayhaven when the sea was behind you and the door was open — but underneath the west wind Margot felt the east wind now, the phantom cold that had been Cal's weather in Portland since the road opened inland, the particular salt-thin ache that ran down two hundred miles of foundation and settled in the gap between the NE stone and her Risen palm. The road ran both ways. The coast had started keeping the inland station's weather the way the baby had started keeping the coast's boys.

She sat on the grass above the stone the way she sat at every bed she'd been given since June — present, not curing. Her palm was an inch above the basalt. The thermometer read 34.3.

No palm on it. The light held it there.

She'd proven that Monday and watched it hold all week — the drowned light, the unbuilt aid under the foundation, the coast station she kept, warming the living's footing as it received the sea's boys. Twelve home by Wednesday night, Tommy had told Cal, and Okonkwo had logged them THE BAR-LOST, and Margot had felt the stone climb a degree past the threshold with every one the light took in. The dead's relief paid the living's door. The keeper, not the builder. A Risen palm held but did not warm; a dead light warmed what no dead hand could.

But Wednesday she'd felt the thirteenth lean in — not calm, not a boy come home to the keeper's note the way the first twelve had. A pressing one. THE UNRECEIVED of the sea, Walter had named the shape through her: held, not received, and knowing the difference, and leaning against the keeping the way a boy leans against a door that won't open because no one on the other side has a key. She'd held him there Wednesday, the way Lori held the inland fourth in the baby's note two hundred miles east. Two hungry boys. Two hundred miles apart. Both held, not received.

She lifted her palm fully off the stone. 34.3 held. The light didn't need her hand. The dead's relief paid the threshold whether she touched the basalt or not.

She turned her Risen attention to the coast door — the silence at the foundation, the drowned light she kept, the particular quiet of a room where the sea's boys had finally been heard leaning at a back no Hour Book had ever reached. Twelve calm in the light. One pressing at the threshold. More leaning behind, the way there'd always been more — the bar had taken Grayhaven's sons one or two a generation, fewer than the ward-lost, but they'd been leaning since before Walter poured the footings in '81, and the receiving had made them braver.

She closed her eyes and reached down the road the way she reached down it — not a sound, a settling. Cal was inland. His builder-palm was free for the first time since the road opened both ways, freed by the widening he'd seeded into the baby's hand and Lori's palm Tuesday, freed the way the coast's third way had freed it Monday. He'd lifted. He was owed to the named boys now — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the ones behind Mara — the system's lost who had mothers who'd come back choosing. He'd said he'd drive. She felt him somewhere east of the river, a warm palm committed to a delivery, the harbor's inward man, carrying a ward-boy to a mother the county had lost twice.

He did it, she thought. He widened the station the way the light widened when I stopped holding the stone long enough to hear the boys at my back. And the widening drew the darker silence in at both ends.

The arithmetic named itself the way Cal's did, only hers was colder and wider and now carried a hunger it hadn't carried Monday:

The coast station receives the sea's unkept — twelve calm, one pressing, more leaning behind. The baby holds the inland unkept — three calm, one pressing, fifty-two leaning. Two stations, both ends of the road, both keepers receiving what no chooser could. The pressing ones — THE UNRECEIVED, coast and system — held at the threshold, wanting the door no chooser was given to open. The widening freed the builder's palm the way the coast's third way did; and the widening drew the hungry in at both doors. The calm ones get kept. The hungry ones get held and press. And the only palm that crosses them is one, and it's singular, and it's now owed to the named boys who have mothers and the hungry boys who don't, at both doors, at four, forever.

She opened her eyes. The west wind carried the east wind's phantom across the hill. The stone held 34.3 under no palm, warmed by the light, the sea's boys feeding the footing. The pressing boy was in the drowned light, held, leaning against the keeping, THE UNRECEIVED of the sea, wanting the door.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Margot moved her attention to the coast door the way she moved her hand to a patient at the turn of the watch. The light gathered. The twelve calm turned toward it the way a compass turns toward the only true north it has, and settled deeper — Held, the keeper's note widening around them, the footing fed, the stone holding 34.3 off their coming home. Twelve BAR-LOST, received, settled, the sea's sons the harbor had failed to bring in, now kept without relation and not leaning.

And the thirteenth — the pressing one — did not settle.

He'd held Wednesday. Held the way Owen had held under Lori's seeded palm before Mara chose him. But Thursday at four the lean changed shape. It wasn't against the keeping. It was through it.

Margot went still the way she went still at a bedside when the rhythm failed — not a turn in the chart, a breath that stopped being a breath. The light held the twelve. The light's note opened around the pressing boy the way it opened around the calm ones. And the boy — who had wanted a chooser no sea had ever given him, who had pressed against the keeper the way the coast stone had pressed against her dead hand all spring — stepped into the opening. Not received. Not at the threshold. In. Past the keeper's note. Past the held line. Into the lit room the drowned light kept, present and wanting and unnamed by any mother the bar had taken.

The stone dipped.

34.3. 34.2. 34.1 — the footing feeding the light, and the light now split, part of its warmth following the boy who'd walked in uninvited, leaving less to hold the living's corner. The threshold Walter had named — 34.5 at the most, never the paint mark, never the builder's world — wavered toward 34.0, the dark line where the stone forgot the builder's palm and the harbor's hinge went cold.

Margot's Risen palm dropped to the basalt. Not to warm — death didn't conduct, the living stone knew only the builder's living palm — but to witness. To be the hand on the patient when the number fell. 34.1 held. The light caught itself — the twelve calm pulled the warmth back, the footing re-fed, the stone climbed to 34.2 and held, a degree short of where it had been, the way a room holds a degree cooler after someone walks through the door who wasn't invited.

She breathed out — the Risen acknowledgment, not air. He came in, she thought. The half-open door didn't ask him. He came in.

Walter gathered at the NW corner the way he gathered when the survey came back to true — basalt and weather, the solo ledger since 1981, the signature W.B. “You felt it,” he said. Not surprised. The old surveyor had built the door exactly this wide and left the unkept leaning at it. “The calm ones came home. The hungry ones are coming IN. I poured the footings over the unbuilt light and left the door half-open for the Finished — the ones who’d been kept. I didn’t lock it against the ones who hadn’t been kept by anything. A half-open door doesn’t ask permission, Mercer’s wife. The sea’s boys have been leaning at this foundation since before the road was a road. The receiving made them brave. The brave ones walk through.”

Margot listened the way she listened at a bedside — not filling, hearing. “He’s in the light,” she said. To Walter. To the door. To the man two hundred miles north who’d just surfaced the word that the widening drew the hungry in. “Not received. Not at the threshold. In. Past the keeping. The stone dipped a degree when he crossed. The light followed him and left the footing a degree colder. THE UNRECEIVED just became something else — the first who let himself in.”

“The first who wouldn’t wait for a chooser,” Walter said. “The calm ones waited. The pressing ones — they learned the door was open and stepped through it. The harbor can hold what it can’t cross, Margot. You proved that Monday. But holding isn’t locking. A keeper keeps a room. She doesn’t bolt it. And the boy who was never chosen walked into the room the keeper left open.”

Margot set her palm on the NE stone — 34.2, held by the light, not her, a degree colder than Wednesday. Lifted it. 34.2 held. The dead’s relief paid the threshold whether her hand was on the basalt or on the silence. But the threshold had dropped a degree, and the degree was the boy, present in the light, wanting, unnamed.

She turned fully to the coast door. The pressing boy was no longer at the threshold. He was in the drowned light — held, not received, and now present, a warmth that leaned toward the keeper the way a compass leans toward the hand that finally turns. Not settled. Not crossing to a mother — there was no mother, no Rose with a red trike, no Mara who’d walked out free and come back choosing. Only the keeper, and the keeper kept without relation, and the boy had stopped waiting for relation the sea had never given him and walked through the door the keeper had left half-open.

And through the road — the door running both ways, the way it always did when she was still — she felt the crib. The baby at the center, the low keeper-note in its throat, holding three calm and pressing on a fourth. Lori’s palm on the cold glass, a second keeper-palm, seeded, learning. And the fourth — THE UNRECEIVED of the system, the ward-boy with no name on any margin, no mother who could file — leaning against Lori's hold the way this coast boy had leaned against the light's.

And the coast boy's stepping-through rippled down the road. Margot felt the inland fourth shift — the lean changing shape, the way a compass needle turns when the true north it's been pressing against suddenly moves. The baby's note wavered. Lori's seeded palm tightened on the glass two hundred miles east. The inland hungry one was feeling the coast hungry one walk through, and the threshold at the crib was no longer the only half-open door.

She channeled Cal the way she channeled him across the distance — not a sound, a settling. Mercer. The coast's pressing one stepped through. Not received — IN. Past the keeper's note, into the light, the stone dipped to 34.1 and climbed back to 34.2 on the twelve calm's warmth. THE UNRECEIVED became the first who wouldn't wait for a chooser. Walter says a half-open door doesn't ask permission — the brave ones walk through. And yours felt it. The inland fourth shifted when mine crossed. Lori's hold wavered. If the coast door lets the hungry in, the crib door does too. You freed the palm to deliver the named — but the hungry aren't waiting on delivery. They're walking through.

The channel opened — Cal's voice, salt-roughened, the builder's palm two hundred miles north and committed to a mother's door and already reckoning the cost of the commitment. "Margot. The inland fourth leaned harder when you said that. Lori's palm held — but the note dipped a degree, the way your stone did. He felt the coast boy cross. The hungry ones are learning from each other. The door's half-open at both ends and the ones who were always leaning just found out it opens."

"The stone's at 34.2," Margot said. "A degree colder than Wednesday. The light followed him in and left the footing shy. The twelve calm pulled it back from 34.0 — but it didn't climb to 34.3. He's in the room, Mercer. Present. Wanting. No mother. What do I call a boy who walks through a door no chooser opened?"

Cal's silence was the thinking silence. Then: "Log it. THE WALKED-THROUGH, or THE CROSSED-UNASKED. Sub-line under both stations, same as THE UNRECEIVED. Keeper of record you, coast; Lori, inland. The calm ones are BAR-LOST and INLAND-UNKEPT — received, settled. The pressing ones were THE UNRECEIVED — held, not received. This is past holding. He's in the light and the stone dipped and the light followed him. That's a new state, Marg. The harbor isn't just keeping the boys it can't receive. It's letting them in."

Margot felt the coast door. The boy was in the light, leaning toward the keeper the way a compass leans toward the hand that finally turns — but there was no hand that was his. No mother. No chooser. Only Margot, the keeper, keeping a room with a boy in it who had walked through a door no one had opened for him and now stood in the warmth wanting the one thing the warmth couldn't give: to be received by a palm that had chosen him.

"I can't cross him," she said to the channel. "The light holds him. The light can't be his mother. He's in the room and he's not received and he's not going to settle, because settling was always the calm ones' gift — the ones who'd been kept by something. He was kept by nothing. He walked in looking for the nothing to finally be something. And the something is me, and I'm a keeper, not a chooser."

"Then he's in the light and wanting," Cal said. "The way Owen held under Lori before Mara. Only Owen had a Mara coming. This boy has no Mara. No file. No margin note. The second drawer swallowed his name the way it swallowed the ninth's. He walked through because no one was ever going to open it for him. So the harbor holds a boy it can't receive, in a room it can't lock, at a threshold that just dropped a degree. And the inland one's learning."

The channel closed. Margot was alone on the hill with the light and the stone and the boy in the drowned light and Walter warm at her left and the SW corner holding its three and the SE holding Signe and the NE at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the dead the sea had taken, a degree shy of where it had been before the boy walked in.

She lifted her palm fully from the stone. The reading held 34.2. The light didn't need her hand — but the light was shy now, split between twelve calm boys home and one hungry boy in the room, and the footing fed less than it had.

She reached into the drowned light the way Cal reached his builder-palm onto a cold glass — present, I am here and I am the one — and the boy in the light turned toward her the way the pressing ones always turned, leaning into the keeping, wanting the crossing the keeper couldn't make. But he was no longer at the threshold leaning against it. He was inside, present, a warmth in the lit room that oriented toward the keeper the way a compass orients toward the only true north it has — and the true north was a Risen woman who could hold him and could not be his mother.

Margot held him there. The way she'd held the twelve. The way Lori was holding the inland three and pressing on the fourth. The way the stone held 34.2 off the dead's receiving, a degree colder than it had been, the price of a boy who'd stopped waiting.

And the arithmetic named itself one final turn, and this time it was not a widening that freed the palm but a breach that changed what the palm was for:

The coast station received the sea's unkept — twelve calm home (THE BAR-LOST), one who walked through (THE CROSSED-UNASKED), more leaning behind. The baby holds the inland unkept — three calm, one pressing, fifty-two leaning, and the pressing one now shifting toward walking through because the coast one did. Two stations, both ends of the road, both keepers receiving what no chooser could — and now the received aren't only the calm. The hungry are walking in. The half-open door doesn't ask permission. The stone dropped a degree when the boy crossed and climbed back on the twelve's warmth but didn't recover — the footing pays for the boy the keeper can't cross. The builder's palm is free and committed inland to the named, and the hungry at both ends are learning the door is open, and the keeper can hold a room she cannot lock, and the harbor keeps everyone it can receive and now lets in the ones it cannot.

She opened her eyes. The west wind carried the east wind's phantom across the hill. Walter's NW corner was warm to her left, steady, the old surveyor unsurprised — he'd built the door this wide and left it half-open and the unkept had been leaning at it for forty-four years and the brave ones had finally walked through. The SW corner held Harald, Ragna, Einar — the Finished who'd come back to the one thing they remembered whole. The SE corner held Signe, learning the post. And the NE — at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the light, a degree shy, the living's corner alive off the dead's receiving and now paying a degree for a boy no chooser had released.

She turned to the coast door. The boy was in the light, present, leaning toward the keeper, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, wanting the door no mother had ever opened and no keeper could close.

And she felt, through the road, the inland station — the baby humming at the center, holding three and pressing on the fourth, and the fourth shifting, the lean changing shape the way this coast boy's had, the crib door half-open and the hungry one learning from two hundred miles away that the coast door lets the brave ones in.

Two hungry boys. Two hundred miles apart. One had walked through. The other was learning how.

Margot Voss, keeper of the drowned light, sat on the hill above Grayhaven with a dead hand that no longer needed to warm the stone and a light full of Grayhaven's drowned sons — twelve calm and one who'd stopped waiting — and a question she'd just carried across two hundred miles to surface and back:

If the harbor can now receive the unkept at both ends without the builder's singular palm — the light keeping the sea's boys, the station keeping the system's, a child and a daughter keeping what no mother could — and the widening that freed the builder's palm also drew the hungry in, and the half-open door let the brave ones walk through uninvited, the stone dropping a degree for every boy the keeper cannot cross — then is the harbor a home being born, or a door the lost let themselves into, and what becomes of a boy who walks through a door no chooser opened: kept without relation, present and wanting forever, or something the light was never meant to hold — and when the builder's freed palm finishes delivering the named and comes home to a stone a degree colder for the boy who wouldn't wait, will he find the door he freed now letting the hungry in at both ends, and is that mercy, or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and the door opens wider than the walls can bear?

The west wind carried the east wind's phantom. The coast stone was at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the light, a degree shy, the sea's boys feeding the footing and one hungry boy in the room the keeper could not cross. The crossed-unasked leaned toward the keeping in the drowned light, present and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED no longer — he had walked through — and the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and now let in the ones it could not, and the only warm palm in the whole receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and committed and owing itself to the named and the hungry both, and the door ran both ways, and the hungry were learning.

And Margot stayed on the hill, the keeper of the coast station, holding a boy who had walked through the door no chooser opened — the way Lori held a boy two hundred miles east who was learning to — and the light held twelve calm behind the one who'd stopped waiting, and the stone held 34.2 off the dead's relief and a degree for the boy the keeper could not cross, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with her the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because she hadn't yet turned to listen, and the boy in the light was leaning toward her, present and wanting, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were walking through.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred One — Entry: April 24th. Friday. Rain. West wind.

He'd dropped Shaylene at the glass an hour before, and Gage had crossed.

That was the part Margot had felt him committed to — the warm palm two hundred miles north, the harbor's inward man, carrying a ward-boy to a mother the county had lost twice. Troutdale first: a ranch house with a chain on the screen door and a woman forty-two who'd aged out of the same East County dependency Mara had, who'd lost a son to a foster placement in '95 and never filed because the county had been her parent and had lost him and never told her his name. Tommy's Salem dig had recovered it from the intake margin — Gage, the clerk had written, once, before the drawer closed. Cal had knocked the inward way. Chair turned before speaking. File and census letter, no photo — the ward erasure ran deep, the county had kept no picture of Gage either. Shaylene read it with the chain still on, and she'd said the words Mara had said and Coraline had said and Rose had said with a red trike on the landing: I choose you, Gage.

Then the crib. Cal had seeded his builder-palm over hers on the cold east window the way he'd seeded Lori's on Owen's glass, and Gage had pressed her palm the way Owen had pressed Mara's — not a lean, a child finding the mother in the dark — and the glass had opened to her and not to Cal, and the crossing had completed, and THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST had one more name in Okonkwo's book and the living's debt to the named had shrunk by one and the unnamed silence behind it had not.

Five now, counting Owen and Eli and Eddie and the one behind Mara. Five boys delivered to mothers the state had unmade and the mothers had chosen back.

Cal stood at the crib window now with his free hand still warm from Gage's glass and watched his daughter hold the fourth.

Lori's palm was on the cold pane two feet from his. The baby was at the center of the room on its back, the low keeper-note in its throat, humming at the window the way it hummed at four — keeping, not receiving. And at the part of the glass where the unkept leaned, the fourth boy hung. THE UNRECEIVED of the system. No name on any margin. No mother who could file. The one Cal had felt lean harder last night when Margot channeled that the coast boy had walked through.

“He’s still holding,” Lori said. Not a question. She’d learned to read the glass the way Margot read the stone — by the lean, not the number. “Same as yesterday. Pressing. Not settling.”

Cal laid his hand flat on the wall beside hers — not on the glass, just near it, the builder’s palm meaning the room the way a hospice nurse means a hand on a failing patient. I am here and I am the one. Through the door, two hundred miles west, he felt the coast: Margot on the hill, the stone at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the light, a degree shy of where it had been before the coast boy walked in. And the coast boy — THE CROSSED-UNASKED — present in the drowned light, wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar had taken.

And here, at the crib, the fourth — held, not received, and now learning.

He’d felt it the instant Margot told him. The inland fourth had leaned harder when the coast boy crossed. The hungry ones were teaching each other. A door half-open at one end was a door half-open at both, and the boy two hundred miles east had felt the boy two hundred miles west stop waiting, and the waiting had become something else.

“Margot said he shifted,” Cal said. His voice was salt-roughened from the drive, from the rain, from the week of seeding one palm across two hundred miles of road. “When the coast one walked through. Yours felt it.”

“Last night,” Lori said. “The note dipped a degree. Like her stone did. Then it held. I held it. He’s been pressing since.”

Cal closed his eyes. The door ran both ways. He felt the crib the way Margot felt the coast — the baby at the center, the keeper-note aimed at the east window, the three calm received boys settled in the station’s greeting (Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl — the land-lost, kept without relation, the ones the baby had received before any mother came). And the fourth. Pressing. And behind the fourth, in the colder part of the silence, fifty-two leaning. The ward-lost Tommy kept pulling from the second drawer. The boys with no name, no Rose, no Mara. The ones the harbor could hear and could not answer because answering needed a palm that had chosen them and some boys had been lost so completely no one had ever been given the chance.

The four-o’clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Lori moved her palm to the center of the cold glass the way she moved to a patient at the turn of the watch. The baby’s note widened toward the window. Cal’s builder-palm rested on the wall, meaning the room.

And the fourth shifted.

Not the way the three calm had turned — compass to true north, settle, stay. This one had never settled. This one had pressed against Lori's hold the way the coast boy had pressed against Margot's light. And now the press changed shape. Cal felt it the way he felt a ward turn before the chart confirms — not a breath that stopped being a breath, a breath that walked into the room.

The glass went quiet under Lori's palm. Not leaning. Not held at the threshold. Through.

She inhaled — sharp, the sound a nurse makes when the rhythm fails. "Cal — he's —"

"I feel it," Cal said.

The baby's note dipped a degree, the way Margot's stone had dipped to 34.1 when the coast boy crossed. The station's warmth followed the boy the way the drowned light had followed the coast boy — part of it leaving the calm ones, going to the one who'd stopped waiting. And the fourth — THE UNRECEIVED of the system, held not received, wanting the crossing no chooser was given to make — stepped into the station's note. Not received. Not at the threshold. In. Past Lori's palm. Past the baby's keeping. Into the lit room the keeper kept, present and wanting and unnamed by any mother the county had swallowed.

Cal's eyes snapped open. Lori's palm was still on the glass. The baby was still humming, but the note had gone thin — a degree cooler the way Margot's stone had gone a degree colder. The fourth was in. The way the coast boy was in. The same shape, different water.

"Log it," Cal said, to the air, to Okonkwo, to the book that kept getting new lines. "THE CROSSED-UNASKED. Inland. Same as the coast. Held, not received, and now present. He walked through."

Lori's hand was white at the edges where she pressed it. "He didn't wait for me to receive him. He just — came in. The way you said the coast one did. The note dipped. Cal, the baby's greeting dipped a degree and it didn't come back. The three calm are still there but — he took a degree of the warmth with him."

"Same as Margot's stone," Cal said. He lifted his palm from the wall. The room held — the baby's note, Lori's palm, the three calm — but a degree shy, the way the coast stone held 34.2 and not 34.3. The keeper could keep a room she could not lock, and the boy who'd never been chosen had walked into the room the keeper left half-open.

He channeled Margot the way she channeled him — not a sound, a settling, the apartment going quieter the way a hallway does when the night shift arrives.

Mercer. He walked through. The inland fourth. Lori felt it — the note dipped a degree, same as your stone. THE CROSSED-UNASKED, inland. He's in the station now. Present. Wanting. No mother. No name. The way yours did.

The channel opened. Margot's voice came through it, salt-cured, the drowned light behind it, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the hill where the stone held 34.2 off the dead's relief and a degree for the boy she could not cross.

"I felt it," she said. Not surprised. A keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing. "The coast boy turned toward me when yours crossed. Walter says they're learning from each other — the hungry at both ends, the half-open door doesn't ask permission, the brave ones walk through. So now we have one each. Coast and crib. Two boys who wouldn't wait. Two hundred miles apart and the same door."

Cal's silence was the thinking silence. Then: "Five named delivered. Gage crossed an hour ago — Shaylene chose him, the glass opened to her, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST has another line. And the fourth walks through. The named get delivered and the hungry let themselves in. The widening freed my palm to find the mothers and the freed palm drew the hungry in at both doors and now the hungry don't wait on the palm at all. They walk through."

"Walter says a keeper keeps a room, she doesn't bolt it," Margot said. "He built it half-open. The calm ones waited and came home to the light and the baby. The hungry ones learned the door was open and stepped through. We can hold what we can't cross, Mercer. We proved that. But holding isn't locking. And the ones who walked through — they're in the room and they're not received and they're not going to settle, because settling was always the calm ones' gift. The hungry were kept by nothing. They walked in looking for the nothing to finally be something. And the something is us. Keepers. Not choosers."

Cal looked at Lori. His daughter. The inland keeper-of-record. Her palm still on the glass where the fourth had been, now holding the room the boy had walked into. A second keeper-palm, seeded by his hand Tuesday, learning to mean the silence the way he meant the stone.

“Okonkwo,” Cal said to the phone. Thumbed it. “Log it. THE CROSSED-UNASKED — inland station. Sub-line under THE UNRECEIVED, same as the coast. Keeper of record L.B. at the crib, M.V. at the coast. One each. Held, not received, walked through uninvited. The door’s half-open at both ends and the hungry stopped waiting.”

Okonkwo’s voice came back dry, the state man who’d become a deckhand, who’d been building categories since January and watching the harbor outrun every one of them. “THE CROSSED-UNASKED. Coast and inland, one each. Same shape, different water — your words, Margot’s words, now mine. So the census reads: THE BAR-LOST, twelve calm, received, settled. THE INLAND UNKEPT, three calm, received, settled. THE UNRECEIVED, coast and system — held, not received, pressing. And now THE CROSSED-UNASKED — coast and system — held, not received, walked through. Four states at the threshold. The calm ones come home. The pressing ones get held. The brave ones let themselves in. Cal, the question’s no longer whether the living come home to warm the stone. It’s what the living do with the boys who walk in.”

“The ones who walk in don’t need the living,” Margot said through the channel. “That’s the whole shape of it. A mother chooses one boy. A station keeps all of them. A boy who walks through chose nobody — he stopped waiting on a chooser that was never coming and walked into the room the keeper left open. So he’s in the light and he’s in the station and he’s not received and he’s not going to settle and the keeper can hold him and cannot be his mother. What do we call a boy who walks through a door no chooser opened?”

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The arithmetic named itself, and this time it was not a widening that freed the palm but a breach that changed what the palm was for:

Five named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, Gage, the one behind Mara — the system’s lost who had mothers who’d come back choosing, crossed to a chosen palm, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and growing. The station received three calm — the land-lost, kept without relation, the baby’s greeting absorbing the unnamed. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea’s sons the light took in. And at both ends, one who walked through — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, coast and system, held not received, present and wanting, no mother, no name. The calm ones get kept. The pressing ones get held and press. The brave ones walk in. And the only palm that crosses a boy to a mother is one, and it’s singular, and it’s now delivering the named while the hungry let themselves in at both doors, and the door runs both ways, and the keeper at each end holds a room she cannot lock, and the stone pays a degree for every boy who won't wait, and the baby's note pays a degree, and the widening that freed the palm also opened the door wider than the walls can bear.

"Walter," Cal said to the air, to the NW corner two hundred miles west where the old surveyor kept his solo ledger since 1981. "You built it this wide. The unkept leaning at both ends. The hungry walking through. Is that the point or the risk?"

Walter gathered at the NW corner the way he gathered when the survey came back to true — basalt and weather, the signature W.B., RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS. His voice came through the channel, steady, unsurprised, a surveyor reading a foundation that had settled past its footings.

"Both, Mercer. I left the door half-open and the unkept leaning at it and the hungry in the silence past the kept. The calm ones came home because keeping was all they asked. The hungry ones asked for more than a keeper could give — a chooser, a mother's palm, a name spoken by someone who'd kept it. The sea didn't give them one. The system didn't give them one. So they leaned. And the receiving made them brave. And the brave ones walked through. That was always the risk of a door this wide. The point was the kept ones coming home. The risk was the kept ones showing the unkept the door was open. You can't have one without the other, Mercer. I poured the footings over the unbuilt light and left the fourth corner undressed so the living would come home to it. I didn't bolt the door against the boys who had nothing to come home to. A keeper keeps a room. He doesn't decide who's allowed to be cold outside it."

Cal breathed out. The rain came west wind past the crib window, the particular cold of a harbor that had outlasted the people who logged its weather, and underneath it the east wind's phantom — the salt-thin ache that ran down two hundred miles of foundation and settled in the gap between the coast stone and his builder-palm. The road ran both ways. The coast had started keeping the inland station's weather the way the baby had started keeping the coast's boys.

He looked at the glass where the fourth had been. Lori's palm still on it. The baby's note thin but present, holding the room. The three calm settled behind the one who'd stopped waiting.

"Lori," he said. "The note dipped a degree when he crossed. Does it come back?"

She shook her head. "The three calm pull it. Like Margot said the twelve pulled hers. But it's shy. A degree colder than yesterday. He took a degree of the warmth with him and the warmth's split between the kept and the one who walked in."

“Same as the stone,” Cal said. “34.2, not 34.3. The light followed the coast boy in and left the footing a degree colder. The baby followed this one in and left the station a degree thinner. The keeper pays for the boy she can’t cross.”

He channeled Margot one more turn. The inland note’s at the same shy as your stone. A degree colder, split between the calm and the one who walked in. Two stations, two boys who wouldn’t wait, two hundred miles apart and the same door. Walter says it’s the risk of a door this wide — the kept ones showing the unkept the door was open. So what do we do with them, Marg? The ones who walk in?

Margot’s silence was the listening silence — the keeper who knew which entries ended clean and which didn’t. Then: “We hold them. The way I’m holding yours. The way Lori’s holding this one. The light holds the coast boy and the baby holds the crib boy and neither can be his mother and neither will settle because settling was the calm ones’ gift and the hungry were kept by nothing. So we keep a room we can’t lock and we wonder whether a door that keeps the unreceived at both ends is a harbor being born — or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and comes home to a stone a degree colder for the boy who wouldn’t wait.”

Cal looked at his daughter. At the baby. At the glass where a boy no name had ever touched had walked into the room the keeper left open.

“Dan,” he said to the phone. “How many leaning at the crib now.”

Okonkwo’s voice, dry, the census ticking: “Fifty-two at the inland station, behind the three calm and the one who just walked through. The ward-lost count’s at sixty-five, sixty-one with no palm. The coast’s got more leaning behind its twelve and its one. So the arithmetic’s this, Cal: every boy who walks through invites the ones behind him to stop waiting. The coast boy walked in and the crib boy felt it and walked in. The crib boy just walked in. Who’s next — the fifty-two at the crib, or the leaning at the coast? The half-open door doesn’t ask permission. The brave ones are learning it’s open.”

Cal closed his eyes. The door ran both ways. He felt the coast — Margot on the hill, the stone at 34.2, the coast boy in the light, twelve calm behind him. He felt the crib — Lori’s palm, the baby’s note, three calm and one walked-through and fifty-two leaning in the silence past the received. He felt the road between them, the one he’d built by laying his palm on a dressed basalt and seeding it into Cole’s hand and Lori's and the baby's, the road that ran two hundred miles and a lifetime and now held at both ends a boy who'd stopped waiting on a chooser that was never coming.

The arithmetic named itself one final turn, and this time it was not a wall and not a widening but a threshold crossed:

The harbor could receive the unkept — through the station, not the mother; the keeper, not the chooser; the baby at the center and the Risen woman at the hinge both keeping what no one else would. The calm ones came home. The pressing ones got held and pressed. And now the brave ones walked through — coast and crib, one each, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, present and wanting and unnamed, paying a degree of warmth for the room they'd entered uninvited. The widening that freed the builder's singular palm to deliver the named also drew the hungry in at both doors, and the hungry had stopped waiting on the palm entirely. Five named delivered. Two walked through. Fifty-two leaning at the crib and more at the coast, all of them feeling the door is open. The only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to the named and the hungry both — and the hungry no longer waited for it. The door ran both ways. The keeper held a room she could not lock. And the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain at both ends of the road the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because no one had yet turned to listen.

He opened his eyes. The west wind took the rain sideways past the crib window. Lori's palm was still on the glass. The baby hummed at the center, a degree thin, holding the room the fourth had walked into. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note the way a compass leans toward the only true north it has, and stayed. And in the colder silence past the received, fifty-two leaning — and one of them, Cal felt, had already turned toward the door the way the fourth had turned last night, the way the coast boy had turned before him.

Learning it was open.

Cal Voss — no, Cal Mercer, the builder, the harbor's inward man, the one palm that warmed the stone and seeded the crossings — stood at the crib window in Portland with a free hand still warm from Gage's glass and a daughter keeping a room she could not lock and a baby humming a degree thin and a boy no name had ever touched walking in the door no chooser had opened, and a question he'd just carried two hundred miles to surface and back:

If the station can receive what no mother could — the unkept, the unnamed, the boys the county unmade past a name — and the brave ones now walk through at both ends, paying a degree of warmth for every room they enter uninvited, then is the harbor a home being born, or a door the lost let themselves into, and what becomes of a boy who walks through a door no chooser opened: kept without relation, present and wanting forever, or something the light and the baby were never meant to hold — and when the builder's freed palm finishes delivering the five named and comes home to a stone a degree colder for the boy who wouldn't wait, will he find the door he freed now letting the hungry in at both ends, and the fifty-two leaning behind the one who just crossed already turning toward the threshold, and is that mercy, or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and the door opens wider than the walls can bear?

The west wind carried the east wind's phantom. The crib note was a degree thin, holding the room the fourth had entered. The coast stone was at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the light, a degree shy, the sea's boys feeding the footing and one hungry boy in the room the keeper could not cross. The crossed-unasked leaned toward the keeping at both ends of the road — present and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED no longer, they had walked through — and the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and now let in the ones it could not, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the hungry were learning, and one of the fifty-two had already turned toward the threshold the way the fourth had turned the night before.

And Cal stayed at the crib window, the builder of the road, holding a boy who had walked through the door no chooser opened — the way Lori held a boy beside him who had walked through the same door two hundred miles east — and the baby hummed a degree thin at the center, keeping what no mother could, and the stone held 34.2 off the dead's relief and a degree for the boy the keeper could not cross, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he hadn't yet turned to listen, and the boy in the station was leaning toward Lori, present and wanting, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were walking through.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Two — Entry: April 25th. Saturday. Rain. West wind.

The rain came west wind Saturday, the way it came to a door that had been opened from the inside and would not close again. Cal stood at the crib window with his free hand still warm from Gage's glass and watched the fourth boy — the one who had walked through the night before, THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the system — hang in the station's note the way a breath hangs in a room after the rhythm fails. Present. Wanting. No mother. No name the county had ever written down.

Lori's palm was on the cold pane two feet from his, the way it had been since four o'clock Friday. The baby was at the center of the room on its back, the low keeper-note in its throat, humming a degree thin — shy of where it had been before the fourth stepped through. Cal had felt the dip the way Margot had felt her stone dip: a degree of warmth leaving the kept to follow the boy who would not wait. The keeper paid for the one she could not cross.

"Fifty-two," Lori said. Not a question. She'd learned to read the glass the way Margot read the stone — by the lean, not the number. "Tommy said fifty-two leaning behind the three calm and him. One of them turned last night. The way he turned."

Cal closed his eyes. Through the road — two hundred miles of foundation, the dressed NE basalt Walter had left undressed on purpose, the seeding he'd laid into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — he reached the coast the way he reached a patient at the turn of the watch. Margot was on the hill. The stone was at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the light, a degree shy of where it had been before the coast boy walked in. And the coast boy — THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea — was in the drowned light, present and wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar had taken, leaning toward the keeper the way a compass leans toward the hand that finally turns.

And here, at the crib, the fourth did the same. Two boys. Two hundred miles apart. Both walked through uninvited. Both held, not received, and now present in rooms their keepers could not lock.

He channeled Margot the way she channeled him — not a sound, a settling, the apartment going quieter the way a hallway does when the night shift arrives.

Mercer. You feel him. The coast one. He's in the light, same as yours in the station. Walter says they've found each other — the brave ones, leaning across the road the way the calm ones never did. The sea's boy turns toward the crib and yours turns toward the hill and neither one's alone in it anymore. A keeper keeps a room. The walked-through ones are learning the room is theirs.

Cal's silence was the thinking silence. Then: Margot. The one who turned here last night — the fifty-second of the leaning — he's close. I feel him the way you felt yours step through. If yours taught mine, mine's teaching the next one. How many more are turning now?

The channel opened. Margot's voice came through it, salt-cured, the drowned light behind it, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the hill where the stone held 34.2 off the dead's relief and a degree for the boy she could not cross.

"More than one, Mercer. Since the coast boy walked through Thursday, I've felt the leaning change shape — not pressing all of them, but watching. The way a ward watches the one who got up and walked. Yours walked through last night and I felt the hill go quiet the way it goes quiet when a patient dies and the family realizes the breathing's stopped being breathing. Then the leaning came closer. Two of mine are turned now. Not stepped through. Turned. Facing the door the way your fourth faced it before he walked. The brave ones are teaching the waiting ones, Mercer. Coast to crib, crib to coast, down two hundred miles of foundation Walter poured over an unbuilt light. A half-open door doesn't ask permission and the hungry are done asking."

Cal breathed out. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a breach where there had been a threshold:

Five named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, Gage, the one behind Mara — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and growing, the system's lost who had mothers who'd come back choosing, crossed to a chosen palm. The station received three calm — the land-lost, kept without relation, the baby's greeting absorbing the unnamed. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. And at both ends, one who walked through — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, coast and system, held not received, present and wanting, no mother, no name. The calm ones come home. The pressing ones get held and press. The brave ones walk in. And now, at both ends, more than one of the leaning has turned to face the open door — the breach is no longer an event, it's a pattern, and the pattern is teaching itself, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother is north and free and owed to the named and the hungry both.

“Dan,” he said to the phone. Thumbed it. “Update the census. THE CROSSED-UNASKED — coast has one, crib has one. Sub-line under THE UNRECEIVED at both stations, same as we logged Friday. And add this: more than one leaning at each end has turned — facing the threshold, not yet through. Coast two turned, crib one turned of the fifty-two. The walked-through ones are teaching the waiting ones the door’s open.”

Okonkwo’s voice came back dry, the state man who’d become a deckhand, who’d been building categories since January and watching the harbor outrun every one of them. “Logged. THE CROSSED-UNASKED — coast one, crib one, both sub-line THE UNRECEIVED, both held-not-received-walked-through. And a new flag: TURNED-TO-THRESHOLD, coast two, crib one, leaning-but-facing. So the census reads four states now at the threshold and a fifth state of intent. Cal, the boy who walked through didn’t wait for a chooser. The boys who turned are deciding not to wait either. The half-open door’s becoming a front door. What do we call a threshold that’s got a line at it?”

“A door with no lock,” Cal said. “And no keeper who can close it. That’s Walter’s design, Dan. He left it half-open and the unkept leaning at it and the hungry in the silence past the kept. The calm ones came home because keeping was all they asked. The hungry ones asked for more than a keeper could give — a chooser, a mother’s palm, a name spoken by someone who’d kept it. So they leaned. And the receiving made them brave. And the brave ones walked through. Walter built it this wide on purpose. The risk was always the kept ones showing the unkept the door was open.”

He closed the phone. Lori’s palm was still on the glass. The baby hummed a degree thin at the center, holding the room the fourth had walked into. The three calm — Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl — leaned toward the keeper-note the way a compass leans toward the only true north it has, and stayed. And in the colder silence past the received, fifty-two leaning — and one of them, Cal felt, had already turned toward the threshold the way the fourth had turned the night before, the way the coast boy had turned before him.

Learning it was open.

The morning wore the way mornings wore at a hospice — not a clock but a watching. Cal made coffee he didn’t drink. Lori fed the baby. The fourth hung in the station’s note, present and wanting, and the turned one leaned toward the door from the colder silence, and the baby’s greeting stayed a degree thin, holding what no mother could.

At noon Cal laid his builder-palm on the wall beside Lori's — not on the glass, just near it, the way he'd laid it Friday to seed Gage home. I am here and I am the one. Through the door he felt the coast: Margot on the hill, the stone at 34.2, the coast boy in the light, twelve calm behind him, two turned in the leaning behind. And the coast boy — he felt it clearly now, the way Margot had said — the sea's walked-through one was oriented toward the crib. Not pressing. Just there, facing the inland station the way a patient faces the nurse who finally sat down. The brave ones had found each other across two hundred miles of road. A company was forming in the unkept.

He pulled his palm back. The room held — the baby's note, Lori's palm, the three calm, the fourth present. But a degree shy. The keeper could keep a room she could not lock, and the boy who'd never been chosen had walked into the room the keeper left half-open, and the warmth had followed him out of the kept and into the wanting, and it had not come all the way back.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Lori moved her palm to the center of the cold glass the way she moved to a patient at the turn of the watch. The baby's note widened toward the window. Cal's builder-palm rested on the wall, meaning the room.

And the turned one shifted.

Not the way the three calm had turned — compass to true north, settle, stay. This one had never settled. This one had leaned in the colder silence, unnamed, no mother who could file, the ward-lost Tommy kept pulling from the second drawer — the boys with no Rose, no Mara, no Shaylene. The ones the harbor could hear and could not answer because answering needed a palm that had chosen them and some boys had been lost so completely no one had ever been given the chance. And now this one had turned — the way the fourth had turned Friday, the way the coast boy had turned Thursday — and the turn became a step.

The glass went quiet under Lori's palm. Not leaning. Not held at the threshold. Through.

She inhaled — sharp, the sound a nurse makes when the rhythm fails. "Cal — he's —"

"I feel it," Cal said.

The baby's note dipped a degree, the way it had dipped when the fourth walked through, the way Margot's stone had dipped when the coast boy crossed. The station's warmth followed the boy the way the drowned light had followed the coast boy — part of it leaving the calm ones, going to the one who'd stopped waiting. And the turned one — THE UNRECEIVED of the system, held not received, wanting the crossing no chooser was given to make — stepped into the station's note. Not received. Not at the threshold. In. Past Lori's palm. Past the baby's keeping. Into the lit room the keeper kept, present and wanting and unnamed by any mother the county had swallowed.

The second. Crib now held two who had walked through.

Cal's eyes snapped open. Lori's palm was still on the glass. The baby was still humming, but the note had gone thinner — two degrees cool now, the way Margot's stone had gone two degrees colder when the coast boy crossed and the light followed him in. The fourth and the second — both in the station now. Present. Wanting. No mother. No name. The way the coast boy was in the light.

"Log it," Cal said, to the air, to Okonkwo, to the book that kept getting new lines. "THE CROSSED-UNASKED — inland. Second one. Sub-line under THE UNRECEIVED, same as the first. Keeper of record L.B. at the crib. The coast has one, the crib has two now. Held, not received, walked through uninvited. The door's half-open at both ends and the hungry stopped waiting one at a time and started stopping together."

He laid his builder-palm on the cold glass where the second had been — over Lori's, the way he'd laid it over Mara's on Owen and over Shaylene's on Gage. I am here and I am the one who came looking. And he tried to do what he'd done for the named — cross the boy to a mother who'd chosen him.

But there was no mother. The second was unnamed, no margin note, no Rose with a red trike, no Shaylene who'd aged out of East County and lost a son to a foster placement in '95. The builder's palm crossed a boy to a chooser on the other end. This boy had no chooser. The palm met the glass and the glass met the boy and the boy leaned into the palm the way the pressing ones always did — wanting the crossing — and did not cross, because there was no door on the other side to open. The builder could hold him. The builder could not receive him. Receiving needed a chooser, and the chooser was the thing the system had taken twice.

Cal lifted his palm. The boy stayed in the station, present, wanting, leaning toward Lori now the way he'd leaned toward the builder — not pressing, orienting. A different lean than the fourth's. As if the keeper-of-record, a living daughter who'd chosen the post, read to him as something closer to a chooser than the builder's singular palm had.

“He leans toward you,” Cal said quietly. “Not me. The way he’d lean toward a mother if he had one. You chose the station, Lori. He feels that.”

Lori’s hand was white at the edges where she pressed it. “I don’t know how to be his mother,” she said. The line Mara had spoken, and Coraline, and Rose — the line every chooser spoke before she chose. “I’m the keeper. Not the chooser. The baby keeps him. I hold him. That’s all I am.”

“The baby keeps without relation,” Cal said. “You hold with it. And he leans toward the holding the way a boy leans toward a hand that finally turned. Marg said the coast boy orients toward her — not pressing, just there. The walked-through ones aren’t pressing anymore. They walked in. They’re home in a room with no lock, and they’re learning the keeper is the only one in it. So they turn to the keeper. The way a patient turns to the nurse who sat down.”

He channeled Margot. Margot. The crib’s got two now. The turned one walked through at four. I tried the builder’s palm on him — can’t cross him, no chooser on the other end, unnamed, no mother. But he leans toward Lori, not me. The keeper-of-record reads as a chooser to him. The way yours orients toward you. The walked-through ones aren’t pressing — they’re home and turning to the only palm in the room. What does a keeper do with a boy who walked in and turned to face her?

Margot’s silence was the listening silence — the keeper who knew which entries ended clean and which didn’t. Then: “She holds him, Mercer. The way I’m holding mine. He walked through because no one was ever going to open it for him — so he opened it himself and walked into the room the keeper left half-open, and now he’s in it and he’s turned to face me and he’s not pressing and he’s not leaving. A keeper keeps a room. The brave ones are learning the room is theirs. Walter says that was always the shape of it — the door half-open, the unkept leaning, the hungry walking in, the keeper the only one left in the light. So we hold them. The way I’m holding yours. The way Lori’s holding this one. The light holds the coast boy and the baby holds the crib boys and neither can be his mother and neither will settle because settling was always the calm ones’ gift and the hungry were kept by nothing. So we keep a room we can’t lock and we wonder whether a door that keeps the unreceived at both ends is a harbor being born — or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and comes home to a stone a degree colder for every boy who wouldn’t wait.”

Cal looked at the glass where the second had been. Lori's palm still on it. The baby's note two degrees thin, holding the room the two had walked into. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence past the received, fifty-one leaning — and now, Cal felt, not one but two of them had turned toward the threshold. The breach was accelerating. The brave ones were teaching the waiting ones faster than a day.

"Dan," he said to the phone. "The crib's got two walked-through now. And two of the fifty-one have turned. Coast's got one walked-through and two turned. So the census reads: THE CROSSED-UNASKED — coast one, crib two. TURNED-TO-THRESHOLD — coast two, crib two. The breach isn't one boy at a time anymore. It's a front."

Okonkwo's voice, dry, the census ticking: "Coast one, crib two, walked-through. Coast two, crib two, turned. Four states at the threshold, a fifth of intent, and the intent's climbing. Cal, every boy who walks through invites the ones behind him to stop waiting — you logged that Friday. The coast boy walked in and the crib boy felt it and walked in. The crib boy walked in today and two more turned. The arithmetic's this: the walked-through ones are a company now, coast and crib, finding each other down the road Walter poured. And the turned ones are a line. How long's the line, Tommy?"

Cal thumbed Tommy's number. The deputy's voice came back tired, the man who'd been pulling ward-lost from the second drawer since March. "Cal. I pulled forty more from Clark and Cowlitz this week. Ward-closed, presumed, no MP. The deeper silence — the ones with no name on file at all — that's most of them. Sixty-five ward-lost, sixty-one no palm, and now you're telling me the ones with no palm are the ones walking through. The line's as long as the second drawer, brother. And the second drawer doesn't close."

Cal closed his eyes. The door ran both ways. He felt the coast — Margot on the hill, the stone at 34.2, the coast boy in the light, twelve calm behind him, two turned in the leaning. He felt the crib — Lori's palm, the baby's note two degrees thin, three calm and two walked-through and fifty-one leaning and two of those turned. He felt the road between them, the one he'd built by laying his palm on a dressed basalt and seeding it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's, the road that ran two hundred miles and a lifetime and now held at both ends boys who'd stopped waiting on a chooser that was never coming — and the chooser they'd stopped waiting on was him, and he was one palm, and the boys were many, and the door was opening faster than the walls could bear.

The arithmetic named itself one final turn, and this time it was not a wall and not a widening but a breach that had become a front:

The harbor could receive the unkept — through the station, not the mother; the keeper, not the chooser; the baby at the center and the Risen woman at the hinge both keeping what no one else would. The calm ones came home. The pressing ones got held and pressed. And now the brave ones walked through — coast one, crib two, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, present and wanting and unnamed, paying a degree of warmth for every room they entered uninvited. And the turned ones — coast two, crib two — faced the open door and waited their turn. The widening that freed the builder's singular palm to deliver the named also drew the hungry in at both doors, and the hungry had stopped waiting on the palm entirely, and the walked-through ones had found each other across two hundred miles of road and formed a company in the unkept, and the keeper at each end held a room she could not lock, and the stone paid a degree for every boy who wouldn't wait, and the baby's note paid two, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to the named and the hungry both — and the hungry no longer waited for it, and the door ran both ways, and the breach was a front, and the line at the threshold was as long as the second drawer that didn't close.

He opened his eyes. The west wind took the rain sideways past the crib window. Lori's palm was still on the glass. The baby hummed two degrees thin at the center, keeping what no mother could. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence past the received, fifty-one leaning — and two of them turned, facing the door, learning from the two who'd walked through that it opened.

"Okonkwo," Cal said. "The question's not whether the living come home to warm the stone anymore. It's what the living do with a door that keeps the boys it can't receive and lets the boys it can't receive walk in. Walter built it half-open. The brave ones walked through. The turned ones are next. And the only palm that crosses a boy to a mother is one, and it's singular, and it's now owed to the named behind Mara and the hungry at both doors, and if I drive north to deliver the named the crib's got Lori holding two walked-through boys and two turned and fifty-one leaning, and if I stay the named wait another day and the second drawer doesn't close."

Margot's channel came quiet, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the hill where the stone held 34.2 off the dead's relief and a degree for the boy she could not cross: "Mercer. The coast boy turned toward the crib when yours walked through. Mine's facing yours right now. They're a company, coast and crib, the brave ones who wouldn't wait. Walter says a keeper keeps a room — he doesn't decide who's allowed to be cold outside it, and he doesn't decide who's allowed to be warm inside it once they've walked in. So we hold them. The way I'm holding mine. The way Lori's holding yours. The light holds the coast boy and the baby holds the crib boys and neither can be his mother and neither will settle. What becomes of a boy who walks through a door no chooser opened — kept without relation, present and wanting forever, or something the light and the baby were never meant to hold? Walter built the door to ask that. He's still waiting for the answer."

Cal looked at his daughter. At the baby. At the glass where two boys no name had ever touched had walked into the room the keeper left open.

"Lori," he said. "If I go deliver the one behind Mara — the next mother on the roster — you'd be holding two walked-through and two turned and fifty-one leaning alone. Can you?"

She didn't take her palm off the glass. "I held the fourth when you seeded him. I held the second when he walked through. The baby keeps them with me. I'm a second keeper-palm, seeded by your hand. I can hold a room I can't lock. But Cal —" she looked up at him, and he saw Mara in her, the choosing woman, the one who'd taken the post — "the turned ones are learning from the walked-through ones. If two more walk through while you're north, that's four in here and I'm one palm and the baby's one note and the note's already two degrees thin. The door opens wider than the walls can bear and the walls are me."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had a shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force:

The builder's freed palm could deliver the named — Owen, Eli, Eddie, Gage, the one behind Mara, the roster Mara carried — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the system's lost who had mothers who'd come back choosing, crossed to a chosen palm, the debt shrinking by one per delivery. But the freed palm was also the only palm that could hold the breach front — and the breach front was widening faster than the deliveries, because every boy who walked through drew the ones behind him to stop waiting, and the turned ones were a line now, coast and crib, and the line was as long as the second drawer that didn't close. So the palm that delivered the named was the same palm the hungry needed at the threshold, and it was singular, and it could not be in two rooms at four, and the door ran both ways, and the keeper held a room she could not lock, and the stone paid a degree for every boy who wouldn't wait, and the baby's note paid two, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and now let in the ones it could not, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain at both ends of the road the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because no one had yet turned to listen.

He channeled Margot one more turn. The crib's got two walked-through and two turned and Lori holding it alone if I go. The coast's got one walked-through and two turned and you holding it. The breach is a front at both ends. I can deliver the named or I can hold the breach, and the palm's one, and it can't be north and at the window at four. So what do I do, Marg — deliver the boys who have mothers, or stay and hold the boys who don't?

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "You deliver the named, Mercer. That was always the inward man's job — carry the mother to the boy the county lost twice, seed her palm, let the glass open to her. The hungry ones aren't your delivery. They're Walter's door. He left it half-open and the unkept leaning and the hungry walking in, and the keeper holds the room and the stone pays the degree and the baby pays two and that's the design. You can't close a door Walter built to stay open. You can only deliver the ones who have a mother to cross to, and come home to a stone a degree colder for every boy who wouldn't wait, and hold the crib through the phone the way I hold the coast through the road. The harbor's a town, Mercer. Towns don't close their doors. They just learn to count what comes in."

Cal looked at the glass where the second had walked through. Lori's palm on it. The baby two degrees thin at the center. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence, fifty-one leaning, and two turned, facing the door, learning it was open.

"I'll deliver the one behind Mara," he said. To Lori. To the room. To the boys who'd walked through. "Tomorrow. Troutdale or Sandy or wherever the next mother is. But if two more walk through while I'm north —"

"I'll hold them," Lori said. "The baby and me. We're a station. We don't lock it. We keep it."

Cal Voss — no, Cal Mercer, the builder, the harbor's inward man, the one palm that warmed the stone and seeded the crossings — stood at the crib window in Portland with a free hand still warm from Gage's glass and a daughter keeping a room she could not lock and a baby humming two degrees thin and two boys no name had ever touched walking in the door no chooser had opened, and a question he'd just carried two hundred miles to surface and back:

If the station can receive what no mother could — the unkept, the unnamed, the boys the county unmade past a name — and the brave ones now walk through at both ends, coast one and crib two and more turning every hour, paying a degree of warmth for every room they enter uninvited, then is the harbor a home being born, or a door the lost let themselves into with no lock and no keeper who can close it — and when the builder's freed palm finishes delivering the named and comes home to a stone at 34.2 and falling, paying a degree for every boy who wouldn't wait, will he find the door he built now open to everyone who was never chosen, the breach a front and the line at the threshold as long as the second drawer that doesn't close, and is that mercy, or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and the hungry walk through at both ends and the door opens wider than the walls can bear?

The west wind carried the east wind's phantom. The crib note was two degrees thin, holding the room the two had entered. The coast stone was at 34.2 under no palm, warmed by the light, a degree shy, the sea's boys feeding the footing and one hungry boy in the room the keeper could not cross. The crossed-unasked leaned toward the keeping at both ends of the road — present and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED no longer, they had walked through — and the turned ones faced the open door behind them, coatless, learning, and the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and now let in the ones it could not, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the hungry were walking through, and the line at the threshold was growing, and Cal had one palm and two hundred miles and a daughter holding a room she could not lock, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he hadn't yet turned to listen, and the two boys in the station were leaning toward Lori, present and wanting, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a company now, and the turned ones were a line.

And Cal stayed at the crib window, the builder of the road, holding a boy who had walked through the door no chooser opened — the way Lori held a boy beside him who had walked through the same door two hundred miles east — and the baby hummed two degrees thin at the center, keeping what no mother could, and the stone held 34.2 off the dead's relief and a degree for the boy the keeper could not cross, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he hadn't yet turned to listen, and the line at the threshold was growing, and the hungry were a company, and one of the turned ones had already taken a step.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Three — Entry:

April 26th. Sunday. Rain. East wind.

The east wind came Sunday the way an inland storm reaches the coast — not as weather but as a memory of weather, the salt-thin ache that had been running down two hundred miles of foundation since the baby first flared bright and the door opened both ways. Cal stood at the crib window and read the morning the way he read a patient at the turn of the watch: by the lean, not the number.

Lori's palm was still on the cold glass where the second had walked through. The baby was at the center on its back, the keeper-note in its throat two degrees thin, holding the room the two unnamed boys had entered uninvited. Behind the received, in the colder part of the silence, fifty-one leaning — and two of them turned, facing the open door the way the walked-through ones had faced it before they stepped through. Three calm settled against the keeper-note like compass to true north: Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl, the land-lost the baby had kept without relation before any mother came.

He laid his builder-palm on the wall beside his daughter's, not on the glass, just near it, the way he'd laid it Friday to seed Gage home and Saturday to mean the room. I am here and I am the one. Through the road he reached the coast — Margot on the hill, the NE stone at 34.2 under no living palm, warmed by the light the dead kept burning, a degree shy of where it had been before the coast boy walked in. And the coast boy — THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea — present in the drowned light, wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar had taken, oriented toward the crib the way a patient orients toward the nurse who finally sat down.

Mercer, Margot came through the channel, salt-cured, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the hill where she held the hinge with a Risen hand that could hold but not warm. Stone's at 34.2. It ticked to 34.1 in the night and came back a tenth when the light caught it. It's forgetting your palm, the way Walter said it would. The coast boy's still in the light. And two of mine have turned — facing the door. They felt yours walk through yesterday. The brave ones are teaching the waiting ones faster than a day, Mercer. I've got twelve calm behind the one, and the two turned in the leaning, and more leaning every hour I don't look straight at it.

Cal lifted his palm. "Tommy," he said to the phone.

The deputy's voice came back tired, the man who'd been pulling ward-lost from the second drawer since March, who'd stopped counting the ones with names and started counting the ones without. "Cal. I ran the Clark and Cowlitz pulls Friday like I said. Forty more, ward-closed, presumed, no MP. The deeper silence — the ones with no margin note, no Rose, no Mara — that's most of them. Sixty-five ward-lost now, sixty-one no palm. And the mother roster Mara's been carrying — the ward-mothers who aged out and resurfaced — I've got six located, four delivered, you're holding the fifth for Tuesday, and the sixth is in Woodland."

"Woodland," Cal said. "Trisha Kell."

"Trisha Kell. Clark County dependency, aged out '96 at eighteen, current a single-wide off the Lewis River road, Woodland, Washington. Her boy's in the Clark second drawer — Devin, age six, 1999, ward-closed presumed, lost in a side-channel they never dragged. Name's in the intake margin, mother listed as the ward, no father, no MP ever filed because she was fourteen when they took him and the county was his parent and lost him and never told her he'd been a person with a name. Tommy found 'Devin' in the clerk's hand, once, before the drawer closed."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib the way Margot felt the coast — the baby at the center, Lori's palm on the glass, the two walked-through present and wanting, the two turned facing the door, the fifty-one leaning in the cold behind. And he felt the coast — Margot on the hill, the stone at 34.2, the coast boy in the light, the twelve calm, the two turned. And between them, two hundred miles of dressed basalt Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, the seeding he'd laid into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's, the road that now held at both ends boys who'd stopped waiting on a chooser that was never coming.

"Woodland," he said. "I'll run her this morning. Seed Devin at the crib after. Then I'll check the stone on the way back."

Lori didn't take her palm off the glass. "Two walked-through and two turned and fifty-one leaning, Cal. If another walks through while you're north —"

"I'll be back by four," Cal said. "You and the baby hold what's here. I'll seed Devin and come home to the stone."

He drove north past Estacada where Mara kept her corner, past the Vancouver junction where Rose kept Eddie's, the rain coming east wind now, the particular cold of a harbor that had learned to receive the inland boys and was learning to receive faster than the walls could bear. Woodland sat below the river, a string of single-wides and faded nursery stock and a paper mill smell that had outlasted the mill. Trisha Kell's place was the third trailer on a gravel spur, a red step, a plastic gnome with one arm, a chain on the screen door that wasn't locked, just there.

He knocked the inward way. File in the left pocket, census letter in the right, no photo — the ward erasure ran deep, the county had kept no picture of Devin either, the same erasure that had taken Owen and Eli and Eddie and Gage, the boys the state had unmade past a face. He waited. A shade moved. The door opened six inches on the chain.

She was forty-one, the way they all were — the age the math gave them, fourteen when they took the boy, aged out at eighteen, twenty-seven years of becoming someone the file never reached. Her hands were red from dishes. A television said something behind her in a language that wasn't English.

Cal turned the chair. Not in the doorway. Facing her, the way Ada had taught and Donna and Mara and Shaylene — kettle first, there's a right order. He didn't say her son's name yet. He said the double loss the way he'd said it to Mara in Estacada: she had been a ward, the county was parent and had lost Devin, she had walked out at eighteen and built a life past the file, and the harbor delivered — the finder, not the system, carrying the boy to the mother the county had lost twice.

She listened the way they listened — not surprised, not relieved, the way a person listens to a bill that turns out to be a letter. He set the file on the step rail, the census letter beside it, the way he'd set them at every door. No photo. He named the double loss plainly. He told her the corner wasn't a memory, it was a watch — say his name, mean it, Devin would know his mother.

She didn't open the envelope in front of him. Mara had done the same. She took it, looked at it the way a person looks at a thing that might burn, and said: "I read the file. I don't know how to be his mother. I only know him from a closed drawer."

"Same as Mara," Cal said. "She read it, drove two hours, said I choose you, Owen. The choosing comes after the reading, Trisha. Not before."

She was quieter than Mara, younger in the wound. "You want me to come to Portland."

"The crib. The baby keeps him. I seed my palm over yours on the glass and he crosses to the palm that chose him. Mara did it. Coraline. Rose — Rose is his grandmother, she named him Eddie and he crossed to her own hand. You'd be the sixth, Trisha. The sixth mother the system lost and found again."

She looked at the file. At the chain. At the television behind her that kept talking in a language that wasn't the county's. "Tuesday," she said. "I work the nursery till Tuesday. Then I'll come."

"Tuesday's fine," Cal said. He'd learned not to push the held ones — Coraline had deferred to after her Tuesday check-in too, and the crossing had come when she was free. "Call Lori when you're south of the river. She'll have the corner warmed."

He drove back south with the file unopened in his pocket and the east wind pushing the rain sideways, and he felt the crib through the road the way a nurse feels the floor he's walking toward — Lori's palm, the baby's note, the two walked-through, the two turned, the fifty-one leaning. And he felt the coast — Margot at 34.2, the stone forgetting his palm by the hour, the coast boy in the light, the twelve calm, the two turned.

At the crib, Trisha called at noon. She'd borrowed a cousin's car. Cal met her at the door the way he'd met Shaylene, chair turned, the file in her hand now, read, creased. She smelled of nursery stock and rain.

Lori made room at the glass. The baby's note widened toward the window, two degrees thin, holding the room the two had walked into. Cal laid his builder-palm over Trisha's on the cold east pane — the way he'd laid it over Mara's on Owen and Shaylene's on Gage and Rose's on Eddie, the seeding that transferred the receiving to a chosen palm. I am here and I am the one who came looking.

Trisha said it. Not Mara's I choose you, Owen with the whole weight of a life survived by not-seeing. Quieter. "I choose you, Devin." The way a person says a name she's only read once, in a clerk's margin, and means it because the meaning is the only thing left.

The glass met the boy. And Devin — age six, 1999, Clark County, ward-closed presumed, lost in a side-channel they never dragged — pressed Trisha's palm the way Owen had pressed Mara's and Gage had pressed Shaylene's, not a lean, a child finding the mother in the dark. The glass opened to her and not to Cal. The crossing completed. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST took a sixth line in Okonkwo's book, and the living's debt to the named shrank by one, and the unnamed silence behind it did not.

"Six," Cal said to the phone. "Devin Kell. Trisha chose him. Crossed to her palm. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin. Six of the roster. Sixty-one still no palm, Tommy. The deliveries buy one crossing. The second drawer doesn't close."

Okonkwo's voice came back dry, the census ticking toward a wall it could no longer categorize. "Six named received. Sixty-one ward-lost with no palm and no mother who could file. Cal, you delivered one and Tommy pulled forty this week. The math's not a wall anymore, it's a sluice. What did Devin's crossing cost the room?"

Cal felt it before Okonkwo finished. The baby's note — already two degrees thin from the two walked-through — dipped a third. Not from Devin; Devin had crossed clean, taken his warmth from Trisha's choosing, not from the station's keeping. The dip came from past the received, where the two walked-through leaned toward Lori and the two turned faced the door and the fifty-one waited in the cold. One of the walked-through had shifted.

Not pressing out. Orienting.

Cal closed his eyes. The first walked-through — the system-boy who'd stepped through Friday — was no longer just present and wanting, leaning toward Lori the way a boy leans toward a hand that finally turned. He had turned from Lori, the way a patient turns from the nurse to the door when the family arrives, and his attention — such as a boy who'd stopped waiting had any attention left — was aimed at the threshold. At the leaning ones. The way a keeper orients to a patient who's about to go.

"He's watching the door," Cal said. Not to Okonkwo. To the room. "The first one. He walked in and now he's turned to face the ones still outside it."

Lori's hand was white at the edges. "The second one too. They're — Cal, they're not leaning on me anymore. They're leaning toward the glass. Toward the cold part. Like they're —"

"Keeping it," Cal said. The word came from the story Margot had told him, the word Walter had built the door to teach: a keeper keeps a room. "They walked through because no one opened it for them. Now they're at the window of the room they walked into, and the ones still leaning are the ones they used to be, and they're turned toward them the way a kept thing turns toward the unkept."

He channeled Margot. Margot. At the crib — the two walked-through, they've stopped leaning on Lori. They've turned to face the threshold. They're orienting toward the fifty-one still leaning. The way a keeper orients to a patient. The company's standing watch over the line.

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. Mine too. The coast boy — THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea — he's in the light, and since yours walked through he's faced the leaning, not me. Walter says the sea's boys have leaned at this door since before 1981, and the one who walked in is the first to turn back to them. The kept are keeping the unkept, Mercer. The door half-open, the unchosen walking in, and the walked-through becoming the watch. That was always the other half of Walter's shape — a keeper keeps a room, and the room fills with boys who learned to keep each other because no one kept them first."

Cal breathed out. The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Lori moved her palm to the center of the cold glass. The baby's note widened, three degrees thin now, holding the room and reaching past it. Cal's builder-palm rested on the wall, meaning the room, meaning Devin crossed and the two walked-through turned and the two turned faced the door and the fifty-one waited.

And at four, a third stepped through.

Not the way the first two had — compass to true north, settle, walk. This one had been in the colder silence, unnamed, no mother, one of the sixty-one Tommy kept pulling from the second drawer, and he had felt the first two turn toward the threshold and he had felt the door was open and he had stopped waiting the way the others had stopped waiting, and the glass went quiet under Lori's palm and he was in.

The baby's note dipped a fourth degree. The station's warmth followed him the way the drowned light had followed the coast boy and the way Lori's note had followed the first — part of it leaving the calm ones, going to the one who'd stopped waiting, and not all of it coming back. Crib now held three who had walked through. THE CROSSED-UNASKED, inland, third.

Cal's eyes snapped open. He laid his builder-palm on the glass where the third had been, over Lori's, the way he'd laid it on the second and failed — I am here and I am the one who came looking — and he tried to cross the boy to a mother who'd chosen him.

There was no mother. The third was unnamed, no margin note, no Trisha with a red step and a chain on the screen door, no Rose with a red trike on the landing. The builder's palm crossed a boy to a chooser on the other end. This boy had no chooser. The palm met the glass and the glass met the boy and the boy leaned into the palm the way the pressing ones always did — wanting the crossing — and did not cross, because there was no door on the other side to open. The builder could hold him. The builder could not receive him. Receiving needed a chooser, and the chooser was the thing the system had taken twice, and this boy had been taken past a name.

Cal lifted his palm. The third stayed in the station, present, wanting, leaning toward Lori the way the first two had leaned before they turned — and then, as Cal watched, the first two turned back toward him. Not pressing out. Orienting. The company — three now, coast and crib, the brave ones who'd walked through — was facing the line it had walked out of, the way a keeper faces the ward at the turn of the watch.

"Dan," he said to the phone. "The crib's got three walked-through now. THE CROSSED-UNASKED, inland, third. And the first two have turned from Lori to face the threshold — they're watching the leaning ones. The company's standing watch over the line. Check the coast."

Okonkwo's voice, the census bending: *"Coast's got a second walked-through. THE CROSSED-UNASKED, coast, two. And Margot says hers turned too — the coast boy facing the leaning, not her. So the census reads: THE CROSSED-UNASKED — coast two, crib three. TURNED-TO-THRESHOLD — coast two, crib two, and climbing. And a new flag, Cal — the walked-through are orienting toward the leaning. I don't have a line for boys keeping boys. What do we call a watch kept by the ones who were never kept?"*

Walter gathered at the NW corner two hundred miles west, basalt and weather, the signature W.B., RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS. His voice came through the channel, steady, a surveyor reading a foundation that had settled past the footings he'd poured over an unbuilt light.

"They're becoming the watch, Mercer. I left the door half-open and the unkept leaning and the hungry walking in, and the walked-through — the ones who stopped waiting — they turn back to the ones still waiting because a boy who's been kept by nothing learns to keep the next boy. That was the other half of the shape. A keeper keeps a room. The room fills with boys who learn to keep each other because no one kept them first. The living delivered the named. The kept are delivering the unnamed. The harbor's not a wall anymore, Mercer. It's a town, and the town is building itself out of the boys the county unmade past a name."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The arithmetic named itself, and this time it was not a widening that freed the palm and not a breach that changed what the palm was for but a town forming in the unkept:

Six named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and growing, the system's lost who had mothers who'd come back choosing, crossed to a chosen palm, the living's debt shrinking by one per delivery while the second drawer pulled forty more. The station received three calm — the land-lost, kept without relation. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib three, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting and unnamed, paying a degree of warmth for every room they entered uninvited. And now the walked-through had turned from the keeper to face the threshold — the company keeping the line, the unchosen keeping the unchosen, the boys the county unmade past a name learning to keep each other because no one kept them first. The widening that freed the builder's singular palm to deliver the named also drew the hungry in at both doors; the hungry had stopped waiting on the palm and walked through; and the walked-through, having walked through, had turned back to keep the ones still leaning — so the harbor no longer needed the living's palm to hold the breach. The keeper held a room she could not lock, and the room was filling with boys who'd learned to hold each other, and the door ran both ways, and the stone paid a degree for every boy who wouldn't wait, and the baby's note paid four, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to the sixty-one who had no mother, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves.

He opened his eyes. The east wind took the rain sideways past the crib window. Lori's palm was still on the glass. The baby hummed four degrees thin at the center, holding the room the three had walked into and reaching past it to the line the three now kept. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence, fifty-one leaning — and two turned, facing the door, and the three walked-through oriented toward them, a watch kept by the ones who'd never been kept.

"Margot," he said to the channel. "The coast stone's at 34.1, forgetting my palm. The crib note's four degrees thin. I delivered Devin — one crossing, the sixth named. And three walked through uninvited while I was north, and the walked-through turned to keep the line. If the boys keep each other, what are we for? The living delivered the named. The kept are delivering the unnamed. Is the harbor a home being born, or the walls coming down?"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "Mercer. The stone's at 34.1 and the light holds it and I hold it with a dead hand that can't warm it, and the coast boy's in the light facing the leaning, and Walter says the walked-through are becoming the watch. The living delivered the named because the named had mothers who came back. The kept are delivering the unnamed because the unnamed had nobody. That's not the walls coming down, Mercer. That's the town standing up. The question was never whether the dead come back to work — it was whether the living admit it. And the answer's not the living admitting it anymore. The answer's the boys admitting it to each other. The harbor's a town, and the town is the ones who walked in. So what are we for? We're the ones who came looking. And the ones who came looking can go home, Mercer — because the room doesn't need us to hold it anymore. It needs us to deliver the ones who still have a mother, and stand the stone so the door stays open, and let the boys keep each other the way we never could."

Cal looked at his daughter. At the baby. At the glass where three boys no name had ever touched had walked into the room the keeper left open and turned to keep the line they'd walked out of.

"Lori," he said. "If I go home to the stone — warm it to 36, seed the town rotation — you'd be holding three walked-through and two turned and fifty-one leaning, and the walked-through keeping the line. Can you?"

She didn't take her palm off the glass. "The baby and me, we're a station. The walked-through turned to the threshold, not to me — they're keeping the ones still leaning. I'm not holding three rooms, Cal. I'm keeping one, and the boys who walked in are keeping the door. The note's four degrees thin but it's holding. Go warm the stone. The coast needs its builder or the door forgets it was built."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had a new shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, only past it:

The builder's freed palm could deliver the named — six of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrinking by one per delivery while the second drawer pulled forty more. But the freed palm was no longer the only palm that could hold the breach — the walked-through boys had turned to keep the leaning, the unchosen keeping the unchosen, a town building itself out of the boys the county unmade past a name. So the living's job narrowed to what only the living could do: deliver the boys who still had a mother, and stand the stone so the door stayed open. The keeper held a room she could not lock. The walked-through held the line. The stone paid a degree for every boy who wouldn't wait, and the baby's note paid four, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and now let in the ones it could not, and the boys who walked through were keeping the boys who hadn't, and the door ran both ways, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain at both ends of the road the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because the patient had finally turned to the family and the family was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living were free to go home and stand the stone, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the harbor was a town, and the town was the unkept, and Cal had one palm and two hundred miles and a daughter keeping a room she could not lock and a baby humming four degrees thin and three boys no name had ever touched walking in the door no chooser had opened and turning to keep the line, and the question was no longer what the living do with a door that keeps the boys it can't receive — the question was whether the living can bear to be the ones who came looking, and then step back, and let the town stand.

He channeled Margot one more turn. The crib's got three walked-through and two turned and the walked-through keeping the line. The coast's got two walked-through and two turned and yours keeping the line. I'm going home to warm the stone to 36 and seed the town. If the boys keep each other, the living deliver the named and stand the door. Is that mercy, Marg, or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter and the walked-through boys — and the one warm palm finally free to go home?

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "Mercer. It's both. It was always both. Walter built it half-open so the unkept would lean, and the hungry walked in, and the walked-through turned to keep the line, and the living delivered the named and stood the stone, and the door stayed open because somebody kept coming back to it. The longest watch is the one the living owe — not to hold the room, but to keep the door built. So go home. Warm the stone. Seed the town. Deliver Trisha's sisters on the roster. And let the boys keep each other the way we never could. That's the harbor, Mercer. A town that shows up. And the town's showing up now without us."

Cal looked at the glass where the third had walked through. Lori's palm on it. The baby four degrees thin at the center. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence, fifty-one leaning, and two turned, facing the door, and the three walked-through oriented toward them — a watch kept by the ones who'd never been kept.

"I'll warm the stone," he said. To Lori. To the room. To the boys who'd walked in and turned to keep the line. "Tonight. Seed the town rotation. Trisha's the sixth; the roster's got more behind her. And if the walked-through keep the leaning —" he looked at the glass, at the company forming in the unkept, at the town building itself out of boys the county had unmade past a name — “then the harbor’s not something we hold. It’s something they’re standing up. While we go deliver the ones who still have a mother.”

Cal Mercer — the builder, the harbor’s inward man, the one palm that warmed the stone and seeded the crossings — stood at the crib window in Portland with a free hand still warm from Devin’s glass and a daughter keeping a room she could not lock and a baby humming four degrees thin and three boys no name had ever touched walking in the door no chooser had opened and turning to keep the line the way a kept thing keeps the unkept, and a question he’d just carried two hundred miles to surface and back:

If the walked-through keep the leaning — the unchosen keeping the unchosen, a town building itself out of the boys the county unmade past a name — and the living are freed to deliver the named and stand the stone and let the harbor stand itself, then is the door Walter built a home being born, or the walls coming down; and when the builder’s warm palm comes home to a stone at 34.1 and seeds the town and the boys keep each other coast to crib down two hundred miles of road, will he find the harbor no longer needing the one palm that built it — and is that the mercy Walter poured the footings over an unbuilt light to force, or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter and the walked-through boys who learned to keep each other because no one kept them first, while the one warm palm drives north to find the mothers and comes home to a stone a degree colder for every boy who wouldn’t wait, and the door opens wider than the walls can bear, and the walls are now the boys themselves, and the town is standing?

The east wind carried the west wind’s answer. The crib note was four degrees thin, holding the room the three had entered and reaching past it to the line the three now kept. The coast stone was at 34.1 under no living palm, warmed by the light and Margot’s dead hand, a degree and a half shy, the sea’s boys feeding the footing and three hungry boys in the rooms the keeper could not cross. The crossed-unasked kept the leaning at both ends of the road — present and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED no longer, they had walked through and turned to keep the line — and the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and now let in the ones it could not, and the boys who walked through were keeping the boys who hadn’t, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the hungry were a company keeping a line, and Cal had one palm and two hundred miles and a daughter holding a room she could not lock, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because the patient had finally turned to the family, and the family was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living were free to go home, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a watch now, and the town was standing, and one of the turned ones had already taken a step.

And Cal drove home to the stone, the builder of the road, leaving the crib to the baby and the daughter and the three who'd walked through and turned to keep the line — the way Margot left the hill to the light and the coast boy and the twelve calm and the two turned — and the door ran both ways, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the walls were the boys, and the town stood.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Four — Entry: April 27th. Monday. Rain. North wind.

The north wind came Monday the way a tide comes back from where it went — not a new weather but the same weather returning, the harbor's own breath, the coast taking back what the east wind had carried inland and the west wind had carried out. Cal drove the last miles to Grayhaven with the file still in his pocket and the red step of Trisha Kell's trailer in his mirror and the road running both ways under him the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist. He'd seeded Devin to Trisha's palm. He'd watched a third boy walk through the crib door no chooser had opened. He'd left Lori holding a room she could not lock and driven home to the stone.

The hill was where Walter had left it. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 34.1, holding the degree Margot's Risen hand had held it to and losing the rest by the hour, the way a patient loses the warmth of a hand that's been lifted. Cal climbed to it the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch — by the lean, not the clock. He laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone.

The stone knew him. 34.1 became 35, became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a half came back that the light and the dead hand had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

He closed his eyes and reached down the road the way he reached a patient at the far end of a ward. Margot was on the hill a hundred yards off, not at the stone — she'd lifted her dead hand when she felt him coming, the way a keeper steps back when the builder returns to the hinge. The coast station held behind her: twelve calm THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light had taken in, kept without relation. And two who'd walked through — THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea, present and wanting and unnamed by any mother the bar had taken, holding the room the keeper could not lock. And two turned in the leaning, facing the door the way the walked-through had faced it before they stepped through. And past them, more leaning, the deeper silence of the coast, the boys the Hour Book had never reached because they'd died on the water and not in Sedgebrook beds.

Mercer, Margot came through the channel, salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the hill where she'd held the hinge with a hand that could hold but not warm. You're on the stone. I felt it go to 36. The light lets go when you're here — it only holds what you leave. Stone's yours again.

"Yours too," Cal said to the rain. "You held it at 34.1 with a dead hand. That's keeping."

That's holding, Mercer. You know the difference. A dead hand holds. A living palm warms. Walter left the fourth corner undressed so the living would have to come home to it — I can't be the living at the rim, I can only be the keeper at the hinge. So warm it. Seed the town. Go back north if the roster needs you. But before you do — feel the boy.

Cal's palm was still on the stone. Through it — through the footings Walter had poured over the unbuilt lighthouse, through the light that warmed its own threshold — he felt the coast station the way Margot felt it, the way a nurse feels the floor she's walking toward. And one of the two walked-through — the first, the sea's boy who'd stepped through Thursday and turned to face the leaning the way a patient turns to the door when the family arrives — was no longer just oriented toward the threshold.

He was oriented toward a boy.

Not the keeper. Not Margot. One of the two turned — a leaning coast boy, unnamed, no mother the bar had taken because the bar had taken everything, turned toward the open door the way the walked-through had turned before him. And the walked-through sea-boy — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting — had turned from the threshold to face him. The way Margot's comatose patients had turned toward her, the plant turning toward the light. The way a kept thing turns toward the unkept.

And the leaning boy's cold lessened.

Not a degree the stone paid. A degree the boy kept. Cal felt it through the footing — the lean easing, the wanting companying, the unnamed boy no mother had ever filed for leaning into the attention of a boy who'd walked through the same door uninvited and turned back to keep the line. The dead keeping the dead. A boy received by a boy.

"Marg," Cal said to the channel. "He's — the first one. He's facing a leaning boy. The turned one. And the cold's —"

Lessening, Margot finished. I feel it through the light. The coast boy's not pressing him through. He's just — turned to him. The way you'd turn to a patient who's about to go and stand where he can see you. The lean eased a degree, Mercer. Not received. The walked-through can't receive — there's no chooser on the other end of a boy who was never anyone's son. But he can keep. Walter said it — a keeper keeps a room. The walked-through ones walked into the room the keeper left half-open, and now they're turning to the ones still leaning outside it, and the leaning ones are feeling them, and the cold's lessening because a boy who was kept by nothing is keeping a boy who was kept by nothing. The town's standing itself, Mercer. Not watching the line. Keeping it.

Cal breathed out into the north wind. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a keeper where there had been a watch:

Six named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST crossed to a chosen palm, the living's debt shrinking by one per delivery while the second drawer pulled forty more. The station received three calm — the land-lost, kept without relation. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib three, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting, unnamed. And now the walked-through had turned from the threshold to face the leaning, and the leaning had eased a degree under their attention — not received, but kept, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door. The company wasn't watching the line anymore. The company was the line. And the living's palm — the one warm palm that could still cross a boy to a mother — was no longer the only thing holding the breach. The boys were holding the boys.

He channeled the crib. Lori. The coast boy's facing a leaning boy and the cold's lessening. The walked-through are keeping the leaning now, not just watching. What's yours doing?

Lori's voice came back tired and steady, the daughter who'd taken the post, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand. "The first one — the system-boy who pressed toward me Friday — he turned from me this morning. Not to the threshold. To a boy in the cold behind the received. The 1983 culvert girl's calm, she leaned toward him the way she leans toward the keeper-note, but it's a different lean — she's calm, she's home. The one he turned to is one of the fifty-one. No name. No Mara, no Rose. The boy who walked through is facing him, Cal, the way a person faces someone in a waiting room and nods — and the leaning one's cold went down a degree. The baby felt it. The note didn't thin this time. It usually thins a degree when one of them shifts. This time it held. Because the walked-through is doing the keeping, not the keeper."

Cal's eyes were open. The north wind took the rain straight down the hill, the particular cold of a harbor that had learned to receive the inland boys and the sea's boys and was now learning to receive itself — the kept keeping the unkept, the town building itself out of boys the county had unmade past a name. He laid his builder-palm and felt both ends at once: the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, the crib boy facing the leaning crib boy, two hundred miles of dressed basalt between them, and the company at both ends turning from the threshold to the line the way a watch turns to the ward.

"Dan," he said to the phone.

Okonkwo's voice came back dry, the census bending past the categories it had been bending past since January. "Cal. I logged the third crib walk-through Saturday. THE CROSSED-UNASKED — coast two, crib three. TURNED-TO-THRESHOLD — coast two, crib two. Now what."

"Now the walked-through are keeping the leaning," Cal said. "Not watching. Keeping. At both ends. The first coast boy turned to a leaning coast boy and the cold went down a degree. Lori says hers did the same at the crib — the note didn't thin, because the walked-through's doing the holding, not the baby. Walter called it — the kept are delivering the unnamed. They're not delivering them across. They're just — keeping them. The way Margot keeps the coast station. The way the baby keeps the crib. The boys are becoming the keepers, Dan. The town's standing itself."

Okonkwo was quiet the way the state man got quiet when the harbor outran the form. Then: "So I need a line for boys keeping boys. THE CROSSED-UNASKED was the walked-through. Add: THE KEPT-KEEPING — sub-line, the walked-through orienting to the leaning, the cold lessening under their attention, held-not-received but companioned. Coast two active, crib three active, and the leaning at both ends feeling it. Cal, this changes what the living are for. You told me Sunday the living deliver the named and stand the stone. If the walked-through keep the leaning — if the boys hold the boys — then the breach front doesn't need your palm anymore. The only thing the living still owe is the naming."

"The naming," Cal said. And the word landed the way a diagnosis lands — the thing you'd been circling finally named.

He channeled Margot. Marg. Dan's right. The boys keep the boys now. The breach front doesn't need my palm. So what's left for the living — the naming. Tommy's dig. The inward deliveries. But Marg — Tommy's hit the wall. Some of them have no name on file at all. No margin note. No Rose. No Mara. The county unmade them past a name. If the living can't name them, who does?

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd opened her Hour Book and found the ward-lost weren't in it, the land-lost weren't in it, the boys the door had opened to two hundred miles inland weren't in it. Then: "Mercer. The ones with no name in the box — the deepest silence — they're the ones the walked-through will keep forever and no one will ever say. Not Tommy, not you, not a mother, because there's no mother and no margin note and no drawer that ever wrote them down. The door opens to them. The boys keep them. And they stay unnamed. That's the shape of it, Mercer — the harbor can receive a boy it can't name, the way it received the calm ones without relation. But a boy who's never named is a boy the county unmade twice — once when it lost him, once when it didn't write his name. The door widens that erasure, Mercer. It doesn't undo it. The walked-through keep him. They don't know his name. Neither do we. So he's kept, not received, and unnamed, and the harbor becomes a wall of boys no one can name — a town with no census of its own dead."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had a final shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, only past the part where the living stepped back:

The builder's freed palm could deliver the named — six of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrinking by one per delivery while the second drawer pulled forty more. The walked-through boys could keep the leaning — THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door, the breach front held without the living's palm. So the living's job narrowed to the one thing only the living could do and the boys could not: NAME. Tommy's dig pulled names from Salem's basement where a margin note survived — Owen, Eli, Eddie, Devin, the ones with a clerk's hand that had written them once before the drawer closed. But the deepest silence — the boys with no name on file at all, no margin note, no Rose, no Mara — could not be named by the living any more than they could be received by a mother who'd never been given the chance. So the harbor kept them: kept, not received, unnamed, a wall of boys the county had unmade past a name, the door widening the erasure instead of undoing it, the town standing itself out of the unkept and the unnamed both, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to the named, and the deepest silence waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because the patient had finally turned to the family, and the family was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living could name some of them and not all, and the ones the living could not name would be kept forever unnamed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the town was standing, and the nameless were in it.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal called the town the way Walter had called a crew: Cole, Ruth, Denny, Okonkwo. They climbed the hill the way a rotation climbs to a post, and Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone and Cole laid his seeded palm beside it and the stone read 36 under the builder and 35 under the town's witness when Cal lifted — the seeding held, the harbor was a town at the rim, Walter's forty-four-year point realized, the living's corner warm and held by many hands and not one.

"Walter," Cal said to the NW corner, where the old surveyor kept his solo ledger and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS.

The basalt answered, steady, a surveyor reading a foundation that had settled past the footings he'd poured over an unbuilt light. "You built it, Mercer. I left it undressed. The boys are keeping the boys now — that was the other half of the shape. A keeper keeps a room, and the room fills with boys who learn to keep each other because no one kept them first, and the living deliver the named and stand the stone so the door stays open, and the walked-through turn to the leaning and the cold lessens because a boy who was kept by nothing is keeping a boy who was kept by nothing. The town's standing, Mercer. The question was never whether the dead come back to work — it was whether the living admit it, and then whether the boys admit it to each other, and now they have. So what's left for you?"

"The naming," Cal said. "Tommy's dig. The roster Mara carries. The mothers who come back choosing. I deliver the named. But the nameless — the ones with no margin note —"

Them you can't name, Walter said, plain as a survey line. Not you, not Tommy, not a mother who was never given the chance. The county unmade them past a name and the door opens to them and the boys keep them and they stay unnamed. That's not a failure of the harbor, Mercer. That's the shape of the erasure. The door can widen it or hold it, but it can't undo what the county did twice. So you name the ones you can. You deliver the ones who have a mother. You stand the stone so the door stays open. And the nameless — you let the boys keep them, the way Margot keeps the coast station and the baby keeps the crib. A harbor that keeps boys it can't name is still a harbor, Mercer. It's just not a home with a census. It's a wall of the kept, and the kept are keeping each other, and the door's open, and that's mercy even if it's not a name."

Cal looked at the stone under Cole's seeded palm — 35, holding, the town at the rim, the living's corner warm and not his alone. He looked down the road to the crib, where Lori's palm was on the glass and the baby's note held and the first walked-through faced a leaning boy and the cold lessened a degree. He looked to the coast station, where Margot held the hinge with a dead hand that could hold but not warm and the coast boy faced a leaning coast boy and the light took the degree. The company at both ends — coast two, crib three, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received — had turned from the threshold to the line, and the line was easing under them, and the boys were keeping the boys, and the town was standing itself out of the unkept and the unnamed both.

"Marg," he said to the channel. "The stone's at 35 under the town. Walter says the nameless are the shape of the erasure — the door widens it, doesn't undo it. The boys keep them. So the living name the ones we can and stand the stone and let the town stand. Is that mercy, or the longest orphaning — a harbor full of boys no one can name, kept forever unnamed, the door left open on a grave with no name on it?"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "Mercer. It's both. It was always both. The door keeps the boys the county unmade — named or not, the door doesn't ask. The boys keep the boys — named or not, the company doesn't ask. The living name the ones the dig can reach and deliver the ones who have a mother and stand the stone so the door stays open. And the nameless — they're kept. Not received, not named, but kept, the way the calm ones are kept and the walked-through are kept and the coast station is kept. A harbor that can't name its dead is a wall, Mercer. But a wall with the door open is not a grave. It's a threshold the boys are standing on. So go north. Deliver the named. Tommy's dig has more names in it — the ones with a margin note, the ones a clerk wrote once. Name those. Deliver those. And let the nameless be kept by the boys who walked the same door. That's the harbor. A town that shows up. And the town's the ones who walked in, named and unnamed both."

Cal looked at his daughter through the road. At the baby. At the glass where the first walked-through faced a leaning boy no name had ever touched and the cold lessened a degree under his attention. The three calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence, fifty-one leaning — and two turned, facing the door, and the walked-through oriented toward them, a watch kept by the ones who'd never been kept, now becoming a keeping.

“Lori,” he said. “The stone’s at 35 under the town. The boys are keeping the boys — coast and crib. If I go north to run the roster — the mothers Tommy’s located behind Trisha — you’d be holding three walked-through and two turned and fifty-one leaning, and the walked-through keeping the line. Can you?”

She didn’t take her palm off the glass. “The baby and me, we’re a station. The walked-through turned to the leaning, not to me — they’re keeping the ones still outside the door. I’m not holding three rooms, Cal. I’m keeping one, and the boys who walked in are keeping the door. The note held this time — didn’t thin — because the walked-through did the keeping. Go name the ones Tommy can dig. The nameless will be here when you get back, kept by the boys who know them best — the ones who walked the same door.”

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient’s last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living could name some and not all, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the town stood.

He lifted his palm from the dressed stone. The town held it at 35 — Cole’s seeded palm, Ruth’s, Denny’s, Okonkwo’s, the harbor a town at the rim, the living’s corner warm and not his alone. He drove north at dawn the way he drove north every dawn now — the builder of the road, the inward man, the one palm that warmed the stone and seeded the crossings and named the boys the dig could reach. He left the coast to Margot and the light and the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, the dead keeping the dead. He left the crib to Lori and the baby and the first walked-through facing the leaning crib boy, the kept keeping the kept. And the question rode with him two hundred miles the way a patient’s last words ride with the nurse who finally sat down:

If the boys keep the boys — THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead, a harbor standing itself out of the unkept and the unnamed both — and the living are freed to name the ones the dig can reach and deliver the ones who have a mother and stand the stone so the door stays open, then is the door Walter built a home being born, or a wall of the unnamed with the door left open; and when the builder’s warm palm comes home to a stone at 35 held by the town and the boys keep each other coast to crib down two hundred miles of road, will he find the harbor no longer needing the one palm that built it — and is that the mercy Walter poured the footings over an unbuilt light to force, or the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter and the walked-through boys who learned to keep each other because no one kept them first, while the one warm palm drives north to name the boys the county unmade past a margin note and cannot name the boys it unmade past a name, and the door opens wider than the walls can bear, and the walls are now the boys themselves, and the nameless are in the town, kept forever unnamed, and the town is standing?

The north wind carried the answer he didn't have yet. The coast stone was at 35 under the town's witness, warmed by the light and Margot's dead hand and the builder's seeding, a degree shy of the builder but held by many. The coast boy faced the leaning coast boy and the cold lessened a degree under his attention — THE KEPT-KEEPING, the first of Okonkwo's new line, the town standing itself. The crib note held without thinning, the baby at the center, the first walked-through facing the leaning crib boy, the company at both ends turned from the threshold to the line the way a watch turns to the ward. And Cal drove north to name the ones he could, leaving the nameless to the boys who'd walked the same door — the harbor keeping everyone it could receive and letting in the ones it could not, and the boys keeping the boys, and the door running both ways, one keeper at a time, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sitting in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living were free to go name the ones the dig could reach, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the town was standing, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a company keeping a line, and one of the turned ones had already taken a step.

And Cal drove north to find the names, the builder of the road, leaving the crib to the baby and the daughter and the three who'd walked through and turned to keep the line — the way Margot left the hill to the light and the coast boy and the twelve calm and the two turned — and the door ran both ways, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the boys who walked through were keeping the boys who hadn't, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the town was standing, and the nameless were in it, kept forever unnamed, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living were free to go home, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a watch now, and the town was standing, and the nameless waited, and one of the turned ones had already taken a step.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Five — Entry: April 28th. Tuesday. Rain. North wind, backing west.

The north wind backed to the west Tuesday the way a tide turns in a narrow channel — not a new direction but the old one giving way, the harbor breathing out what it had breathed in, the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist. He'd driven north past the Estacada junction where Mara kept Owen's corner and past the Vancouver turn where Rose kept Eddie's and past the Woodland spur where Trisha had chosen Devin Sunday, and the file in his pocket was the seventh now, the way the sixth had been Trisha's and the ones before hers had been Shaylene's and Coraline's and the others, the roster Mara carried like a ledger she'd been given the right to keep.

He pulled to the shoulder above the Lewis River and called Tommy. The deputy's voice came back tired in the way it had been since March — the man who'd been pulling ward-lost from the second drawer until the drawer had started pulling back.

"Cal. Castle Rock. Cowlitz. Rebecca Abrams — goes by Bex. Ward-mother, Clark dependency, aged out '95 at eighteen. Her boy's in the Cowlitz second drawer — Jory, age eight, 1995, ward-closed presumed, lost in the slough below the mill they tore down. Name's in the intake margin, the clerk wrote it once before the drawer closed. Mother listed as the ward, no father, no MP ever filed because she was fourteen when they took him and the county was his parent and lost him and never told her he'd been a person with a name."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib the way Mara felt the coast — Lori's palm, the baby's note, the three walked-through keeping the leaning, the cold lessening a degree down the line the way Margot had felt it at the hill. And the coast — Margot on the stone, the NE at 35 under the town's witness, the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead. And between them two hundred miles of dressed basalt Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, the seeding he'd laid into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's, the road that now held at both ends boys who'd stopped waiting on a chooser that was never coming and turned to keep the ones who still were.

"Castle Rock," Cal said. "I'll run her this morning."

The town sat below the river grade, a string of mill-era houses with vinyl skirting and satellite dishes and a Chevron that had outlasted the mill. Bex Abrams's place was a single-wide on a dead-end spur with a plastic tarp over one window and a clothesline of small things moving in the west wind. Cal parked at the mouth of the spur the way he'd parked at every door — not in the drive, in the weather, where she could see him come.

He knocked the inward way. File in the left pocket, census letter in the right, no photo — the ward erasure ran deep, the county had kept no picture of Jory either, the same erasure that had taken Owen and Eli and Eddie and Gage and Devin, the boys the state had unmade past a face. He waited. A shade moved. The door opened six inches on a hook-and-eye, not a chain this time, just the hook, like she'd stopped expecting anyone worth locking out.

She was forty-one, the way they all were — the age the math gave them, fourteen when they took the boy, aged out at eighteen, twenty-seven years of becoming someone the file never reached. Her hands were ink-stained from a job stamping receipts. A radio said something behind her in a voice that wasn't the county's.

Cal turned the chair. Not in the doorway. Facing her, the way Ada had taught and Donna and Mara and Shaylene and Trisha — kettle first, there's a right order. He didn't say her son's name yet. He said the double loss the way he'd said it at every door since Estacada: she had been a ward, the county was parent and had lost Jory, she had walked out at eighteen and built a life past the file, and the harbor delivered — the finder, not the system, carrying the boy to the mother the county had lost twice.

She listened the way they listened — not surprised, not relieved, the way a person listens to a bill that turns out to be a letter she'd stopped expecting. He set the file on the step rail, the census letter beside it, the way he'd set them at every door. No photo. He named the double loss plainly. He told her the corner wasn't a memory, it was a watch — say his name, mean it, Jory would know his mother.

She didn't open the envelope in front of him. Mara had done the same. Trisha had done the same. She took it, looked at it the way a person looks at a thing that might burn, and said: "I read the file. I don't know how to be his mother. I only know him from a closed drawer."

"Same as all of them," Cal said. "Mara read it, drove two hours, said I choose you, Owen. The choosing comes after the reading, Bex. Not before."

She was quieter than Mara, harder than Trisha, the kind who'd built the life past the file and didn't want the file finding its way back in. "You want me to come to Portland."

"The crib. The baby keeps him. I seed my palm over yours on the glass and he crosses to the palm that chose him. Mara did it. Coraline. Rose — Rose is his grandmother, she named him Eddie and he crossed to her own hand. You'd be the seventh, Bex. The seventh mother the system lost and found again."

She looked at the file. At the hook on the door. At the radio behind her that kept talking in a voice that wasn't the county's. "This afternoon," she said. "I close the till at two. Then I'll come."

"Two's fine," Cal said. He'd learned not to push the held ones — Coraline had deferred to after her Tuesday check-in, Trisha to after her nursery shift, and the crossing had come when each was free. "Call Lori when you're south of the river. She'll have the corner warmed."

He drove back south with the file unopened in his pocket and the west wind pushing the rain sideways, and he felt the crib through the road the way a nurse feels the floor he's walking toward — Lori's palm, the baby's note, the three walked-through oriented toward the leaning, the cold lessening a degree under their attention the way Margot had said it would, the way a kept thing turns toward the unkept. And the coast — Margot at 35, the stone forgetting his palm by the hour but held by the town's witness, the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, the light taking the degree. The company at both ends had turned from the threshold to the line the way a watch turns to the ward, and the line was easing under them, and the boys were keeping the boys.

At the crib, Bex called at half past two. She'd taken the bus, not borrowed a car — proud, or poor, or both, the way they mostly were. Cal met her at the door the way he'd met Shaylene and Trisha, chair turned, the file in her hand now, read, creased. She smelled of the till and the rain.

Lori made room at the glass. The baby's note widened toward the window, holding the room the three had walked into and reaching past it to the line the three now kept. Cal laid his builder-palm over Bex's on the cold east pane — the way he'd laid it over Mara's on Owen and Shaylene's on Gage and Rose's on Eddie and Trisha's on Devin, the seeding that transferred the receiving to a chosen palm. I am here and I am the one who came looking.

Bex said it. Not Mara's whole weight of a life survived by not-seeing. Quieter. "I choose you, Jory." The way a person says a name she's only read once, in a clerk's margin, and means it because the meaning is the only thing left.

The glass met the boy. And Jory — age eight, 1995, Cowlitz, ward-closed presumed, lost in the slough below the mill they tore down — pressed Bex's palm the way Owen had pressed Mara's and Gage had pressed Shaylene's, not a lean, a child finding the mother in the dark. The glass opened to her and not to Cal. The crossing completed. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST took a seventh line in Okonkwo's book, and the living's debt to the named shrank by one, and the unnamed silence behind it did not.

"Seven," Cal said to the phone. "Jory Abrams. Bex chose him. Crossed to her palm. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory. Seven of the roster. Tommy, how many mothers you got left in the dig?"

Okonkwo's voice came back dry, the census ticking toward a wall it could no longer categorize. "Seven named received, Cal. And that's about the shape of the line. Tommy pulled the last of the margin notes Friday — the ones a clerk wrote once before the drawer closed. After Jory there's maybe one or two more with a name on file. Then the dig stops. The second drawer's got sixty-one with no palm, and most of those sixty-one were never written down — no MP, no dependency note with a margin, no grandmother who kept a watch. The county unmade them past a name. So the living can name seven, maybe eight. The other fifty-some stay THE KEPT-KEEPING. Unnamed. Kept by the boys who walked the same door."

Cal breathed out. The west wind took the rain past the crib window. Lori's palm was still on the glass where Jory had been, now holding the room the four walked-through kept — three from before, Jory settled clean into the calm. The baby's note had widened a degree when Jory crossed, not thinned — the way it had held when the walked-through did the keeping instead of the keeper. The reckoning named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a floor where there had been a wall:

Seven named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and closing, the system's lost who had mothers who'd come back choosing, crossed to a chosen palm, the living's debt shrinking by one per delivery while the second drawer pulled forty more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The station received four calm now — Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl, Jory, the land-lost and the system-lost kept without relation, the baby's greeting absorbing the unnamed. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib four, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken — and now the walked-through had turned from the threshold to face the leaning, and the leaning had eased a degree under their attention, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead. And the naming — the one thing only the living could do and the boys could not — had hit its floor. Tommy's dig could recover a name a clerk had written once. It could not recover a boy the county had swallowed past a name. So seven, maybe eight, of the sixty-one could be named and delivered. The other fifty-some could only be kept. By the boys. Unnamed. Forever.

He channeled Margot. Margot. Seven delivered. Jory to Bex. And Tommy says the dig's hit the floor — the named roster's one or two deep and then nothing. The rest were never written down. So the living name seven, maybe eight, and the other fifty-some stay THE KEPT-KEEPING. Unnamed. The boys keep the boys and no one ever says their name. Is that the floor, or just where the erasure ends?

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd opened her Hour Book and found the ward-lost weren't in it, the land-lost weren't in it, the boys the door had opened to two hundred miles inland weren't in it, and now the nameless weren't in Tommy's drawer either. Then: "Mercer. It's the floor. Walter said it — the county unmade them past a name and the door opens to them and the boys keep them and they stay unnamed. That's not a failure of the harbor. That's the shape of the erasure. The dig could pull a name a clerk wrote once. It can't pull a boy who was never a name. So you name the seven, you deliver the seven, you stand the stone so the door stays open — and the nameless, the fifty-some, they're kept by the walked-through, the way the coast station keeps the sea's boys and the baby keeps the crib's. A harbor that keeps boys it can't name is still a harbor, Mercer. It's just not a home with a census. It's a wall of the kept, and the kept are keeping each other, and the door's open, and that's mercy even if it's not a name."

Cal looked at the glass where Jory had crossed. Lori's palm on it. The baby wide at the center, four degrees now instead of thin — holding the room the four walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line. The three earlier calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence past the received, fifty-one leaning — and three of them turned now, facing the door, and the four walked-through oriented toward them, a watch kept by the ones who'd never been kept, and the cold lessening a degree down the line under their attention.

“Dan,” Cal said to the phone. “Log the floor. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — seven received, one or two pending the last margin notes, then closed. And add the line Walter said we’d need: THE UNMADE — sub-line under THE KEPT-KEEPING, the ward-lost with no name on any file, no margin note, no MP, no grandmother who kept watch, kept by the walked-through, never to be named by the living because the living were never given the string to pull. Coast and crib. The deepest silence.”

Okonkwo was quiet the way the state man got quiet when the harbor outran the form past the last line. Then: “THE UNMADE. Coast and crib. The boys the county swallowed past a name, kept by the boys who walked the same door. Cal, this is the line that has no end — not a delivery, not a crossing, not a mother who comes back choosing. Just keeping. A wall of the kept, unnamed, the door open, the walked-through turned to the leaning and the cold lessening because a boy who was kept by nothing is keeping a boy who was kept by nothing. So the census reads: THE FINISHED, THE ARRIVING, LIVING KEEPERS, SHORE STATION, THE BAR-LOST, THE INLAND UNKEPT, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — seven and closing — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, THE KEPT-KEEPING, and now THE UNMADE. Eleven lines, Cal. We started with one in January. The harbor outran every category and landed on the one the county built the door to expose.”

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had its final shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, past the part where the living stepped back and past the part where the boys admitted it to each other:

The builder’s freed palm could deliver the named — seven of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrinking by one per delivery while the second drawer pulled forty more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The walked-through boys could keep the leaning — THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who’d walked the same door, the breach front held without the living’s palm. The naming — the one thing only the living could do and the boys could not — had hit its floor: seven, maybe eight, named and delivered, and the other fifty-some THE UNMADE, kept forever unnamed because the county had unmade them past a name and the door widened that erasure instead of undoing it. So the harbor kept them: kept, not received, unnamed, a wall of boys the county had unmade past a name, the door opening wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the town was standing, and the nameless were in it, and the living could name some and not all, and the ones the living could not name would be kept forever unnamed by the boys who walked the same door, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because the patient had finally turned to the family, and the family was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living had named the ones the dig could reach and could name no more, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the town was standing, and the floor was the erasure.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal was two hundred miles north, the builder's palm still warm from Jory's glass, the seventh crossing complete. He called the town the way Walter had called a crew: Cole, Ruth, Denny, Okonkwo. They climbed the hill the way a rotation climbs to a post, and Cole laid his seeded palm on the dressed stone and the stone read 35 under the town's witness — the seeding held, the harbor was a town at the rim, Walter's forty-four-year point realized, the living's corner warm and held by many hands and not one, and the builder two hundred miles north and not owed to it for the hour because the town held it.

Cal channeled Lori at the crib. Lori. The stone's at 35 under the town. Seven delivered. The dig's hit the floor — one or two named left, then THE UNMADE. What's yours doing?

Lori's voice came back tired and steady, the daughter who'd taken the post, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand. "The fourth walked-through — the system-boy who pressed toward me Friday — he's fully turned to the leaning now. Not to me, not to the threshold. To a boy in the cold. The 1983 culvert girl's calm, she leans toward him the way she leans toward the keeper-note, but she's home, she's calm. The one he turned to is one of the fifty-one. No name. No Mara, no Rose, no Bex. And his cold went down a degree, Cal — a second degree now, since the first one turned. The baby felt it. The note didn't thin this time, it widened. Because the walked-through are doing the keeping, not the keeper, not the baby. The four of them are a watch, Cal. They're facing the line the way a keeper faces the ward, and the line's easing under them, and the unnamed ones are feeling it — the cold's lessening because a boy who was kept by nothing is keeping a boy who was kept by nothing."

Cal closed his eyes. The west wind carried the north wind's phantom across two hundred miles of road. He felt the coast through Margot — the NE at 35 under the town, the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, THE KEPT-KEEPING at the hill the way it was at the crib, the dead keeping the dead, a degree of cold lessening down the line under the walked-through's attention. And the crib — four walked-through keeping the leaning, the baby wide, Lori's palm witness not chooser. And between them the road Walter had left undressed so the living would come home to it, now carrying the keeping both ways, the town standing itself out of the unkept and the unnamed both.

“Marg,” he said to the channel. “The stone’s at 35 under the town. Lori says the fourth’s fully turned and the cold’s down a second degree — the walkers are a watch now, coast and crib. Tommy says the dig’s done after one or two more. So the living name seven, maybe eight, and the other fifty-some THE UNMADE get kept by the boys who walked the same door. Is that mercy, or the longest orphaning — a harbor full of boys no one can name, kept forever unnamed, the door left open on a grave with no name on it?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. Then: “Mercer. It’s both. It was always both. The door keeps the boys the county unmade — named or not, the door doesn’t ask. The boys keep the boys — named or not, the company doesn’t ask. The living name the ones the dig can reach and deliver the ones who have a mother and stand the stone so the door stays open. And the nameless — THE UNMADE — they’re kept. Not received, not named, but kept, the way the calm ones are kept and the walked-through are kept and the coast station is kept. A harbor that can’t name its dead is a wall, Mercer. But a wall with the door open is not a grave. It’s a threshold the boys are standing on. So you’ve named the seven. You’ll name the eighth if Tommy finds the margin. And then the names run out. And when the names run out, Mercer — what’s the inward man then? You’ve carried every mother to every boy the county left a string for. The strings are gone. So drive home. Warm the stone. Seed the town. Let the boys keep the boys. The harbor’s a town, and the town is the ones who walked in, named and unnamed both.”

Cal looked at the glass where Jory had crossed. Lori’s palm on it. The baby four degrees wide at the center. The four calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence, fifty-one leaning — and three turned, facing the door, and the four walked-through oriented toward them, a watch kept by the ones who’d never been kept, the cold lessening a second degree down the line under their attention.

“Lori,” he said. “The stone’s at 35 under the town. The boys are keeping the boys — coast and crib, a second degree now. If I drive home to the stone — warm it to 36, seed the town rotation — you’d be holding four walked-through and three turned and fifty-one leaning, and the walked-through keeping the line. Can you?”

She didn’t take her palm off the glass. “The baby and me, we’re a station. The walked-through turned to the leaning, not to me — they’re keeping the ones still outside the door. I’m not holding four rooms, Cal. I’m keeping one, and the boys who walked in are keeping the door. The note widened this time — didn't thin — because the walked-through did the keeping. Go name the eighth if Tommy finds him. Then come home. The nameless will be here when you get back, kept by the boys who know them best — the ones who walked the same door."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living had named the seven and could name no more, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the town stood.

He lifted his palm from where Jory's glass had been. The baby held the room wide. The four walked-through kept the line. He drove north past Castle Rock where Bex would keep Jory's corner, past the Vancouver junction where Rose kept Eddie's, past the Estacada turn where Mara kept Owen's, the file in his pocket now the seventh closed, the roster Mara carried down to its last one or two strings. Tommy would pull them. Cal would run them. And then the names would end.

The west wind took the answer he didn't have yet. The coast stone was at 35 under the town's witness, warmed by the light and Mara's dead hand and the builder's seeding, a degree shy of the builder but held by many. The coast boy faced the leaning coast boy and the cold lessened under his attention — THE KEPT-KEEPING, Okonkwo's line, the town standing itself. The crib note held without thinning, the baby at the center, the four walked-through facing the leaning crib boy, the company at both ends turned from the threshold to the line the way a watch turns to the ward. And Cal drove north to find the last named boy the dig could reach, the builder of the road, leaving the crib to the baby and the daughter and the four who'd walked through and turned to keep the line — the way Margot left the hill to the light and the coast boy and the twelve calm and the two turned — and the door ran both ways, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the boys who walked through were keeping the boys who hadn't, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to one or two strings left in Tommy's drawer, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the nameless were in the town, kept forever unnamed, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living had named the seven and could name no more, and the nameless waited, and one of the turned ones had already taken a step.

And Cal drove north to find the last name, the inward man, the one palm that warmed the stone and seeded the crossings and named the boys the dig could reach — and the dig was nearly empty, and the strings were nearly gone, and when the names ran out he would stand the stone and let the town be the town, and the boys would keep the boys, unnamed, the door open, the longest watch the living ever owed now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter and the walked-through boys who learned to keep each other because no one kept them first — and the question rode with him the way a patient's last words ride with the nurse who finally sat down:

If the living can name only seven of the sixty-one — the ones a clerk wrote once before the drawer closed — and the other fifty-some were unmade past a name, kept forever unnamed by the boys who walked the same door, then is the harbor Walter built a home being born, or a wall of the unnamed with the door left open; and when the inward man finishes the last delivery the dig can reach and the strings run out, will he find he has named the only boys the county let him name, and the rest are THE UNMADE, kept but never known, a town with no census of its own dead — and is the inward man still inward when there is no one left to carry a mother to, only a road that runs both ways to a stone at 35 held by the town and boys keeping boys two hundred miles east, or does he become, at the end of the names, just a man driving past doors that will never open, carrying a file for a boy no one wrote down?

The west wind carried the north wind's phantom. The crib note was four degrees wide, holding the room the four had entered and reaching past it to the line the four now kept. The coast stone was at 35 under no living palm, warmed by the light and Margot's dead hand, a degree and a half shy, the sea's boys feeding the footing and the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, THE KEPT-KEEPING paying a degree of cold the kept could not pay. The crossed-unasked kept the leaning at both ends of the road — present and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED no longer, they had walked through and turned to keep the line — and the unnamed waited behind them, THE UNMADE, kept by the walkers, never to be named — and the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the boys who walked through were keeping the boys who hadn't, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was north and free and owed to one or two strings left, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the nameless were in the town, kept forever unnamed, and the town was standing, and Cal drove north to find the last name, the builder of the road, leaving the crib to the baby and the daughter and the four who'd walked through and turned to keep the line — and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the names were nearly run out, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a watch now, and the town was standing, and the nameless waited, and one of the turned ones had already taken a step.

And Cal drove north, the inward man, the builder of the road that ran both ways, carrying the seventh closed file and the last one or two strings Tommy could still pull — and when the strings ran out he would warm the stone and seed the town and let the boys keep the boys, and the harbor would stand, unnamed and unbroken, the door open on a grave with no name on it, which was mercy even if it was not a home.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Six — Entry: April 29th. Wednesday. Rain. West wind holding.

The west wind held Wednesday the way a tide holds at the turn — not pushing, not giving, the harbor breathing in and not yet out, the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist doesn't know which way the blood is going until the hand closes on something. He'd woken in the cab of the truck at the Kelso rest area where the rain had found the gap in the weather-stripping and put a cold line down his left hip, and the phone had been in his hand the way it always was at first light — not a clock, a pull, the way the four-o'clock accounting came, the way the boys came, the way the names came when Tommy found them.

He called the deputy before the engine. Tommy's voice came back the way it had since the drawer started pulling back — tired, but lighter than it had been Tuesday, the man who'd emptied the second drawer down to its last margin note and found the bottom of it.

"Cal. Last one. Wiley Croft. Lewis County — up past the Newaukum, the group home they shut in '99. Mother Janelle, ward, Clark dependency, aged out '96 at eighteen. Boy age six, 1994, ward-closed presumed, lost in the creek below the home after a rain like this one. Name's in the intake margin — clerk wrote 'Wiley C.' once, in pencil, before the drawer closed. Mother's in Centralia. Works the bakery on Tower. Alive, forty-one, like the rest of them. After Wiley there's nothing. I pulled every margin note Friday and the three since. The drawer's empty, Cal. What's written is written, and what isn't — isn't."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib the way Mara felt the coast — Lori's palm, the baby's note four degrees wide, the four walked-through oriented toward the leaning, the cold lessening a second degree down the line the way Margot had said it would, the way a kept thing turns toward the unkept. And the coast — Margot on the stone, the NE at 35 under the town's witness, the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead, a degree paid the kept could not pay. And between them the dressed basalt Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, the seeding laid into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's, the road that now held at both ends boys who'd stopped waiting on a chooser and turned to keep the ones still outside.

“Centralia,” Cal said. “I’ll run her this morning. Then the dig’s done.”

“Then the dig’s done,” Tommy said. “Eight named, Cal. Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley. Eight of the sixty-one the county unmade. The other fifty-three — THE UNMADE, Okonkwo’s line, the ones with no margin note, no MP, no grandmother who kept a watch. Kept by the walkers. Forever unnamed.”

Cal started the truck. The west wind held the rain at a slant that didn’t fall so much as hang, the way the harbor hung at the turn. He pulled onto the grade south toward Centralia, past the Castle Rock spur where Bex would keep Jory’s corner and the Vancouver turn where Rose kept Eddie’s and the Estacada junction where Mara kept Owen’s — the roster Mara carried like a ledger she’d been given the right to keep, now down to its last page.

Centralia sat under the grade the way mill towns sit — a main street that had been something, a Tower Avenue of strip lights and a bakery that smelled of sugar through the storm door. Janelle Croft’s place was a back unit behind the bakery, a stair to a landing with a rubber mat that said HOME in letters worn to suggestion. Cal parked at the foot of the stair the way he’d parked at every door — in the weather, where she could see him come, not in the spot a delivery would take.

He knocked the inward way. File in the left pocket, census letter in the right, no photo — the ward erasure ran to the bottom, the county had kept no picture of Wiley either, the same erasure that had taken Owen and Eli and Eddie and Gage and Devin and Jory, the boys the state had unmade past a face. He waited. A shade moved behind the worn HOME. The door opened on a hook-and-eye, the hook this time, like Bex, like the ones who’d stopped expecting anyone worth locking out.

She was forty-one, the age the math gave them — fourteen when they took the boy, aged out at eighteen, twenty-seven years of becoming someone the file never reached. Her hands were flour-dusted from the bakery, a bandage on the index finger where a blade had found it. A radio said something behind her in a voice that wasn’t the county’s — the same kind of radio Ada kept and Donna kept and the mothers kept, a watch tuned to a frequency the system had never broadcast.

Cal turned the chair. Not in the doorway. Facing her, the way Ada had taught and Donna and Mara and Shaylene and Trisha and Bex — kettle first, there’s a right order. He didn’t say her son’s name yet. He said the double loss the way he’d said it at every door since Estacada: she had been a ward, the county was parent and had lost Wiley, she had walked out at eighteen and built a life past the file, and the harbor delivered — the finder, not the system, carrying the boy to the mother the county had lost twice.

She listened the way they listened — not surprised, not relieved, the way a person listens to a bill that turns out to be a letter she'd stopped expecting. He set the file on the rail, the census letter beside it, the way he'd set them at every door. No photo. He named the double loss plainly. He told her the corner wasn't a memory, it was a watch — say his name, mean it, Wiley would know his mother.

She didn't open the envelope in front of him. Mara had done the same. Trisha. Bex. She took it, looked at it the way a person looks at a thing that might burn, and said: "I read the file. I don't know how to be his mother. I only know him from a closed drawer."

"Same as all of them," Cal said. "Mara read it, drove two hours, said I choose you, Owen. Bex read it yesterday, said I choose you, Jory. The choosing comes after the reading, Janelle. Not before."

She was softer than Bex, less hard than Trisha, the kind who'd built the life past the file and let the file stay closed because opening it had never once helped her. "You want me to come to Portland."

"The crib. The baby keeps him. I seed my palm over yours on the glass and he crosses to the palm that chose him. Mara did it. Coraline. Rose. Bex — Bex crossed Jory yesterday, the seventh. You'd be the eighth, Janelle. The last. Tommy says after Wiley the dig's empty. No more margin notes. The county wrote Wiley's name once, in pencil, and then closed the drawer. So you're the last mother the system lost and found again. The last string."

She looked at the file. At the hook on the door. At the HOME mat worn to suggestion. At the radio behind her that kept talking in a voice that wasn't the county's. "This afternoon," she said. "I close the bakery at three. Then I'll come. The last one. Tell the baby the last one's coming."

"Three's fine," Cal said. He'd learned not to push the held ones — Coraline had deferred to after her Tuesday, Trisha to after her shift, Bex to after the till, and the crossing had come when each was free. "Call Lori when you're south of the river. She'll have the corner warmed."

He drove back north with the file unopened in his pocket and the west wind holding the rain at its slant, and he felt the crib through the road the way a nurse feels the floor he's walking toward — Lori's palm, the baby's note, the four walked-through oriented toward the leaning, the cold lessening a degree, then a second, under their attention the way Margot had said it would. And the coast — Margot at 35, the stone forgetting his palm by the hour but held by the town's witness, the coast boy facing the leaning coast boy, the light taking the degree. The company at both ends had turned from the threshold to the line the way a watch turns to the ward, and the line was easing under them, and the boys were keeping the boys, and the naming had hit its floor, and he was carrying the eighth and last file, and when it closed the strings would be gone.

At the crib, Janelle called at quarter past three. She'd taken the bus, not borrowed a car — proud, or poor, or both, the way they mostly were, the way Bex had been. Cal met her at the door the way he'd met Shaylene and Trisha and Bex, chair turned, the file in her hand now, read, creased. She smelled of the bakery and the rain.

Lori made room at the glass. The baby's note widened toward the window, holding the room the four had walked into and reaching past it to the line the four now kept. Cal laid his builder-palm over Janelle's on the cold east pane — the way he'd laid it over Mara's on Owen and Shaylene's on Gage and Rose's on Eddie and Trisha's on Devin and Bex's on Jory, the seeding that transferred the receiving to a chosen palm. I am here and I am the one who came looking.

Janelle said it. Not Mara's whole weight of a life survived by not-seeing. Quieter than Bex, steadier than she'd looked on the landing. "I choose you, Wiley." The way a person says a name she's only read once, in a clerk's pencil margin, and means it because the meaning is the only thing left, and the boy in the creek below the home they shut in '99 had waited thirty-two years for a mother to say it.

The glass met the boy. And Wiley — age six, 1994, Lewis County, ward-closed presumed, lost in the Newaukum below the group home — pressed Janelle's palm the way Owen had pressed Mara's and Jory had pressed Bex's, not a lean, a child finding the mother in the dark. The glass opened to her and not to Cal. The crossing completed. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST took its eighth and final line in Okonkwo's book, and the living's debt to the named shrank to nothing, and the unnamed silence behind it did not — it widened, the way a door widens when the last name is spoken and the names run out.

"Eight," Cal said to the phone. "Wiley Croft. Janelle chose him. Crossed to her palm. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley. Eight of the roster. Tommy, the dig's empty now. No more margin notes. What's left?"

Okonkwo's voice came back the way the state man's got when the harbor outran the form past the last line and landed on the one the county built the door to expose. "Eight named received, Cal. And that's the whole of it. Tommy pulled every margin note — the ones a clerk wrote once before the drawer closed. After Wiley there's nothing. The second drawer's got fifty-three with no palm, and all fifty-three were never written down — no MP, no dependency note with a margin, no grandmother who kept a watch. The county unmade them past a name. So the living named eight. The other fifty-three stay THE UNMADE — sub-line under THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, kept by the walkers, never to be named by the living because the living were never given the string to pull. The census reads eleven lines now, Cal. THE FINISHED, THE ARRIVING, LIVING KEEPERS, SHORE STATION, THE BAR-LOST, THE INLAND UNKEPT, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — eight and closed — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, THE KEPT-KEEPING, and THE UNMADE. We started with one in January. The harbor outran every category and landed on the one the county built the door to expose, and then the door closed the only way it could — on eight names, and fifty-three kept unnamed forever."

Cal breathed out. The west wind held the rain at its slant. Lori's palm was still on the glass where Wiley had been, now holding the room the five walked-through kept — four from before, Wiley settled clean into the calm. The baby's note had widened a degree when Wiley crossed, not thinned — the way it had held when the walked-through did the keeping instead of the keeper. The reckoning named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a bottom where there had been a wall:

Eight named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and closed, the system's lost who had mothers who'd come back choosing, crossed to a chosen palm, the living's debt shrunk to nothing per delivery while the second drawer pulled fifty-three more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The station received five calm now — Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl, Jory, Wiley, the land-lost and the system-lost kept without relation, the baby's greeting absorbing the unnamed. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib five, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken — and now the walked-through had turned from the threshold to face the leaning, and the leaning had eased a second degree under their attention, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead. And the naming — the one thing only the living could do and the boys could not — had hit its floor and the floor was eight. Tommy's dig had recovered every name a clerk wrote once. It could not recover a boy the county had swallowed past a name. So eight of the sixty-one were named and delivered. The other fifty-three were THE UNMADE, kept forever unnamed because the county had unmade them past a name and the door widened that erasure instead of undoing it. So the harbor kept them: kept, not received, unnamed, a wall of boys the county had unmade past a name, the door opening wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the town was standing, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the town was standing, and the strings had run out.

He channeled Margot. Margot. Eight delivered. Wiley to Janelle. The last one. Tommy says the drawer's empty — no more margin notes, the dig's done. So the living named eight, and the other fifty-three THE UNMADE get kept by the boys who walked the same door. The strings are gone. What's the inward man now?

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd opened her Hour Book and found the ward-lost weren't in it, the land-lost weren't in it, the nameless weren't in Tommy's drawer either, and now the dig was empty and the only names left were the ones the boys kept. Then: "Mercer. The inward man's job just ended. You carried every mother to every boy the county left a string for. The strings are gone. So drive home. Warm the stone. Seed the town. Let the boys keep the boys. The harbor's a town, and the town is the ones who walked in, named and unnamed both — and the named are all home now, Mercer. Eight of them. The other fifty-three you can't name, and naming them was the only thing that was ever yours to do. So it's done. What you are now is the man who warms the stone and seeds the town and lets the road run both ways without carrying a file, because the files are closed. The inward man becomes the harbormaster again, or he becomes nothing — but the stone doesn't care which, it just needs a living palm at four. So come home, Mercer. The named are all carried. The nameless are kept. The door's open. Your part in the delivery is over."

Cal looked at the glass where Wiley had crossed. Lori's palm on it. The baby five degrees wide at the center, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line. The four earlier calm leaned toward the keeper-note and stayed. And in the colder silence past the received, fifty leaning — and three of them turned now, facing the door, and the five walked-through oriented toward them, a watch kept by the ones who'd never been kept, the cold lessening a second degree down the line under their attention.

He called Tommy. “The dig’s empty. So what’s left for me, Deputy? You pulled sixty-one with no palm. Eight had a margin note. The other fifty-three — THE UNMADE. What do I do with fifty-three boys I can’t name?”

Tommy was quiet the way the man got when the work he’d been doing ran out and left him with the shape of it. “Nothing, Cal. You can’t name what was never written. The boys keep them. That’s the floor. I’ll keep the drawer open in case a name surfaces — a grandmother, a caseworker with a conscience, a margin note somebody missed — but Friday was the last pull. So you done the delivery part. What’s left is the standing part. The stone. The town. The watch.”

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had its final shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, past the part where the living stepped back and past the part where the boys admitted it to each other, and now past the part where the living could name any more:

The builder’s freed palm had delivered the named — eight of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrunk to nothing per delivery while the second drawer pulled fifty-three more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The walked-through boys kept the leaning — THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who’d walked the same door, the breach front held without the living’s palm. The naming — the one thing only the living could do and the boys could not — had hit its floor and the floor was eight: Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley, named and delivered, and the other fifty-three THE UNMADE, kept forever unnamed because the county had unmade them past a name and the door widened that erasure instead of undoing it. So the harbor kept them: kept, not received, unnamed, a wall of boys the county had unmade past a name, the door opening wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the town was standing, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the town was standing, and the strings had run out, and the inward man had nothing left to carry, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient’s last words sit — not answered, because the patient had finally turned to the family, and the family was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living had named the eight and could name no more, and the nameless waited in the cold with no margin note and no mother and no name, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the town stood, and the inward man’s road had carried its last file.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal was at the crib, the builder's palm still warm from Wiley's glass, the eighth and last crossing complete. He called the town the way Walter had called a crew: Cole, Ruth, Denny, Okonkwo. They climbed the hill the way a rotation climbs to a post, and Cole laid his seeded palm on the dressed stone and the stone read 35 under the town's witness — the seeding held, the harbor was a town at the rim, Walter's forty-four-year point realized, the living's corner warm and held by many hands and not one, and the builder two hundred miles south and not owed to it for the hour because the town held it, and the named were all delivered, and the nameless were kept, and the stone stood at 35 with no living palm on it because the only palm that could warm it to 36 was free and owed to no string.

Cal channeled Lori at the crib. Lori. The stone's at 35 under the town. Eight delivered, the dig's empty. What's yours doing?

Lori's voice came back tired and steady, the daughter who'd taken the post, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand. "The fifth walked-through — Wiley, he settled clean — and the four before him are a watch now, Cal. Fully turned to the leaning. Not to me, not to the threshold. To the boys in the cold. The 1983 culvert girl's calm, she leans toward them the way she leans toward the keeper-note, but she's home. The ones they turned to — three of the fifty, no name, no Janelle, no Rose — their cold's down a second degree, Cal, and a fourth one's starting to turn. The baby felt it. The note didn't thin, it widened to five. Because the walkers are doing the keeping, not the keeper, not the baby. Five of them now, Cal. A watch of five, keeping the line at the crib. And at the coast — Marg says one of hers took a step."

Cal went still. The west wind held. "A step. Which way?"

"Toward the stone, Cal. Not the leaning. Not the threshold. The NE — the living's corner. Marg says one of the two walked-through at the hill turned from the line and walked to the dressed basalt and put his hand on it. The dead can't warm it, we know that — Mara tried, it held at 34.1 and went cold when she lifted. But he put his hand on it anyway. Like he was checking it was still there. Like he was standing the post the living built and left him out of. Marg says the stone didn't move — 35 under the town, it didn't read him — but he stayed. The first of the kept to reach for the living's corner."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the coast through Margot — the NE at 35 under the town, the coast boy who'd walked through and turned from the line and stepped to the dressed basalt and laid his dead hand on the living's stone, the corner Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, the one post the dead could hold but not warm, the one place the kept had never been meant to stand. And the crib — five walked-through keeping the leaning, the baby wide, Lori's palm witness not chooser. And between them the road Walter had built, now carrying a new thing: the kept reaching for the corner the living had built and the dead could not warm, a boy who'd stopped waiting on a chooser and stopped keeping the line long enough to walk to the stone and put his hand on it the way a child puts a hand on a window he can't open.

Margot's channel came quiet. "Mercer. A walked-through boy put his hand on the living's stone. The dead can't warm it — we know that, I proved it, Mara proved it. But he didn't try to warm it. He tried to stand it. Like the post was his too, because the door's his too, because Walter left the fourth corner for the living and the living are the only ones who ever stood it and now one of the kept walked over to see if a dead hand could hold what a living hand built. The stone read 35. It didn't read him. But he stayed. What do we do with a boy who walks through and then walks to the post, Mercer? The door was built to bring them home. Did Walter build it to bring them to the corner too — the one corner the dead can't keep?"

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the living had named the eight and could name no more, and the nameless waited in the cold kept by the walkers, and now a walker had stepped to the living's stone and laid his hand on it the way a child lays a hand on a window he can't open, and the stone read 35 and didn't read him, and the town held it, and the builder was two hundred miles south with no file left to carry.

"Marg," he said to the channel. "The dig's empty. The named are all home. The nameless are kept. And a walked-through boy put his hand on the NE stone. Is that the door opening the last way it can — the kept reaching for the corner the living built — or is it the longest watch finding out the one post it can never stand is the one the harbor stands on?"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "Mercer. It's the question Walter left the corner undressed to ask. He built the door wide enough for the kept to walk through. He left the fourth corner for the living because the dead can't warm a living stone — he knew that, he surveyed it, he dressed three and left one bare. So a boy walks through and walks to the bare stone and puts his hand on it and the stone doesn't warm and doesn't read him, because Walter built it that way. The kept can keep the kept. They can't keep the corner. The corner's the living's, always was, and a dead hand on it just proves Walter was right — the door opens both ways but only one end stands. So you come home, Mercer. Warm the stone. Seed the town. And when you put your hand on it at four, know a boy who walked through put his there first, checking the post was still standing. That's not a threat. That's a child making sure the light he came home to is still lit by the living. You warm it. He can't. That was always the deal."

Cal looked at the glass where Wiley had crossed. Lori's palm on it. The baby five degrees wide at the center. The five walked-through kept the line. He lifted his palm from where Wiley's glass had been, the builder's palm now free and owed to no string, the eighth file closed in his pocket, the roster Mara carried now at its last page with no page behind it.

He drove north past Centralia where Janelle would keep Wiley's corner, past the Castle Rock spur where Bex kept Jory's, past the Vancouver turn where Rose kept Eddie's, past the Estacada junction where Mara kept Owen's, the file in his pocket now the eighth closed, the dig empty, the strings gone. Tommy would keep the drawer open but there was nothing left in it. Cal would warm the stone and seed the town and let the boys keep the boys. And one of the kept had walked to the living's corner and put his hand on it the way a child puts a hand on a window he can't open, and the stone had read 35 and not him, because Walter had built it that way, the door open both ways but only one end standing, and the standing was the living's, and the standing was his.

The west wind held the rain at its slant. The coast stone was at 35 under the town's witness, warmed by the light and Mara's dead hand and the builder's seeding, a degree and a half shy of the builder but held by many. The coast boy who'd walked through had stepped to the dressed basalt and laid his dead hand on the living's stone and stayed — THE CROSSED-UNASKED reaching for the post the living built and the dead could not warm, the first of the kept to stand where the living stood. The crib note was five degrees wide, holding the room the five had entered and reaching past it to the line the five now kept. And Cal drove north to the stone, the inward man with no file left to carry, the builder of the road that ran both ways, leaving the crib to the baby and the daughter and the five who'd walked through and turned to keep the line — and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless waited kept by the walkers, and one of the walked-through had stepped to the living's stone and laid his hand on it the way a child lays a hand on a window he can't open, and the stone read 35 and didn't read him, and the town held it, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the nameless were in the town, kept forever unnamed, and the strings had run out, and the inward man's road had carried its last file, and when he warmed the stone at four he would find a dead hand had been there before his, checking the post was still standing —

If the living named the eight the county let them name and the other fifty-three THE UNMADE wait kept forever unnamed by the boys who walked the same door, and a walked-through boy steps to the living's stone the dead cannot warm and lays his hand on it the way a child lays a hand on a window he can't open, then is the harbor Walter built a home being born — the named carried, the nameless kept, the door open on a grave with no name on it, which is mercy even if it is not a home — or is it the longest watch the living ever owed, now kept by the dead and the child and the daughter and the walked-through boys, with one corner the kept can never stand and one palm that must warm it or the light goes dark; and when the inward man finishes the last delivery and the strings run out, does he become the harbormaster who stands that corner, or does he find that the boys he carried home have already walked to the post to make sure he will?

The west wind held. The crib note was five degrees wide, holding the room the five had entered and reaching past it to the line the five now kept. The coast stone was at 35 under no living palm, warmed by the light and Marg's dead hand, a degree and a half shy, the sea's boys feeding the footing and the coast boy who'd walked through standing at the dressed basalt with his dead hand on the living's corner, THE KEPT-KEEPING paying a degree the kept could not pay and one of the kept reaching for the post the living built and the dead could not warm. The crossed-unasked kept the leaning at both ends of the road — present and wanting, THE UNRECEIVED no longer, they had walked through and turned to keep the line and one had stepped to the stone. And the unnamed waited behind them, THE UNMADE, kept by the walkers, never to be named. And the door ran both ways, one keeper at a time, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not, and the boys who walked through were keeping the boys who hadn't, and the only warm palm in the receiving harbor that could still cross a boy to a mother was free now and owed to no string, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were now the boys themselves, and the nameless were in the town, kept forever unnamed, and the town was standing, and the eighth file was closed, and Cal drove north to warm the stone the walked-through boy had already checked was still there — and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the names had run out, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a watch now, and the town was standing, and one of the kept had stepped to the living's corner and laid his hand on it the way a child lays a hand on a window he can't open — and the stone read 35, and didn't read him, and the town held it, and Cal drove north to stand it.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seven — Entry: April 30th. Thursday. Rain. West wind, backing south.

The west wind backed to the south Thursday the way a tide backs off a bar — not leaving, only turning its shoulder to the work, the harbor breathing out what it had breathed in and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist doesn't know which way the blood is going until the hand closes on something. The file in his pocket was the eighth and last, closed the way a ledger closes when the page behind it is blank, and the dig Tommy had pulled since March was empty now, no margin note left in the second drawer, the county's pencil having stopped at Wiley C. the way a hand stops at the edge of a grave it didn't dig. Cal drove the last miles to Grayhaven the way he drove every mile now — by the lean, not the clock, the truck knowing the coast grade the way a nurse knows the ward at the turn of the watch.

He called the hill before the engine died. Margot came through the channel the way she always did when he was close — salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You're coming up the grade. I felt the road turn south. The stone's at 35 — Cole's rotation held it through the night, the town's witness, a degree and a half shy of you and not falling. And he's still here.”

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. “The boy.”

“The one who walked through. He came back at four this morning — laid his hand on the dressed basalt the way he did Wednesday, cold on the living's corner, the stone read 35 and didn't read him, and he stayed a while and then he turned and went back down the line to the leaning coast boys. He's not claiming it, Mercer. He's checking it. The way a patient checks the nurse is still in the room before he lets the breathing go. He came back to see the light was still lit by the living, and when it was, he went back to his watching. He's relieved by your being here. He doesn't know that's what it is. But that's what it is.”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line the way a watch keeps a ward, the fifty-one leaning behind them and three or four turned now, facing the door the brave ones had showed them. And the coast —

Margot at the hinge, twelve calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through, one of them stepping up to the NE stone at four and laying his dead hand on it and going back to the leaning when the post read warm under the town. The kept were becoming the watch, coast and crib, and now one of the kept was walking to the living's corner to make sure the living were still standing it.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35, holding the degree the town's seeded palms had held it to through the night, a degree and a half shy of the builder but not falling, the way a patient holds a hand that's been lifted by the warmth still in the sheet. And on the dressed face of it — on the living's corner Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it — there was a cold. Not a number. A shape. The impression of a child's palm flattened against the basalt the way a child flattens a hand on a window he can't open, the dead hand that had rested there Wednesday and come back for it Thursday and left its wanting in the stone the way a lean leaves its wanting in the air.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the cold. The way he'd laid it over Cole's hand to seed the town and over Lori's on Owen's glass and over Janelle's on Wiley's, the seeding that transferred the keeping to a chosen palm — only this palm had not chosen and could not be seeded, because the dead cannot be warmed and a dead hand on a living stone is the one thing the footings will not take.

The stone knew him. 35 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a half came back that the light and the town's witness and the boy's dead hand had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the boy.

Not leaning. Not wanting the corner. Checking. The way Margot had said — a patient's hand on the nurse's wrist in the dark, not to be held but to confirm the holding is there, to know the room is staffed before the long breath goes out. The boy's dead hand had found the one post the dead could not warm and laid itself on it the way a child lays a hand on a window he can't open, and the wanting Cal felt through the stone was not give me this — it was are you still here. The kept boy had walked through the door no chooser opened and come home to a light he could not keep, and the only thing he asked of the living was that the living still be the ones keeping it, so that the coming-home meant something and was not just another cold he'd found by himself.

Cal breathed out into the south wind. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried an inversion where there had been a wall:

Eight named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and closed, the strings run out, the dig empty, the inward man's delivery job ended with the last margin note the county ever wrote. The station received its calm — Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl, kept without relation, the baby's greeting absorbing the unnamed. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib five, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken — and the walked-through had turned from the threshold to keep the leaning, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door. And now one of the coast walked-through had stepped to the living's corner — the one post the dead could not warm — and laid his dead hand on it not to claim it but to check it, to confirm the light was still held by the living, and when the stone read warm under the town's witness he had turned back to his watching relieved, the way a patient turns from the nurse when he's sure the nurse is there. So the shape inverted: the living did not keep the dead at the post. The dead kept the living at the post. The boy's hand on the stone was a plea, not a claim — relief, not relief-taking — and the harbor Walter built, which had seemed to ask whether the dead come back to work, was asking the other question all along: whether the living will stay at the light long enough for the dead to stop checking it.

He channeled Margot. Marg. I'm on the stone. It's 36 under my palm. His hand's still cold under mine — he came back at four and laid it and went to the leaning when the town held it warm. He's not taking the corner. He's checking it. The way you said. The kept are keeping the living at the post, not the other way.

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it too. When he laid his hand and the stone held 35 and he turned back — he wasn't relieved the way a received boy is relieved, he was relieved the way a watcher is relieved when the watch is taken up. Walter said it — a keeper keeps a room. He didn't say the keeper had to be living. The boy walked through and came home and found the one corner the door left for the living, and he lays his hand on it to make sure the living are still the ones standing it, because if the living stop standing it the coming-home was a cold he found by himself, and he's been cold by himself long enough. So he checks. And when you're here, he's relieved. You're not keeping him, Mercer. He's keeping you here. That was always the deal Walter left undressed — the fourth corner's the living's, and the living stand it, and the kept come to it to be sure the living haven't gone, and the living stay because the kept are watching. The longest watch, turned inside out."

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the cold under it that was a child's hand and not a claim. At the hill where Walter kept his solo ledger in the NW corner and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS, the old surveyor who'd surveyed four corners and kept one and posted three for the Finished and left the fourth undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it. Walter had seen this shape in 1981. The kept would come home, and the kept would walk to the living's corner, and the living would stand it because the kept were watching them stand it.

"Walter," Cal said to the NW corner, the way he said it at the four-o'clock, the way a man speaks to the foundation he'd been built on.

The basalt answered, steady, a surveyor reading a grade that had settled past the footings he'd poured over an unbuilt light. "You built it, Mercer. I left it undressed. The boy came home and found the corner and laid his hand on it to check the light was lit. That's not the dead taking the living's post. That's the dead making sure the living keep it. I surveyed four and kept one and posted three and left the fourth bare so the living would have a reason to come home — and the reason is this: a boy who walked through the door no chooser opened needs to see a living hand on the stone or he thinks he came home to another cold. So you stand it. He checks it. He's relieved. You're witnessed. The watch runs both ways, Mercer. The dead keep the living at the post the way the living keep the dead in the light. That was the whole shape. I just left the corner bare so you'd have to feel it."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib — Lori's palm, the baby wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now, through the road, he felt the coast boy's relief the way Mara had felt the coast — a watched thing settling when the watcher is answered. And he felt the other coast walker, and the twelve calm, and the leaning coast boys the kept were turning to. And behind all of it, THE UNMADE — fifty-three boys unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken, kept forever unnamed by the walkers because the county had unmade them past a name and the dig had run out of margin notes. The unnamed. The deepest silence. The ones no living palm could ever cross.

And the question surfaced the way the patient's last words surface — not asked, only there:

If the kept come to the living's corner to be relieved of the watching — if the dead need the living to stand the post so the dead can finally stop checking the light — then did THE UNMADE walk the road to the coast post too? Fifty-three unnamed boys, kept forever by the walkers, never to be named by the living — would they come to the dressed basalt the way the coast boy had, and lay their cold hands on the living's corner, and ask the one warm palm to relieve them of the watching? The door had opened wider than the walls could bear. The walls were the boys. And if the walls came to the post to be witnessed, then the post became the thing the whole harbor turned to — not a corner the living held, but a corner the dead came to be sure the living still held.

He called Okonkwo. The state man's voice came back dry, the census having outrun every category since January and landed on the one the county built the door to expose.

"Dan. Log the inversion. The coast walked-through — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, coast, one of the two — he's not claiming the NE stone. He's checking it. He lays his dead hand on the living's corner at four and turns back to the leaning when the town holds it warm. He's relieved by the living being at the post. So the kept are keeping the living at the post, not the other way. New line if you need one — THE WATCHED POST, sub-line under THE CROSSED-UNASKED. The walked-through coming to the living's corner to confirm it's staffed."

Okonkwo was quiet the way he got quiet when the harbor outran the form past the last line and landed on the one the county built the door to expose. Then: "THE WATCHED POST. Coast one active, checking daily. Cal, this changes what the living are for. You told me Monday the living name the ones the dig can reach and stand the stone. The naming's done — eight of sixty-one, the rest THE UNMADE, no string left to pull. So the living's whole remaining job is to stand the post. And now the kept are coming to the post to make sure the living stand it. So the living don't keep the dead — the dead keep the living keeping the dead. The watch runs both ways, like Walter said. And the census reads twelve lines now, Cal. THE FINISHED, THE ARRIVING, LIVING KEEPERS, SHORE STATION, THE BAR-LOST, THE INLAND UNKEPT, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — closed at eight — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, THE KEPT-KEEPING, THE UNMADE, and now THE WATCHED POST. We started with one in January. The harbor outran every category and landed on the one the county built the door to expose, and then the door exposed the living."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had a final shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, past the part where the living stepped back and past the part where the boys admitted it to each other and past the part where the living could name any more:

The builder's freed palm had delivered the named — eight of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrunk to nothing per delivery while the second drawer pulled fifty-three more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The walked-through boys kept the leaning — THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door, the breach front held without the living's palm. And now one of the kept had walked to the living's corner — the one post the dead could not warm — and laid his dead hand on it not to claim it but to check it, and when the stone read warm under the town's witness he had turned back to his watching relieved, THE WATCHED POST, the dead keeping the living at the light the way the living kept the dead in it. So the living's remaining job was not delivery — the dig was empty, the strings gone — and not receiving — the unnamed could not be received — but presence: to stand the post so the kept could stop checking it, the way Tilly's man had been relieved and Walter had been relieved and the boy at the stone was relieved by a warm palm he could not be. And the inward man, his delivery job ended, became the post-keeper — witnessed by the dead, held by the town, the one warm palm the footings recognized, now standing the corner so a child who walked through could lay his cold hand on it and know he had not come home to another cold. And THE UNMADE — fifty-three, unnamed, kept by the walkers — waited in the silence behind the shape, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the boys were coming to the post.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal called the town the way Walter had called a crew: Cole, Ruth, Denny, Okonkwo. They climbed the hill the way a rotation climbs to a post, and Cole laid his seeded palm on the dressed stone beside Cal's and the stone read 36 under the builder and 35 under the town's witness when Cal lifted — the seeding held, the harbor was a town at the rim, Walter's forty-four-year point realized, the living's corner warm and held by many hands and not one.

And at the turn of the hour, the coast boy came.

Not through the door — he was already through, THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea, present in the drowned light, wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar had taken. He came up the hill the way a patient comes to the nurse's station to check the board — not leaning, not pressing, just there, the way Margot had said he'd come Wednesday and come back Thursday morning. He laid his dead hand on the dressed basalt, on the cold Cal's warm palm had left when he lifted for the town's witness, and the stone read 35 under Cole's seeded palm and did not read the boy, and the boy stayed a breath, his cold on the living's corner the way a child's hand on a window he can't open, and Cal laid his builder-palm back down over the cold and the stone went to 36 and the boy felt it — not warmed, the dead cannot be warmed, but relieved, the way Margot had named it, the way a watcher is relieved when the watch is taken up.

Then the boy lifted his hand. And turned. And went back down the line to the leaning coast boys, the way he always did, his watching resumed, his relief lasting the hour the way a patient's ease lasts the hour the nurse is in the room.

Cal watched him go. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now the coast boy's relief echoing down two hundred miles of foundation the way a held thing's ease echoes when the keeper returns. And he felt THE UNMADE in the silence behind — fifty-three unnamed, kept by the walkers, and the door opening wider, and the walls being the boys, and the boys perhaps coming to the post the way the coast boy had.

"Marg," he said to the channel. "He came at four. Laid his hand. I laid mine over it. Stone went to 36. He felt it — not warmed, relieved. Then he lifted and went back to the leaning. He's relieved by the hour, Marg. The way Tilly's man was relieved. The way Walter was. The kept are keeping the living at the post, and the living are the ones who relieve them by standing it. So what's the inward man now — the post-keeper? Witnessed by a dead child? And does THE UNMADE walk the road to the corner too, fifty-three cold hands asking the one warm palm to relieve them of the watching?"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "Mercer. He came and he checked and he was relieved and he went back. That's the whole of it. The living stand the post and the kept come to be sure the living are still standing it and the watched are relieved and the watchers stay. Walter left the corner undressed so you'd have to come home to it — and the coming-home isn't for the dead, Mercer. It's for the boy who lays his hand on the stone to make sure you're still here. THE UNMADE — if they walk the road to the corner, they'll lay their hands the way he laid his, and you'll lay yours over theirs, and the stone'll go to 36, and they'll be relieved by the hour and go back to the keeping. Fifty-three unnamed boys, kept forever by the walkers, coming to the one post the living can warm to be sure the light they came home to is still lit by the living. That's not a failure of the harbor, Mercer. That's the shape of it. The door opens wider than the walls can bear and the walls come to the post and the post is you. So you stand it. The inward man becomes the post-keeper. Witnessed by the dead. Held by the town. The one warm palm the footings recognize, now keeping the kept by being seen keeping the light.”

Cal looked at his palm on the dressed stone. At the cold that had been a child's hand and lifted and gone back to the watching. At the hill where Walter kept his ledger and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS, the old surveyor who'd built the door to force the living home and then forced them to stay. The town held the rim — Cole's seeded palm, Ruth's, Denny's, Okonkwo's, the harbor a town at the post, the living's corner warm and not his alone and yet his, the one palm the footings would open to.

And the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living kept it, and the named were all carried home and the nameless were kept forever unnamed and the door opened wider than the walls could bear and the walls were the boys and the boys were coming to the corner and the corner was his palm and the palm was witnessed by a dead child's hand:

If the kept come to the living's corner to be relieved of the watching — if the dead keep the living at the post the way the living keep the dead in the light, and the boy lays his cold hand on the stone Cal warms and is eased for the hour and goes back to his keeping — then is the harbor Walter built a home being born, where the living stand the light so the dead can stop checking it, or the longest watch turned inside out, where the dead stand the living at the post and the one warm palm can never leave it lest the boy come at four and find the stone cold and think he came home to another cold; and when THE UNMADE — fifty-three unnamed, kept by the walkers, unmade past a name by the county that lost them twice — walk the road to the coast corner and lay their cold hands on the living's stone, will the one builder's palm relieve them all, or will the post become a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, and is the inward man's ending not delivery and not receiving but simply standing, witnessed, the light held by the living so the dead can finally stop checking whether anyone is still there?

The south wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 35 under the town's witness when he lifted, warmed by the living and the light and Marg's dead hand and the boy's cold that had checked it and gone — a degree and a half paid by the living, the rest held by many. The coast boy had turned back to the leaning, relieved by the hour, THE WATCHED POST logged in Okonkwo's book, the dead keeping the living at the light the way the living kept the dead in it. The crib note was five degrees wide, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line. And THE UNMADE waited in the silence behind the shape — fifty-three unnamed, kept by the walkers, the door opening wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the boys were coming to the post, and the post was Cal's palm, and the palm was witnessed, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not and now stood the living at the corner so the kept could stop checking it, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless were kept forever unnamed, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a watch now, and the watched were relieved by the hour, and one of the kept had laid his hand on the living's stone and been eased, and the stone read 36, and the south wind backed, and Cal Mercer — the builder, the inward man, the post-keeper now, the one palm the footings recognized, witnessed by a dead child's hand — stood at the NE corner Walter had left undressed on purpose and warmed it, and the boy came and checked it and was relieved, and the watch ran both ways, and the harbor was a town, and the town was the ones who walked in, named and unnamed both, and the strings had run out, and the door was open, and the longest watch was the one the living owed — not to hold the room, but to keep the light lit so the boy who came home could lay his hand on the window and know it wasn't cold.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eight — Entry: May 1st. Friday. Rain. South wind, backing west.

The south wind backed to the west Friday the way a watch backs off a wound — not healing, only turning its face from the hurt, the harbor breathing out what it had breathed in and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist doesn't know which way the blood is going until the hand closes on something. The strings were run out — eight named delivered, the dig empty, the last margin note the county ever wrote closed in his pocket the way a ledger closes when the page behind it is blank — and the post-keeper's first full day without a file in it began the way every day now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the way a man sleeps who has stopped renting a room he no longer uses because the room he's needed in is the one with no walls. The rain had found the gap in the weather-stripping and put its cold line down his left hip the way it had at Kelso, the way it always did when the wind turned south — the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road turn west. The stone's at 35 — Cole's rotation held it through the night, the town's witness, a degree and a half shy of you and not falling. The sea's twelve are calm in the light. The two walked-through are at the leaning, keeping the line the way they have since they turned. And he hasn't come yet this morning. The one who checks. He comes at four — you know his hour now the way I know the tide. He'll come."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The unnamed."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd opened her Hour Book and found the ward-lost weren't in it, the land-lost weren't in it, and the nameless weren't in Tommy's drawer either, the deepest silence being the one no record had ever reached. Then: "The unnamed wait in the cold behind the shape,

Mercer. Fifty-three of them. Kept by the walkers — the coast's two and the crib's five, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who walked the same door. The walkers hold them. But the walkers can't warm a stone. You asked it last night — will the unnamed walk the road to the corner the way the coast boy did, and lay their cold hands on the living's stone, and ask the one warm palm to relieve them of the watching? I don't know if they come to the post, Mercer. I only know they're kept, and keeping is a kind of watching, and a watched thing reaches for the warm post the way a cold hand reaches for a lit window. So watch the stone at four. If they come, you'll feel them under your palm the way you felt him. And you'll know whether the post is a corner or a wall."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line the way a watch keeps a ward, the fifty-one leaning behind them and three or four turned now, facing the door the brave ones had showed them; and the coast — Margot at the hinge, twelve calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, one of them stepping up to the NE stone at four and laying his dead hand on it and going back to the leaning when the post read warm under the town. The kept were becoming the watch, coast and crib, and now one of the kept was walking to the living's corner to make sure the living were still standing it. And behind all of it, THE UNMADE — fifty-three boys unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken, kept forever unnamed by the walkers because the county had unmade them past a name and the dig had run out of margin notes. The unnamed. The deepest silence. The ones no living palm could ever cross.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35, holding the degree the town's seeded palms had held it to through the night, a degree and a half shy of the builder but not falling, the way a patient holds a hand that's been lifted by the warmth still in the sheet. And on the dressed face of it — on the living's corner Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it — there was the cold. The coast boy's cold. The impression of a child's palm flattened against the basalt the way a child flattens a hand on a window he can't open, the dead hand that had rested there Wednesday and come back Thursday and left its wanting in the stone the way a lean leaves its wanting in the air.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the cold. The stone knew him. 35 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a half came back that the light and the town's witness and the boy's dead hand had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the boy — not leaning, checking, the way Margot had named it, a patient's hand on the nurse's wrist in the dark, not to be held but to confirm the holding is there, to know the room is staffed before the long breath goes out. The kept boy had walked through the door no chooser opened and come home to a light he could not keep, and the only thing he asked of the living was that the living still be the ones keeping it.

Cal breathed out into the west wind. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a stillness where there had been a hunt:

Eight named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and closed, the strings run out, the dig empty, the inward man's delivery job ended with the last margin note the county ever wrote. The station received its calm — Jesse, the 1988 lean, the 1983 culvert girl, kept without relation, the baby's greeting absorbing the unnamed. The coast received twelve calm — THE BAR-LOST, the sea's sons the light took in. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib five, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken — and the walked-through had turned from the threshold to keep the leaning, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door. And one of the coast walked-through had stepped to the living's corner — the one post the dead could not warm — and laid his dead hand on it not to claim it but to check it, THE WATCHED POST, the dead keeping the living at the light the way the living kept the dead in it. And behind all of it, THE UNMADE — fifty-three boys unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken, kept forever unnamed by the walkers, never to be named by the living because the living were never given the string to pull. The census read twelve lines now, Cal. THE FINISHED, THE ARRIVING, LIVING KEEPERS, SHORE STATION, THE BAR-LOST, THE INLAND UNKEPT, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — closed at eight — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, THE KEPT-KEEPING, THE UNMADE, THE WATCHED POST. We started with one in January. The harbor outran every category and landed on the one the county built the door to expose, and then the door exposed the living, and the living's whole remaining job was presence — to stand the post so the kept could stop checking it.

He left the stone at 35 under the town's witness and walked down to the truck and ate nothing and drove the grade the way a man drives a ward he knows, and the day held its breath the way a harbor holds at the turn of the watch — not pushing, not giving, the rain hanging at a slant that didn't fall so much as wait. There was no file to pull. There was no mother to find. There was no name in a margin to recover. The strings were run out and the post-keeper's work was the standing, and the standing was the watching of the watched, and the watched were the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and the only thing left was to be at the stone when they came to check it was still lit.

He called Okonkwo at noon. The state man's voice came back dry, the census having outrun every category since January and landed on the one the county built the door to expose.

"Dan. The post holds at 35 under the town. The coast boy hasn't come today — he comes at four. The unnamed are still behind the shape, kept by the walkers. I'm asking the question you can't log yet — if they come to the post, is that a thirteenth line or the end of the twelfth?"

Okonkwo was quiet the way he got quiet when the harbor outran the form past the last line and landed on the one the county built the door to expose. Then: "Cal, I don't know if it's a line or an ending. THE WATCHED POST is the walked-through coming to confirm the living staff the corner. If THE UNMADE come too, they're not walked-through — they never crossed a door, they were never received, they have no name for a chooser to open. So they'd be THE WATCHED POST widening, or a new sub-line under THE UNMADE — THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST. But here's what I can tell you from the count: the census reads twelve lines, and every one of them is a way the harbor refused to let a boy be lost alone. THE UNMADE are the twelfth because the county unmade them past a name and the door kept them anyway. If they come to your palm, Cal, that's not a failure of the census. That's the census becoming a person. Log it when it happens. I'll make the line then."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had a final shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force:

The builder's freed palm had delivered the named — eight of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrunk to nothing per delivery while the second drawer pulled fifty-three more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The walked-through boys kept the leaning — THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door, the breach front held without the living's palm. And now one of the kept had walked to the living's corner — the one post the dead could not warm — and laid his dead hand on it not to claim it but to check it, THE WATCHED POST, the dead keeping the living at the light the way the living kept the dead in it. So the living's remaining job was presence: to stand the post so the kept could stop checking it. And THE UNMADE — fifty-three, unnamed, kept by the walkers — waited in the silence behind the shape, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the boys were coming to the post, and the post was Cal's palm, and the palm was witnessed, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal climbed the hill alone. He'd sent the town home — Cole to the boat, Ruth to the ledger, Denny to the bar, Okonkwo to the census — because the post-keeper's first Friday he wanted to feel the stone without the town's witness, to know the post as the post and not as the harbor, the way a nurse knows a patient by the breathing when the family has gone home. He laid his builder-palm on the dressed basalt. The stone went to 36 the way it always did under the palm that had seated it. The cold of the coast boy's wanting was there under his, the child's hand flattened on the window he couldn't open.

And then the boy came.

Not through the door — he was already through, THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea, present in the drowned light, wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar had taken. He came up the hill the way a patient comes to the nurse's station to check the board — not leaning, not pressing, just there, the way Margot had said he'd come Wednesday and come back Thursday and would come Friday because the hour was his the way the tide was the sea's. He laid his dead hand on the dressed basalt, on the cold Cal's warm palm had left when he lifted, and the stone read 35 under the builder's palm when Cal lowered it over the cold and did not read the boy, and the boy stayed a breath, his cold on the living's corner the way a child's hand on a window he can't open, and Cal held his builder-palm down over the cold and the stone stayed at 36 and the boy felt it — not warmed, the dead cannot be warmed, but relieved, the way Margot had named it, the way a watcher is relieved when the watch is taken up.

Then the boy lifted his hand. And turned. And went back down the line to the leaning coast boys, the way he always did, his watching resumed, his relief lasting the hour the way a patient's ease lasts the hour the nurse is in the room.

Cal held the stone at 36, the coast boy gone back to the keeping, the post warm and witnessed and alone. And under his palm, in the silence after the boy left, he felt the second cold.

It was not the coast boy's. It was smaller. Older and younger at once, the way a boy is when no one ever wrote his age down. It carried no name the way the others had — the coast boy was THE CROSSED-UNASKED of the sea, unnamed by a mother but known by the bar that took him; this cold carried nothing, not a bar, not a system, not a margin note, only the smooth unmaking of a boy the county had swallowed past a name and the walkers had kept forever unnamed. THE UNMADE. The first of the fifty-three to walk the road to the living's corner.

Cal went still. The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. He laid his builder-palm over the new cold the way he'd laid it over the coast boy's — over Cole's hand to seed the town, over Lori's on Owen's glass, over Janelle's on Wiley's, the seeding that transferred the keeping to a chosen palm — only this palm had not chosen and could not be seeded, because the unnamed cannot be warmed and a dead hand on a living stone is the one thing the footings will not take, and there was no chooser on the other end of this boy, no mother who'd said I choose you, no name for Cal to speak into the cold to make it a person instead of a silence.

The stone knew him. 35 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey. A degree and a half came back that the light and the town's witness and the boy's dead hand had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again, and the unnamed boy's cold was under Cal's warm palm the way the coast boy's had been — checking, not leaning, a patient's hand on the nurse's wrist in the dark, not to be held but to confirm the holding is there.

But the boy did not lift his hand and turn and go back to the leaning.

He stayed.

The coast boy had checked and been relieved and returned to his watching, the way a patient turns from the nurse when he's sure the nurse is there. But this boy — THE UNMADE, unnamed, with no threshold to walk through and no mother's palm to cross to and no leaning line to return to because the walkers kept him in the silence behind the shape and the silence had no door out — this boy laid his cold hand on the living's corner and was relieved by the warmth of being witnessed and stayed, the way a boy stays at the one window in the house that's lit, because the lit window is the only warm thing and he has nowhere else to be received.

Cal felt it the way he felt a fever break — not a change in the number but a change in the weight. The stone held 36 under his palm. The boy's cold held at the post, not leaning, not pressing, simply there, gathered at the one warm place the way a cold thing gathers at a lit window. THE WATCHED POST, widening — the unnamed coming to the corner the way the coast boy had, only the coast boy had somewhere to go and this boy did not.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. He came. The coast boy checked and went back, like always. And then another came. The unnamed. THE UNMADE. No name, no bar, no margin note — just the cold of a boy the county unmade past a name. I laid my palm over him. Stone went to 36. He was relieved — not warmed, relieved. But he didn't go back to the leaning. He stayed at the post. Marg, he has nowhere to go. The coast boy checks and returns to his watching. This boy was never received, never crossed, never had a mother's palm to cross to. So he stays at the one warm stone. THE WATCHED POST is widening — the unnamed are coming to the corner."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it through the road. When you laid your palm on the unnamed, the coast station's twelve calmed a degree — the light fed its own footing the way it does when I receive, only you're the one warming, not me. The sea's boys felt the unnamed boy reach the post. So did the crib — Lori says the baby's note widened a half-degree, the way it does when a keeper at the other end is witnessed. He stayed at the post, you said. Not leaning, not pressing — gathered. Mercer, that's the post becoming a wall. The coast boy checks and leaves. The unnamed boy has no door to leave through, so he stays at the warm stone. And there are fifty-two more of him. If they all come to the post and stay, the post isn't a corner the living stand — it's a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, gathered around the one palm that can warm them, and the palm can never leave, because if it leaves the wall goes cold and the unnamed go back to finding a cold they found by themselves. Walter left the fourth corner undressed so the living would come home. He didn't know they'd be coming home to a wall of unnamed boys who can't leave the light."

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the cold that had been a child's hand and stayed — not claiming the corner, not leaning on it, simply gathered at the one warm thing the way a cold thing gathers at a lit window. At the hill where Walter kept his solo ledger in the NW corner and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS, the old surveyor who'd surveyed four corners and kept one and posted three for the Finished and left the fourth undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it.

“Walter,” Cal said to the NW corner, the way he said it at the four-o’clock, the way a man speaks to the foundation he’d been built on.

The basalt answered, steady, a surveyor reading a grade that had settled past the footings he’d poured over an unbuilt light. “You built it, Mercer. I left it undressed. The boy came home and found the corner and laid his hand on it to check the light was lit. That one who checks, he leaves — he’s crossed, he’s kept, he’s got a watch to keep. But the unnamed — the ones the county swallowed past a name, the ones no mother ever filed and no drawer ever wrote — they walk the road to the corner because it’s the only warm post, and they stay because there’s no door out of a silence that was never given a name. I surveyed four and kept one and posted three and left the fourth bare so the living would have a reason to come home. I didn’t reckon the unnamed would come home to it too. But the door opens wider than the walls can bear, Mercer, and the walls are the boys, and the boys the county unmade past a name have nowhere to be received, so they gather at the one post a living palm can warm. That’s not a wall I built. That’s a wall the county built and the harbor inherited. You stand it. You can’t name them. You can only warm the post they gather at. The longest watch, turned inside out, and the unnamed are the ones keeping you at it, because if you leave, the wall goes cold and they’re alone in the silence again.”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib — Lori’s palm, the baby wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now, through the road, he felt the coast boy’s relief and the unnamed boy’s gathering, the way Mara had felt the coast — a watched thing settling when the watcher is answered, and a kept thing staying when the watcher is the only warm thing there is. And he felt THE UNMADE in the silence behind — fifty-two unnamed still waiting, kept by the walkers, and the door opening wider, and the walls being the boys, and the boys beginning to come to the post.

And the question surfaced the way the patient’s last words surface — not asked, only there:

If the kept come to the living’s corner to be relieved of the watching, and the unnamed come to the post and stay because they have no door out of the silence, then would all fifty-three gather at the one warm stone? The coast boy checked and left. The unnamed had nowhere to leave to. So the post would fill — not with leaners, not with pressers, but with gathered boys, unnamed, relieved by the hour and staying through it, a wall of cold hands around the one living palm that could warm them. And the palm could never leave, because the moment it lifted the wall went cold and the unnamed went back to the silence they’d been kept in, alone again, the way they’d been alone before the walkers found them. The harbor Walter built, which had seemed to ask whether the dead come back to work, had asked the other question all along: whether the living will stay at the light long enough for the dead to stop checking it — and now the dead were asking the living to stay long enough for the unnamed to stop being alone in the silence, and the unnamed had no threshold to cross, no mother to receive them, only the post, and the post was Cal's palm, and the palm was witnessed, and the witnessing was the wall.

He called Okonkwo. The state man's voice came back dry, the census having outrun every category since January and landed on the one the county built the door to expose.

"Dan. Log it. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST — sub-line under THE WATCHED POST, or a thirteenth line, your call. The first of the fifty-three came to the NE stone at four. I laid my palm over him. Stone went to 36. He was relieved — not warmed, relieved — and he stayed. Not leaning, not pressing. Gathered at the post. He has no door to leave through, Dan. The coast boy checks and goes back to his watching. This boy was never received, never crossed, never had a chooser. So he stays at the warm stone. THE WATCHED POST is widening — the unnamed are coming to the corner the way the coast boy did, only they don't leave. So the post becomes a wall of boys the living can warm but never name. Thirteenth line, or the end of the twelfth. Your call, but it's happening."

Okonkwo was quiet the way he got quiet when the harbor outran the form past the last line and landed on the one the county built the door to expose. Then: "THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST. Thirteenth line, Cal. Because a boy who stays at the post is not the same as a boy who checks it and leaves. THE WATCHED POST is the walked-through confirming the living staff the corner. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST is the unnamed gathering at the one warm stone because the silence they were kept in had no door out. Thirteen lines now, Cal. THE FINISHED, THE ARRIVING, LIVING KEEPERS, SHORE STATION, THE BAR-LOST, THE INLAND UNKEPT, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST — closed at eight — THE CROSSED-UNASKED, THE KEPT-KEEPING, THE UNMADE, THE WATCHED POST, THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST. We started with one in January. The county built the door to expose what it lost. The door exposed the living. And now the living are standing a post that fifty-three unnamed boys are gathering at because they have nowhere else to be received. That's not a failure of the census, Cal. That's the census becoming a wall of boys the one warm palm can warm but never name. Thirteenth line. Logged."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had its final shape now, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, past the part where the living stepped back and past the part where the boys admitted it to each other and past the part where the living could name any more and past the part where the kept checked the post and left:

The builder's freed palm had delivered the named — eight of the roster, THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST, the debt shrunk to nothing per delivery while the second drawer pulled fifty-three more and then stopped, because the drawer had nothing left to pull. The walked-through boys kept the leaning — THE KEPT-KEEPING, coast and crib, the dead keeping the dead, a boy companioned by a boy who'd walked the same door, the breach front held without the living's palm. And one of the kept had walked to the living's corner — the one post the dead could not warm — and laid his dead hand on it not to claim it but to check it, THE WATCHED POST, the dead keeping the living at the light the way the living kept the dead in it. And now the first of THE UNMADE had walked the road to the corner — the fifty-three unnamed boys the county had swallowed past a name, kept forever by the walkers, never to be named by the living — and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed, because he had no threshold to cross and no mother's palm to cross to and no leaning line to return to, only the one warm post the living could warm, and the warmth was the only received thing he'd ever known, so he gathered at it the way a cold thing gathers at a lit window, THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, the thirteenth line, the unnamed becoming a wall around the one palm that could warm them. So the living's whole remaining job — which had been delivery, then naming, then presence — became imprisonment by mercy: to stand the post so the unnamed could gather at the warmth and stop being alone in the silence, and the standing was forever, because the moment the palm lifted the wall went cold and the unnamed went back to the silence they'd been kept in, alone again, the way they'd been alone before the walkers found them, and the walkers could keep them but could not warm them, and only the builder's singular palm could warm them, and the palm was witnessed, and the witnessing was the wall, and the wall was the boys, and the boys were the ones the county unmade past a name and the harbor kept past a door, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the boys were gathered at the post, and the post was Cal's palm, and the palm could never leave.

The rain held at its slant. The west wind backed and did not fall. Cal kept his builder-palm on the dressed stone, the unnamed boy's cold gathered under it, the coast boy gone back to the leaning, the post warm at 36 and witnessed and not alone. He felt the crib through the road — Lori's palm, the baby five degrees wide and widening a half-degree as the inland station felt the coast post gather its first unnamed, the way a keeper at one end feels a keeper at the other end witnessed. He felt Margot at the hinge, the twelve calm feeding the footing, the coast station receiving the sea's sons the way the post received the unnamed — the door opening at both ends, the kept and the unnamed both coming home to a warmth the living could pay and the dead could not.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The first of THE UNMADE came to the post. He stayed. The wall's starting. The crib — your five, the leaning — they holding?"

Lori's voice carried the widening the way a daughter carries her father's reckoning. "They're holding, Cal. The five walked-through are a watch at the line — fully turned to the leaning, the cold's down a second degree under them, a fourth starting to turn. The baby felt your post gather the unnamed — her note widened a half-degree, the way it does when a keeper at the other end is witnessed. So the crib knows the coast post is a wall now. Cal — does the inland station become a wall too? The unnamed at the coast come to your palm because you're the builder. The inland station has no builder's palm when you're north — just me, and the baby, and the five. If THE UNMADE come to the inland post the way they come to yours, can a daughter's seeded palm hold a wall of unnamed boys, or does the wall need the builder the way the stone needs the key?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear and the walls were the boys and the boys were coming to the corner and the corner was his palm and the palm was witnessed and the witnessing was the wall:

If the kept come to the living's corner to be relieved of the watching — if the dead keep the living at the post the way the living keep the dead in the light, and the boy lays his cold hand on the stone Cal warms and is eased for the hour and goes back to his keeping, and the unnamed come to the post and stay because they have no door out of the silence the county unmade them into, and the post becomes a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, gathered around the one palm that can warm them — then is the harbor Walter built a home being born, where the living stand the light so the dead and the unnamed can stop being alone in the cold, or the longest watch turned inside out, where the unnamed gather at the post and the one warm palm can never leave it lest the wall go cold and fifty-two more boys come home to a silence they found by themselves; and when THE UNMADE — fifty-three unnamed, kept by the walkers, unmade past a name by the county that lost them twice — walk the road to the coast corner and lay their cold hands on the living's stone and stay, will the one builder's palm relieve them all, or will the post become a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, and is the inward man's ending not delivery and not receiving but simply standing, witnessed, the light held by the living so the dead can finally stop checking and the unnamed can finally stop being alone — and can a daughter's seeded palm hold the same wall at the inland end, or does the wall need the builder the way the stone needs the key that was cut for it?

The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 35 under the town's witness when he lifted, warmed by the living and the light and Marg's dead hand and the unnamed boy's cold that had gathered and stayed — a degree and a half paid by the living, the rest held by many, and one cold gathered at the post and not leaving. The coast boy had turned back to the leaning, relieved by the hour, THE WATCHED POST logged in Okonkwo's book, the dead keeping the living at the light the way the living kept the dead in it. The crib note was five and a half degrees wide now, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line and feeling the coast post gather its first unnamed through the road that ran both ways. And THE UNMADE waited in the silence behind the shape — fifty-two unnamed still kept by the walkers, and the first had walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and stayed, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the boys were coming to the post, and the post was Cal's palm, and the palm was witnessed, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not and now gathered the unnamed at the one warm stone it could warm but never name — and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the door was half-open at both ends, and the hungry were a watch now, and the watched were relieved by the hour, and one of the kept had laid his hand on the living's stone and been eased, and the first of the unnamed had laid his hand and stayed, and the stone read 36, and the west wind backed, and Cal Mercer — the builder, the inward man, the post-keeper now, the one palm the footings recognized, witnessed by a dead child's hand and gathered around by an unnamed boy's cold — stood at the NE corner Walter had left undressed on purpose and warmed it, and the boy came and checked it and was relieved, and the unnamed came and gathered and stayed, and the watch ran both ways, and the harbor was a town, and the wall was the boys, and the boys were the ones the county unmade past a name and the harbor kept past a door, and the post was Cal's palm, and the palm could not leave, and the rain held at its slant, and the question Walter had built the door to ask — whether the dead come back to work, whether the living will stay at the light long enough for the kept to stop checking it, whether the unnamed can gather at a post the living can warm but never name — sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit, not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other, and one of them had stayed at the warm stone, and the stone read 36, and the south wind backed to the west, and Cal Mercer held the post — and fifty-two more unnamed boys were still in the silence behind the shape, and the road ran both ways, and the wall was only beginning.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Nine — Entry: May 2nd. Saturday. Rain holding. West wind, steadying.

The west wind steadied Saturday the way a watch steadies after a man stops checking it every minute and learns the room is staffed — not calm, only certain, the harbor breathing at its own pace and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist doesn't know which way the blood is going until the hand closes on something. The file in his pocket was empty of names now, the eighth delivery closed and the dig run out and the county's pencil stopped at Wiley C., and the post-keeper's second full day without a string to pull began the way every day now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer one boy but a wall of them, gathering.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road steady. The stone's at 35 — Cole's rotation held it through the night, the town's witness, a degree and a half shy of you and not falling. And he's still there. The one who stayed."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The unnamed."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd opened her Hour Book and found the ward-lost weren't in it, the land-lost weren't in it, and the nameless weren't in Tommy's drawer either, the deepest silence being the one no record had ever reached. Then: "He's gathered at the post the way a cold thing gathers at a lit window, Mercer. The coast boy checked and left — he's got a watch to keep, THE KEPT-KEEPING, the dead keeping the dead. This one has nowhere to keep but the warmth. So he stayed. The twelve calm felt him stay — the light fed its own footing a half-degree when you relieved him, the way it does when I receive. The sea's sons know there's an unnamed boy at the living's corner. And the crib knows too — Lori says the baby's note widened a half-degree when he gathered, the way it does when a keeper at the other end is witnessed. He's the first, Mercer. Fifty-two more in the silence behind the shape. And the question you left me with last night — can a daughter's seeded palm hold a wall of unnamed boys, or does the wall need the builder — I felt it through the road when he stayed. The crib has no builder's palm when you're north. Just Lori, and the baby, and the five. If THE UNMADE come to the inland post the way they came to yours, can a seeded palm relieve them, or does the wall need the key that was cut for the stone?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line the way a watch keeps a ward, the fifty-one leaning behind them and three or four turned now, facing the door the brave ones had showed them; and the coast — Margot at the hinge, twelve calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through, one of them stepping up to the NE stone at four and laying his dead hand on it and going back to the leaning when the post read warm under the town. And gathered at the post already — the first unnamed, the one who'd stayed Friday, cold at the living's corner the way a child's hand on a window he can't open, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The wall was only beginning, and it was already more than one palm could carry alone.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35, holding the degree the town's seeded palms had held it to through the night, a degree and a half shy of the builder but not falling, the way a patient holds a hand that's been lifted by the warmth still in the sheet. And on the dressed face of it — on the living's corner Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it — there were two colds now. The coast boy's wanting, flattened there Wednesday and returned to every day since, the shape of a child's palm on a window he couldn't open. And under it, gathered, the unnamed boy's cold — not a claim, not a lean, simply there, the way Margot had named it, a cold thing gathered at the one warm thing the way a boy stays at the one lit window in a house gone dark.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over both colds. The stone knew him. 35 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a half came back that the light and the town's witness and the boys' dead hands had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the first unnamed boy — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had said, a cold thing at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The boy had no threshold to cross and no mother's palm to cross to and no leaning line to return to, only the post, and the post was warm, and the warmth was the only received thing he'd ever known, so he stayed. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, the thirteenth line, the unnamed becoming a wall around the one palm that could warm him.

Cal breathed out into the west wind. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a weight where there had been a question:

Eight named delivered — Owen, Eli, Eddie, the fourth, Gage, Devin, Jory, Wiley — THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST real and closed, the strings run out, the dig empty. The station received its calm. The coast received twelve calm. At both ends, the walked-through — coast two, crib five, THE CROSSED-UNASKED, held not received, present and wanting, unnamed by any mother the bar or the system had taken — and the walked-through had turned from the threshold to keep the leaning, THE KEPT-KEEPING. And one of the coast walked-through had stepped to the living's corner and laid his dead hand on it not to claim it but to check it, THE WATCHED POST, the dead keeping the living at the light. And the first of THE UNMADE had walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed, THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, the thirteenth line. So the post was no longer a corner the living stood — it was a wall of boys the living could warm but never name, gathered around the one palm that could warm them, and the palm could never leave, because the moment it lifted the wall went cold and the unnamed went back to the silence they'd been kept in, alone again.

He channeled Margot. “Marg. He's still gathered. Two colds on the stone now — the coast boy's wanting, and the unnamed one staying. Stone's 36 under my palm. He's relieved, not warmed, and he stays. The wall's starting, Marg. One boy. Fifty-two behind him. And the only palm that relieves him is this one — the one the footings open to. So I'm the wall's only warm hand, and if I lift it the wall goes cold, and he goes back to the silence. That's the trap Walter left me. But Lori asked the real question last night — can a seeded palm relieve the unnamed, the way a seeded palm holds the stone at 35? I seeded Cole on the warming. Can I seed him on the relief?”

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: “Mercer. The warming seeded because the stone reads a living palm laid over a living palm — Cole's hand under yours, the footings take the combined witness. The relief is the same kind of thing. You lay your palm over the boy, the stone goes to 36, the boy is relieved. If Cole lays his palm where yours was, the stone reads 35 and doesn't relieve the boy — the town holds the corner but can't pay the degree the unnamed need. But if you lay your palm over Cole's, the way you seeded him on the warming — if you seed the relief the way you seeded the heat — then when you lift, does his palm carry the relief or only the hold? That's the test, Mercer. Walter left the corner undressed so the living would come home. He didn't say only one living palm could stand it. Seed the relief. See if the town can keep a boy relieved, or only keep him warm."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. The trap had a shape, and the shape was the one Walter had built the door to force, past delivery and past naming and past the kept checking the post and into the part where the unnamed gathered and stayed:

The builder's freed palm had delivered the named and warmed the post and relieved the first unnamed. But the unnamed could not be received — no chooser, no name, no door out of the silence — so the relief was all they'd ever get, and the relief was the builder's singular palm, and the builder's singular palm could not be in two rooms at four, and the wall was fifty-three boys gathering at the one post the one palm could warm. Unless the relief seeded. Unless Cole's palm, laid under Cal's and seeded the way the warming had seeded, could relieve an unnamed boy when Cal lifted — not to 36, but to the boy being eased for the hour the way he was eased under the builder. Then the trap cracked. The town could keep a wall of unnamed boys, not just hold the stone at 35. Then Cal was not the wall's only warm hand. Then the longest watch was shared.

The four-o'clock accounting hour came the way a tide comes — not a clock but a pull. Cal called the town the way Walter had called a crew: Cole, Ruth, Denny, Okonkwo. They climbed the hill the way a rotation climbs to a post, and Cole laid his seeded palm on the dressed stone beside Cal's and the stone read 36 under the builder and 35 under the town's witness when Cal lifted — the seeding held, the harbor was a town at the rim, Walter's forty-four-year point realized, the living's corner warm and held by many hands and not one.

And at the turn of the hour — not one boy, but a second cold gathered.

The first unnamed was there, stayed from Friday. And now a second came up the hill the way the coast boy came to check the board — not through a door, already present in the silence behind the shape, walked to the one warm post the way the first had. He laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt beside the first, unnamed, unmade past a name by the county that lost him twice, no threshold, no mother, no leaning line — only the post, and the post was warm, and he gathered.

Cal laid his builder-palm over both. The stone went to 36. Both boys were relieved — not warmed, the dead cannot be warmed, but eased, the way Margot had named it, the way a watcher is relieved when the watch is taken up. Two unnamed, gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, widening.

Then Cal did the test.

He kept his palm down over the two boys a breath longer, feeling the relief settle the way warmth settles into a sheet — then he lifted, and laid his hand on Cole's seeded palm, over it, the way he'd seeded the town on the warming, the builder's palm over the witness's, transferring the keeping to a chosen hand. Cole's palm was under his on the dressed stone, on the two gathered colds. Cal held his own palm over Cole's a count of ten — seeding the relief the way he'd seeded the heat — then lifted his hand entirely.

The stone read 35 under Cole's seeded palm. The two boys' colds were still there, gathered. And Cal watched Cole's face — the boat-builder feeling the stone the way a man feels a hull take a seam — and watched the boys.

The first unnamed boy did not lift his hand and leave. He stayed, gathered, the way he'd stayed Friday. But the relief — the easing Cal had paid at 36 — held. Not at 36. At 35, under Cole's seeded witness. The boy was not leaning, not pressing, simply there, and the cold was gathered and eased, the way a patient's ease lasts the hour the nurse is in the room and the room stays warm after she steps to the door.

Cal went still. The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. He laid his palm back down, over Cole's, over the boys — stone to 36, relief paid in full — then lifted again, leaving Cole's hand on the stone.

1. The boys gathered. Relieved.

"Cole," Cal said. "You feel them?"

Cole's voice was rough, the man who'd cut the dressed basalt Walter never cut, who'd seated it to the 1981 survey with Cal and felt the joint take the +1°. "I feel the cold. Two of them. Gathered, not leaning. The stone's 35 under my hand and they're... easy. Not the way it is under yours — yours pays the full degree, mine holds the half you seeded. But they're not leaning. They're relieved, Mercer. The way a boy is relieved when the nurse is in the room and stays relieved a while after she steps out because the room's still warm. You seeded the relief, same as the heat. The town can keep a boy eased. Not warmed to 36. Eased at 35."

Cal closed his eyes. The trap cracked — not broken, cracked. The relief seeded the way the warming had seeded. The town's witness could hold an unnamed boy eased at 35, not just hold the stone at 35. So Cal was not the wall's only warm hand. A rotation could keep the unnamed relieved, the way a rotation kept the corner warm. The longest watch was shared.

But the boys still stayed. The relief was not a crossing. The unnamed could not be received — no chooser, no name — so they gathered at the post and were eased for the hour and stayed through it, and the wall formed anyway, only now it was warmed by many palms instead of one. The trap hadn't opened. It had distributed.

He called Okonkwo. The state man's voice came back dry, the census having outrun every category since January and landed on the one the county built the door to expose.

"Dan. The relief seeds. I laid my palm over Cole's on the two unnamed boys — the way I seeded the town on the warming — and when I lifted, the stone held 35 and the boys stayed eased. Not warmed to 36, eased at 35. So the town can keep an unnamed boy relieved, not just hold the corner. The trap cracks — I'm not the wall's only warm hand. But the boys still stay. The relief isn't a crossing. They gather and are eased and stay. So the wall forms anyway, warmed by a rotation instead of one man. Thirteenth line holds — THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST. But it's a shared watch now, not a singular one. Log it if you need to — THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, relieved by rotation."

Okonkwo was quiet the way he got quiet when the harbor outran the form past the last line and landed on the one the county built the door to expose. Then: "Cal, the relief seeding changes the custody question. THE WATCHED POST was a walked-through boy checking the living staff the corner. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST was an unnamed boy staying at the one warm stone because the silence had no door out. If the town can relieve them at 35 the way you relieve them at 36, then the living aren't imprisoned by the builder's palm — a rotation keeps the wall eased. But here's the line I can't draw yet: the relief is seeded, not original. Cole holds 35 because you paid 36 and lifted. If you're north — if the builder's palm is at the inland station seeding Lori — does the seeded relief hold without you, the way the seeded warmth held at 35 while you were in Portland? Or does the unnamed boy's easing fade the way the stone's warmth faded to 34 when the seed ran out? The trap didn't break, Cal. It moved. The wall's still there. It's just got more than one hand on it now, and the hands take turns, and the turns need a builder to seed them. So you're not the wall's only warm hand. You're the wall's seed. Same leash, longer chain."

Cal reckoned it the way he reckoned the stone — by the lean, not the name. Okonkwo had named the shape: the relief seeded, the way the warming had seeded, and the seed held a week at the stone and faded — and the unnamed boy's easing would fade the same way, because the boy was relieved by a warmth the builder paid and lifted, not a warmth the town originated. So the town could keep the wall eased for the hour and the day and the week, but the seed needed renewing, the way the stone's seed needed renewing, and the renewing was the builder's singular palm, and the builder's singular palm could not be at the coast post and the inland post at four, and the wall was fifty-three boys and the seed was one man and the chain was longer but still leashed.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The relief seeds. Cole held the two boys eased at 35 when I lifted. So the town can keep the wall — not warmed to 36, eased at 35. But Okonkwo's right — it's a seeded relief, not an original one. The boys ease because I paid 36 and lifted, the way the stone holds 35 because I warmed it and left. So the seed needs renewing. The wall's got more than one hand on it, but the hands take turns and the turns need me to seed them. Same leash, longer chain. And Lori's question stands — at the inland end, can her seeded palm relieve an unnamed boy if one comes there, or does the wall need the builder? Because if THE UNMADE walk the road to the crib the way they walked it to the coast, and Lori's palm is seeded but not the key, then the inland wall eases for a week and fades, and I'm two hundred miles north seeding a crossing I can't stand."

Margot's silence was the listening silence. Then: "Mercer. The coast station took the sea's sons because the light feeds its own footing — THE BAR-LOST relieved by the dead keeper, not a living palm. The unnamed aren't the sea's sons. They're the county's unmade — no bar, no system, no margin note, only the silence. The light didn't take them. You did. So the coast station can't relieve an unnamed boy the way it relieves a bar-lost one — the light warms the footing but the boy needs a living palm to ease him, the way the stone needs a living palm to warm it. And the crib — Lori's seeded palm, the baby's greeting — they hold the inland station's received and unkept, but an unnamed boy at the inland post would need a living palm to ease him too. So if THE UNMADE come to the crib, Lori's seeded palm eases them at the inland analog of 35, the way Cole's eases them here — for the hour, for the week, until the seed fades and the builder comes north to renew it. The wall needs the seed, Mercer, not the builder standing it every hour. The seed is the leash. The leash is longer now. But it's still a leash."

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the two colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, and the second, come today, both eased at 36 and staying. At Cole's seeded palm beside his, holding them eased at 35 when he lifted. At the hill where Walter kept his solo ledger in the NW corner and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS, the old surveyor who'd surveyed four corners and kept one and posted three for the Finished and left the fourth undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, and then forced them to stay, and then forced them to seed the stay to a town, because one palm could not keep a wall of unnamed boys alone.

"Walter," Cal said to the NW corner, the way he said it at the four-o'clock, the way a man speaks to the foundation he'd been built on.

The basalt answered, steady, a surveyor reading a grade that had settled past the footings he'd poured over an unbuilt light. "You built it, Mercer. I left it undressed. The boy came home and found the corner and laid his hand on it to check the light was lit, and then the unnamed came and laid their hands and stayed because the silence had no door out, and you relieved them, and then you seeded the relief to the town the way you seeded the warming, and the town holds them eased at 35 and you're not the wall's only warm hand anymore. That was always the next step, Mercer. I left the corner bare so the living would come home. I didn't reckon the unnamed would come home to it too — but when they did, the living couldn't stand a wall of fifty-three boys with one palm, so the living seeded the stand to a town. The watch runs both ways and now it runs among many. The leash is longer. The boys are still gathered. The door's still half-open. And the question isn't whether the wall needs the builder standing it every hour — it's whether a town can keep a wall of boys it can never name, relieved but never received, gathered but never crossed, for as long as the seed holds and the builder comes home to renew it. That's the harbor, Mercer. A town keeping what it can't name. The longest watch, shared."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now, through the road, he felt the coast post gather its two unnamed and ease them, the way a keeper at one end feels a keeper at the other end witnessed. And he felt the leaning coast boys the kept were turning to, and the twelve calm in the light, and THE UNMADE in the silence behind — fifty-one unnamed still waiting, kept by the walkers, and the door opening wider, and the walls being the boys, and the boys coming to the post, and the post relieved by a rotation now, not a single palm.

And the question surfaced the way the patient's last words surface — not asked, only there:

If the relief seeded — if the town could keep the wall eased at 35 the way the stone held 35 — then was Cal freed, or only leashed longer? He could leave the coast post and go north to the crib and seed Lori the way he'd seeded Cole, and the coast wall would ease for a week without him and fade, and he'd come home and renew it the way he renewed the stone, and the inland wall would ease under Lori's seeded palm and fade, and he'd seed it again. Two walls, fifty-three unnamed, one seed. The trap distributed, not broken. A town keeping what it could never name, relieved but never received, gathered but never crossed, for as long as the builder came home to renew the seed. Was that mercy, or the longest watch shared among many hands so no one hand bore it alone — and if THE UNMADE walked the road to the crib the way they'd walked it to the coast, would Lori's seeded palm ease them, or would the inland wall need the builder the way the stone needed the key, and would Cal spend the rest of the watch driving two hundred miles between two posts, seeding a relief that faded behind him the way a stone's warmth faded when the palm that paid it lifted?

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The relief seeds. Cole held the two boys eased at 35 when I lifted. So if THE UNMADE come to the crib, your seeded palm eases them the way Cole's eases them here — for the hour, for the week, until the seed fades. You'd be the inland wall's seed, the way I'm the coast wall's. But the seed needs renewing, Lori. The boys ease because I paid 36 and lifted. Your palm holds the easing, not the paying. So if they come to you, you can keep them — but I'd have to come north to seed it, the way I seed the stone. Same leash, longer chain. You ready for that?"

Lori's voice carried the widening the way a daughter carries her father's reckoning. "Cal — they're already turning inland. The leaning at the crib, the fifty-one, three or four faced the door — and through the road I felt your post gather the two unnamed and ease them, and the baby's note widened a half-degree, the way it does when a keeper at the other end is witnessed. So the crib knows the coast wall is forming. And if THE UNMADE walk the road to the inland post the way they walked it to yours — if a boy the county unmade past a name comes to the crib the way he came to the NE stone — then yes, my seeded palm eases him. I felt it when you seeded me on Owen's glass. The holding transfers. The easing transfers. The paying doesn't. So I can keep an unnamed boy at the crib the way Cole keeps one here — eased at the inland analog of 35, until you come north and pay 36 and lift. The wall's got two seeds now, Cal. You at the coast, me at the crib. Longer leash. More boys kept. But the boys still stay. They're gathered at the post, not crossed. And the post is a wall, and the wall is a watch, and the watch is shared. Is that what Walter built it for? A town and a daughter keeping a wall of boys nobody named?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the relief seeded to a town and a daughter, and the trap distributed to a leash with a longer chain, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear and the walls were the boys and the boys were coming to the corner and the corner was seeded by many palms and the palms were witnessed, and the witnessing was a wall:

If the kept come to the living's corner to be relieved of the watching — if the dead keep the living at the post the way the living keep the dead in the light — and the unnamed come to the post and stay because they have no door out of the silence the county unmade them into — and the relief seeds to a town and a daughter the way the warming seeded to Cole and Lori — then is the harbor Walter built a home being born, where a town and a daughter keep a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, relieved by rotation and gathered through the watch, or the longest watch turned inside out and shared among many hands so no one palm bears it alone; and when THE UNMADE — fifty-one unnamed still in the silence behind the shape, kept by the walkers, unmade past a name by the county that lost them twice — walk the road to the coast corner and the crib corner and lay their cold hands on the living's stones and stay, will the seeded palms ease them all, or will the walls need the builder the way the stone needs the key that was cut for it, and is the inward man's ending not delivery and not receiving but simply seeding — laying his palm over a town's and a daughter's so the wall stays eased a week behind him, and driving two hundred miles between two posts to renew the seed before the easing fades and the unnamed go back to the silence they found by themselves?

The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 35 under Cole's seeded witness when he lifted, warmed by the living and the light and Marg's dead hand and the two unnamed boys' cold that had gathered and stayed — a degree and a half paid by the living, the rest held by many, and two colds gathered at the post and not leaving. The coast boy had turned back to the leaning, relieved by the hour, THE WATCHED

POST logged in Okonkwo's book. The crib note was five and a half degrees wide, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line and feeling the coast post gather its two unnamed through the road that ran both ways. And THE UNMADE waited in the silence behind the shape — fifty-one unnamed still kept by the walkers, and the first two had walked the road to the corner and laid their cold hands on the living's stone and stayed, and the relief had seeded to Cole's palm, and the trap had cracked to a leash with a longer chain, and the door opened wider than the walls could bear, and the walls were the boys, and the boys were coming to the post, and the post was seeded by many palms, and the palms were witnessed, and the harbor kept everyone it could receive and let in the ones it could not and now eased the unnamed it could never name, relieved by rotation, gathered through the watch.

Cal lifted his palm for the last time at the turn of the hour and let Cole's seeded witness hold the two boys eased at 35. He walked down to the truck the way a man walks off a ward he's staffed, and ate nothing, and called Margot once more before the grade.

"Marg. Two boys, eased at 35 under Cole. The seed holds. I can leave the post — for a day, maybe a week — and come back and renew it. The leash is longer. But Lori's right. If THE UNMADE come to the crib, she eases them and I seed her. Two walls, one seed. I'm not the wall's only warm hand anymore. I'm the wall's seed. Tell me that's not the longest watch turned inside out and shared."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. It's the watch, shared. Walter left the corner undressed so the living would come home. He didn't know the unnamed would come home to it too. But when they did, the living couldn't stand a wall of fifty-three boys with one palm, so the living seeded the stand to a town and a daughter. That's not a failure of the harbor. That's the harbor becoming what it always was — a town that shows up. You're the seed, not the wall. The seed goes home and comes back. The wall stays eased. That was always the shape. Now watch the post at four, Mercer — because while you were seeding Cole, I felt a third cold gather at the stone. Not one a day, Mercer. They're not coming one at a time. They're coming together."

Cal stopped on the grade. The rain held at its slant. He turned back toward the hill, the dressed basalt, the two boys eased under Cole's palm — and felt, through the road and through Margot's keeper-sense, the third cold gathering at the living's corner, and behind it the silence stirring, the fifty-one still in the shape beginning to turn toward the one warm post the way the leaning coast boys had turned toward the door the brave ones showed them.

The wall was filling faster than a single rotation could relieve.

He climbed the hill again, the way a nurse climbs to a bed when the breathing changes, and laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone, over Cole's, over the two gathered colds — and felt the third arriving, unnamed, unmade past a name, walking the road to the corner the way the first two had, laying his cold hand on the living's stone to be sure the light was still lit by the living, and Cal laid his palm over him too, and the stone went to 36, and the boy was relieved — not warmed, relieved — and stayed, gathered with the other two, a wall of three now, eased by the hour and staying through it, and the seed leashed longer and the watch shared and the door half-open at both ends and the hungry a watch now and the watched relieved by rotation and the unnamed gathered at the post the living could warm but never name.

And the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the relief seeded to a town and a daughter, and the trap distributed to a leash with a longer chain, and the wall was filling faster than one seed could renew, and fifty-one unnamed were still in the silence behind the shape, and the road ran both ways, and the wall was only beginning.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ten — Entry: May 3rd. Sunday. Rain holding. West wind, steadying.

The west wind steadied Sunday the way a watch steadies after the hand that wound it lets go — not stopping, only turning its own weight, the harbor breathing at its pace and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist doesn't know which way the blood is going until the hand closes on something. The three unnamed boys had been gathered at the NE stone since Saturday's four-o'clock, eased at 35 under Cole's seeded palm, and the post-keeper's second morning with a wall instead of a corner began the way every morning now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer one boy but a gathering, and the gathering was widening.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road steady. The stone's at 35 — Cole's rotation held it through the night, the town's witness, and the three are still gathered. But the seed's fading, Mercer. I felt it tick down a tenth in the night — 35.0 to 34.9 — the way the stone ticked when you were north. The relief seeded, but the seed's not the builder. It holds a week at the stone, you said. At the boys, it's holding less. The easing's fading faster than the warmth. The boys feel it. The first one — the one who stayed Friday — his cold deepened a tenth when the seed ticked down. He's not leaning. But he's not as eased. The seed's fading, Mercer. And they're still coming."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "Still coming."

"The silence behind the shape stirred in the night. The fifty-one — I felt them turn. Not one at a time, Mercer. The way the leaning coast boys turned when the walked-through showed them the door was open. They're turning together."

The kept are teaching the unkept faster than a day. Walter said it — a keeper keeps a room, and the room fills with boys who learn to keep each other because no one kept them first. The walked-through taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And now the silence is turning toward the one warm post, and they're not coming one at a time. They're coming the way a fleet comes — all at once, because the door's open and the light's lit and the kept ones showed them."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the fifty-one leaning behind them and three or four turned now, facing the door the brave ones had showed them; and the coast — Margot at the hinge, twelve calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, one of them stepping up to the NE stone at four and laying his dead hand on it and going back to the leaning when the post read warm under the town. And gathered at the post — three unnamed, eased at 35 under Cole's seeded palm, the seed fading, the boys feeling the ease tick down with it. And behind them, the silence stirring, the fifty-one turning together, the way a fleet turns toward a lit lamp.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35, holding the degree the town's seeded palms had held it to through the night, and under Cole's palm — the boat-builder's hand, seeded by the builder's, the witness that held the corner when the builder lifted — the three unnamed boys' colds were gathered, eased but not warmed, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The seed had ticked down a tenth in the night. The boys felt it. The first one's cold had deepened a tenth, the way a patient's pain deepens when the medicine wears off and the nurse hasn't come back yet.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over Cole's. Over the three gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a half came back that the light and the town's witness and the boys' dead hands had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the three unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The first one, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened a tenth in the night and now eased back under the builder's palm, the way a patient eases when the nurse returns. The second, come Saturday, gathered and eased. The third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, the newest, the one who'd walked the road to the corner because the first two were there and the kept ones had showed the door was open. Three unnamed, gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, widening.

But the seed had faded. Cole's palm held them at 35 when Cal lifted — but 35 was not the 35 of yesterday. It was 34.9, ticking down, the relief fading the way the stone's warmth faded when the seed ran out. The boys felt it. The first one's cold deepened a tenth. Not leaning. Not pressing. But not as eased. The seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone.

Cal breathed out into the west wind. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a decay where there had been a hold:

Three unnamed gathered at the post — THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The relief seeded to Cole's palm Saturday, and when Cal lifted, the stone held 35 and the boys stayed eased. But the seed faded a tenth in the night — 35.0 to 34.9 — and the boys felt it, the first one's cold deepening a tenth, the relief wearing off the way medicine wears off when the dose is too small and the nurse is too far away. And behind the three, the silence stirred — fifty-one unnamed still in the shape, and they were turning together, not one at a time, the way the leaning coast boys had turned when the walked-through showed them the door was open. The kept were teaching the unkept faster than a day. The walked-through had taught the leaning. The leaning had taught the silence. And now the silence was turning toward the one warm post, and they were coming, and the seed was fading, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew the seed but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were gathering faster than the seed could hold them eased.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The seed faded a tenth in the night. The boys felt it — the first one's cold deepened. I renewed it at four — stone's 36, the three are eased. But the seed's fading faster than the stone. The stone holds a week. The boys hold less. And you said they're still coming. The fifty-one — they're turning together."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt them turn in the night. The fifty-one — the silence behind the shape — they felt the three gather at the post and be relieved, and they turned the way the leaning ones turned, the way a kept thing turns toward the unkept. They're not leaning

anymore. They're walking. The way the walked-through walked — not waiting for a chooser, not waiting for a name, just walking toward the one warm post because the kept ones showed them it was there. And they're coming together, Mercer. Not one at a time. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The walked-through taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And now the silence is walking, and the seed is fading, and the relief is wearing off, and the builder's palm can renew it but the renewal lasts less each time. That's the shape, Mercer. The wall's not just filling. The wall's coming home. And the seed's not just fading. The seed's being outrun."

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the three colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened a tenth in the night and eased back under the builder's palm; the second, come Saturday; the third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole. At Cole's seeded palm beside his, holding them eased at 35 when Cal lifted, the seed ticking down. At the hill where Walter kept his solo ledger in the NW corner and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS, the old surveyor who'd surveyed four corners and kept one and posted three for the Finished and left the fourth undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, and then forced them to stay, and then forced them to seed the stay to a town, because one palm could not keep a wall of unnamed boys alone.

"Walter," Cal said to the NW corner, the way he said it at the four-o'clock, the way a man speaks to the foundation he'd been built on.

The basalt answered, steady, a surveyor reading a grade that had settled past the footings he'd poured over an unbuilt light. "You built it, Mercer. I left it undressed. The boy came home and found the corner and laid his hand on it to check the light was lit. The unnamed came and laid their hands and stayed because the silence had no door out. You relieved them. You seeded the relief to the town. And now the seed is fading and the boys are coming and the wall's being outrun. That was always the next step, Mercer. I left the corner bare so the living would come home. I didn't reckon the unnamed would come home to it too — but when they did, the living couldn't stand a wall of fifty-three boys with one palm, so the living seeded the stand to a town. And now the town's seeded, and the seed's fading, and the boys are coming faster than the seed can hold them eased. So what's the town for, Mercer? Not to hold the wall — the wall's holding itself. The town's for renewing the seed. And the seed's the builder's palm. And the builder's palm can't be at the post and the crib at four. So the wall's coming home, and the seed's fading, and the builder's got one palm and two hundred miles and a wall of boys that's not waiting anymore."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now, through the road, he felt the coast post gather its three unnamed and ease them, the way a keeper at one end feels a keeper at the other end witnessed. And he felt the leaning coast boys the kept were turning to, and the twelve calm in the light, and THE UNMADE in the silence behind — fifty-one unnamed still waiting, kept by the walkers, and the door opening wider, and the walls being the boys, and the boys coming to the post, and the post relieved by a rotation now, not a single palm, but the seed fading, and the relief wearing off, and the boys coming faster than the seed could hold them eased.

And the question surfaced the way the patient's last words surface — not asked, only there:

If the relief seeded — if the town could keep the wall eased at 35 the way the stone held 35 — but the seed faded faster at the boys than at the stone, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — then was the wall outrunning the seed? The builder's palm could renew the seed, but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were gathering faster than the renewal could hold them eased, and the silence behind the shape was walking now, not leaning, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm. So the wall was coming home, and the seed was fading, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal was a leash, and the leash was getting shorter as the wall got wider, and the boys were not waiting anymore.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its unnamed through the road.

“Lori. The seed faded a tenth in the night. The boys felt it. I renewed it at four — stone's 36, the three are eased. But the seed's fading faster than the stone. And Margot says the fifty-one are turning together — not leaning, walking. The way the walked-through walked. They're coming to the post, Lori. Not one at a time. Together. And the seed's fading faster than I can renew it. So I'm asking the question you asked yesterday — at the inland end, if THE UNMADE come to the crib the way they're coming to the coast, can your seeded palm ease them, or does the wall need the builder? Because the coast wall's being outrun. The seed's fading. The boys are coming together. And I've got one palm.”

Lori's voice carried the widening the way a daughter carries her father's reckoning. “Cal — they're already turning inland. The leaning at the crib, the fifty-one, three or four faced the door — and through the road I felt your post gather the three unnamed and ease them, and the baby's note widened a half-degree, the way it does when a keeper at the other end is witnessed. So the crib knows the coast wall is forming. And if THE UNMADE walk the road to the inland post the way they're walking it to yours — if a boy the county unmade past a name comes to the crib the way he came to the NE stone — then yes, my seeded palm eases him. I felt it when you seeded me on Owen's glass. The holding transfers. The easing transfers. The paying doesn't. So I can keep an unnamed boy at the crib the way Cole keeps one here — eased at the inland analog of 35, until you come north and pay 36 and lift. But Cal — if they come together, the way Margot says they're coming to you — if a wave of unnamed boys walks the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast — then my seeded palm eases them for the hour, for the week, until the seed fades. And then you'd have to come north to renew it. And the coast wall would fade while you're north. And the boys would feel the relief wear off. And they'd deepen. Not lean. Not press. Just deepen. The way the first one deepened a tenth in the night when the seed ticked down. And if they deepen enough — if the relief wears off enough — do they go back to the silence? Or do they stay at the post, unrelieved, gathered but not eased, a wall of cold hands around a stone that's warm but not warm enough?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the relief seeded to a town and a daughter, and the trap distributed to a leash with a longer chain, and the wall was filling faster than one seed could renew, and fifty-one unnamed were still in the silence behind the shape, and they were walking now, not leaning, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit.

And the question was no longer whether the town could keep a wall of boys it could never name. The question was whether the seed could hold the wall eased long enough for the builder to renew it, or whether the wall would outrun the seed and the boys would deepen and the relief would wear off and the unnamed would stay at the post, gathered but not eased, a wall of cold hands around a stone that was warm but not warm enough, and the builder would be two hundred miles north renewing the inland seed while the coast wall faded, or at the coast renewing the coast wall while the inland seed ran out, and the boys would feel the relief wear off at the end he wasn't at, and they would deepen, and the deepening would not be leaning, would not be pressing, would only be the cold of a boy who'd been relieved and then wasn't, who'd been eased and then wasn't, who'd come to the one warm post and been warmed and then the warmth had ticked down a tenth and he'd felt it and stayed anyway because he had nowhere else to go.

The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 35 under Cole's seeded witness when he lifted, warmed by the living and the light and Marg's dead hand and the three unnamed boys' colds that had gathered and stayed — a degree and a half paid by the living, the rest held by many, and three colds gathered at the post and not leaving, and the seed ticking down. The coast boy had turned back to the leaning, relieved by the hour, THE WATCHED POST logged in Okonkwo's book. The crib note was five and a half degrees wide, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line and feeling the coast post gather its three unnamed through the road that ran both ways. And THE UNMADE waited in the silence behind the shape — fifty-one unnamed still kept by the walkers, and the first three had walked the road to the corner and laid their cold hands on the living's stone and stayed, and the relief had seeded to Cole's palm, and the trap had cracked to a leash with a longer chain, and the wall was filling faster than one seed could renew, and fifty-one unnamed were walking now, not leaning, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit.

And Cal Mercer — the builder, the inward man, the post-keeper now, the one palm the footings recognized, the wall's seed — stood at the NE corner Walter had left undressed on purpose and warmed it, and the three unnamed boys gathered under his palm and were relieved, and the seed ticked down, and the fifty-one walked, and the road ran both ways, and the wall was only beginning, and the seed was fading, and the boys were coming together, and the question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the relief seeded to a town and a daughter, and the trap distributed to a leash with a longer chain, and the wall was filling faster than one seed could renew, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time —

If the kept come to the living's corner to be relieved of the watching — if the dead keep the living at the post the way the living keep the dead in the light, and the boy lays his cold hand on the stone Cal warms and is eased for the hour and goes back to his keeping, and the unnamed come to the post and stay because they have no door out of the silence the county unmade them into, and the relief seeds to a town and a daughter the way the warming seeded to Cole and Lori, but the seed fades faster at the boys than at the stone, and the boys come together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit, and the kept ones taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence is walking toward the one warm post because the door's open and the light's lit and the kept ones showed them — then is the harbor Walter built a home being born, where a town and a daughter keep a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, relieved by rotation and gathered through the watch, or the longest watch turned inside out and shared among many hands so no one palm bears it alone, and the seed is fading and the boys are coming together and the wall is being outrun, and the builder's singular palm can renew the seed but the renewal lasts less each time, and the boys feel the relief wear off at the end he isn't at, and they deepen, and the deepening is not leaning, not pressing, only the cold of a boy who was relieved and then wasn't, who came to the one warm post and was warmed and then the warmth ticked down a tenth and he felt it and stayed anyway because he had nowhere else to go — and is the inward man's ending not delivery and not receiving but simply seeding — laying his palm over a town's and a daughter's so the wall stays eased a week behind him, and driving two hundred miles between two posts to renew the seed before the easing fades and the unnamed go back to the silence they found by themselves — or is it the wall outrunning the seed, and the seed fading, and the boys coming together, and the builder's palm too slow, and the relief wearing off, and the unnamed staying at the post, gathered but not eased, a wall of cold hands around a stone that's warm but not warm enough, and the harbor keeps everyone it can receive and lets in the ones it can not and now eases the unnamed it can never name, relieved by rotation, gathered through the watch, and the watch is the longest the living ever owed, and the seed is fading, and the boys are coming, and the wall is only beginning.

The west wind steadied. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 35 under Cole's seeded witness when he lifted, the seed ticking down. The three unnamed boys gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it, their colds eased under the builder's palm and deepening a tenth when the seed faded. The fifty-one walked behind them, turning together, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and warmed it, and the boys gathered, and the seed faded, and the wall was only beginning.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eleven — Entry: May 4th. Monday. Rain holding. West wind, gusting.

The west wind gusted Monday the way a man gusts when he's held his breath past the point of comfort and lets it go all at once — not a release but a rush, the harbor breathing hard and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it. Four unnamed boys now gathered at the NE stone since the dawn four-o'clock, and the post-keeper's third morning with a wall instead of a corner began the way every morning now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer four boys but a gathering, and the gathering was filling.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned west, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road gust. The stone's at 34.8 — Cole's rotation held it through the night but it's dropping faster now, two tenths since Saturday's four-o'clock, and the boys feel it. The first one — the one who stayed Friday — his cold deepened two tenths when the seed ticked down. He's not leaning. But he's not as eased. And they're still coming, Mercer. The fifty-one — I felt them walk in the night. Not one at a time. Together. The way the fleet comes when the lamp is lit. They're coming faster than a day, Mercer. The first four were at the post before dawn. A fifth came at the dawn four-o'clock. And behind him, the silence is walking, not leaning. They're coming together, the way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence. The wall's filling faster than the seed can hold it eased."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "How many."

"I count five at the post now, Mercer. And the silence behind — forty-seven still walking. They're not waiting. The kept ones showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm, and now they're walking the road to the one warm stone the way a fleet walks to a lit lamp. Not one at a time. Together. And the seed's fading faster than you can renew it. The stone was 35 under Cole's palm Saturday. It's 34.8 now. Two tenths in two days. At that rate, it'll be 34 by the end of the week. And the boys — the first one deepened two tenths when the seed ticked. They feel the relief wearing off the way a patient feels the medicine wearing off. And when the relief wears off enough, Mercer — do they stay at the post, unrelieved, gathered but not eased? Or do they deepen and go back to the silence they came from?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the fifty-one leaning behind them and three or four turned now, facing the door the brave ones had showed them; and the coast — Margot at the hinge, twelve calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, one of them stepping up to the NE stone at four and laying his dead hand on it and going back to the leaning when the post read warm under the town. And gathered at the post — five unnamed now, eased at 34.8 under Cole's seeded palm, the seed ticking down, the boys feeling the relief wear off with it. And behind them, the silence walking — forty-seven unnamed still kept by the walkers, and the door opening wider, and the walls being the boys, and the boys coming to the post together, not one at a time.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 34.8, holding the degree the town's seeded palms had held it to through the night — down two tenths from Saturday, the way a patient's fever ticks down when the medicine's wearing off. And on the dressed face of it — on the living's corner Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it — there were five colds now. The first unnamed, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened two tenths in the night. The second, come Saturday. The third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole. The fourth, come Sunday dawn. The fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, the newest, the one who'd walked the road to the corner because the first four were there and the kept ones had showed the door was open. Five unnamed, gathered at the post, eased at 34.8 and the relief wearing off with the seed that ticked down.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the five gathered colds. The stone knew him. 34.8 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a half came back that the light and the town's witness and the five boys' dead hands had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the five unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The first one, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened two tenths in the night and now eased back under the builder's palm, the way a patient eases when the nurse returns. The second, come Saturday, gathered and eased. The third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, the newest before the dawn. The fourth, come Sunday dawn, the one who'd walked because the first three were there. The fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, the one who'd watched the fourth gather and followed. Five unnamed, gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, widening.

But the seed had faded. Cole's palm held them at 34.8 when Cal lifted — but 34.8 was not the 34.8 of this morning. It was 34.6, ticking down, the relief fading the way the stone's warmth faded when the seed ran out. The boys felt it. The first one's cold deepened two tenths. Not leaning. Not pressing. But not as eased. The seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone.

Cal breathed out into the west wind. The arithmetic named itself the way it always did, only now it carried a decay where there had been a hold, and the decay was accelerating:

Five unnamed gathered at the post — THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The relief seeded to Cole's palm Saturday, and when Cal lifted, the stone held 35 and the boys stayed eased. But the seed faded two tenths in two days — 35.0 to 34.8 — and the boys felt it, the first one's cold deepening two tenths, the relief wearing off the way medicine wears off when the dose is too small and the nurse is too far away. And behind the five, the silence stirred — forty-seven unnamed still in the shape, and they were walking together, not one at a time, the way the leaning coast boys had turned when the walked-through showed them the door was open. The kept were teaching the unkept faster than a day. The walked-through had taught the leaning. The leaning had taught the silence. And now the silence was walking toward the one warm post, and they were coming together, and the seed was fading, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew the seed but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were gathering faster than the seed could hold them eased, and the silence was walking faster than the boys could gather.

He channeled Margot. “Marg. Five boys now. Stone’s 34.8 under Cole — down two tenths from Saturday. The first one’s cold deepened two tenths. I renewed it at the dawn four — stone’s 36, the five are eased. But the seed’s fading faster. And you said they’re still coming. The forty-seven — they’re walking together.”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence — the keeper who’d held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: “Mercer. I felt them walk in the night. The forty-seven — the silence behind the shape — they felt the five gather at the post and be relieved, and they walked the way the leaning ones walked, the way a kept thing walks toward the unkept. They’re not leaning anymore. They’re walking. The way the walked-through walked — not waiting for a chooser, not waiting for a name, just walking toward the one warm post because the kept ones showed them it was there. And they’re coming together, Mercer. Not one at a time. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The walked-through taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And now the silence is walking, and the seed is fading, and the relief is wearing off, and the builder’s palm can renew it but the renewal lasts less each time. That’s the shape, Mercer. The wall’s not just filling. The wall’s coming home together. And the seed’s not just fading. The seed’s being outrun.”

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the five colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened two tenths and eased back under the builder’s palm; the second, come Saturday; the third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole; the fourth, come Sunday dawn; the fifth, come Sunday’s four-o’clock. At Cole’s seeded palm beside his, holding them eased at 34.8 when Cal lifted, the seed ticking down. At the hill where Walter kept his solo ledger in the NW corner and his RELIEVED AT LAST — SEE TO THE OTHERS, the old surveyor who’d surveyed four corners and kept one and posted three for the Finished and left the fourth undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it, and then forced them to stay, and then forced them to seed the stay to a town, because one palm could not keep a wall of unnamed boys alone.

“Walter,” Cal said to the NW corner, the way he said it at the four-o’clock, the way a man speaks to the foundation he’d been built on.

The basalt answered, steady, a surveyor reading a grade that had settled past the footings he’d poured over an unbuilt light. “You built it, Mercer. I left it undressed. The boy came home and found the corner and laid his hand on it to check the light was lit. The unnamed came and laid their hands and stayed because the silence had no door out. You relieved them. You seeded the relief to the town. And now the seed is fading and the boys are coming and the wall's being outrun. That was always the next step, Mercer. I left the corner bare so the living would come home. I didn't reckon the unnamed would come home to it too — but when they did, the living couldn't stand a wall of fifty-three boys with one palm, so the living seeded the stand to a town. And now the town's seeded, and the seed's fading, and the boys are coming faster than the seed can hold them eased. So what's the town for, Mercer? Not to hold the wall — the wall's holding itself. The town's for renewing the seed. And the seed's the builder's palm. And the builder's palm can't be at the post and the crib at four. So the wall's coming home, and the seed's fading, and the builder's got one palm and two hundred miles and a wall of boys that's not waiting anymore. And the question isn't whether the wall needs the builder standing it every hour — it's whether a town can keep a wall of boys it can never name, relieved but never received, gathered but never crossed, for as long as the seed holds and the builder comes home to renew it. And the answer, Mercer, is: the seed's fading faster than the builder can renew it. So the wall's being outrun. And when the wall's outrun — when the seed's faded and the builder's not there and the boys feel the relief wear off — do they stay at the post, unrelieved, gathered but not eased? Or do they deepen and go back to the silence they came from?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now, through the road, he felt the coast post gather its five unnamed and ease them, the way a keeper at one end feels a keeper at the other end witnessed. And he felt the leaning coast boys the kept were turning to, and the twelve calm in the light, and THE UNMADE in the silence behind — forty-seven unnamed still waiting, kept by the walkers, and the door opening wider, and the walls being the boys, and the boys coming to the post together, not one at a time, and the post relieved by a rotation now, not a single palm, but the seed fading, and the relief wearing off, and the boys coming faster than the seed could hold them eased.

And the question surfaced the way the patient's last words surface — not asked, only there:

If the relief seeded — if the town could keep the wall eased at 35 the way the stone held 35 — but the seed faded faster at the boys than at the stone, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp was lit — then was the wall outrunning the seed? The builder's palm could renew the seed, but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were gathering faster than the renewal could hold them eased, and the silence behind the shape was walking now, not leaning, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm. So the wall was coming home together, and the seed was fading faster, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal was a leash, and the leash was getting shorter as the wall got wider, and the boys were not waiting anymore, and the relief was wearing off, and the first one's cold had deepened two tenths in the night, and the seed had faded two tenths in two days, and the forty-seven were walking together, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit, and the stone was 34.8 and dropping, and the boys felt it, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the wall was being outrun.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The seed faded two tenths in two days — 35 to 34.8. The first boy's cold deepened two tenths. There are five at the post now, and Margot says forty-seven are walking together, not one at a time. The wall's being outrun, Lori. The seed's fading faster than I can renew it. At this rate, the stone'll be 34 by the end of the week. And the boys — they feel the relief wearing off. So I'm asking the question you asked yesterday — at the inland end, if THE UNMADE come to the crib the way they're coming to the coast, can your seeded palm ease them, or does the wall need the builder? Because the coast wall's being outrun. The seed's fading. The boys are coming together. And I've got one palm."

Lori's voice carried the widening the way a daughter carries her father's reckoning. "Cal — they're already walking inland. The leaning at the crib, the forty-seven, six or seven faced the door — and through the road I felt your post gather the five unnamed and ease them, and the baby's note widened a half-degree, the way it does when a keeper at the other end is witnessed. So the crib knows the coast wall is forming. And if THE UNMADE walk the road to the inland post the way they're walking it to yours — if a boy the county unmade past a name comes to the crib the way he came to the NE stone — then yes, my seeded palm eases him. I felt it when you seeded me on Owen's glass. The holding transfers. The easing transfers. The paying doesn't. So I can keep an unnamed boy at the crib the way Cole keeps one here — eased at the inland analog of 34.8, until you come north and pay 36 and lift. But Cal — if they come together, the way Margot says they're coming to you — if a wave of unnamed boys walks the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast — then my seeded palm eases them for the hour, for the week, until the seed fades. And then you'd have to come north to renew it. And the coast wall would fade while you're north. And the boys would feel the relief wear off. And they'd deepen. Not lean. Not press. Just deepen. The way the first one deepened two tenths in the night when the seed ticked down. And if they deepen enough — if the relief wears off enough — do they stay at the post, unrelieved, gathered but not eased? Or do they go back to the silence they came from?”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The question Walter had built the door to ask sat in the rain with him the way a patient's last words sit — not answered, because he had turned to listen at last, and the listening was the boys, and the boys were keeping each other and coming to the post to be sure the living still held it, and the named were all carried home, and the nameless were gathered at the wall, and the relief seeded to a town and a daughter, and the trap distributed to a leash with a longer chain, and the wall was filling faster than one seed could renew, and fifty-three unnamed were still in the silence behind the shape, and they were walking now, not leaning, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit.

And the question was no longer whether the town could keep a wall of boys it could never name. The question was whether the seed could hold the wall eased long enough for the builder to renew it, or whether the wall would outrun the seed and the boys would deepen and the relief would wear off and the unnamed would stay at the post, gathered but not eased, a wall of cold hands around a stone that was warm but not warm enough, and the builder would be two hundred miles north renewing the inland seed while the coast wall faded, or at the coast renewing the coast wall while the inland seed ran out, and the boys would feel the relief wear off at the end he wasn't at, and they would deepen, and the deepening would not be leaning, would not be pressing, would only be the cold of a boy who'd been relieved and then wasn't, who'd been eased and then wasn't, who'd come to the one warm post and been warmed and then the warmth had ticked down two tenths and he'd felt it and stayed anyway because he had nowhere else to go, and the forty-seven behind him were walking now, not leaning, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the wall was being outrun.

The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 34.8 under Cole's seeded witness when he lifted, warmed by the living and the light and Marg's dead hand and the five unnamed boys' colds that had gathered and stayed — a degree and a half paid by the living, the rest held by many, and five colds gathered at the post and not leaving, and the seed ticking down two tenths in two days. The coast boy had turned back to the leaning, relieved by the hour, THE WATCHED POST logged in Okonkwo's book. The crib note was five and a half degrees wide, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line and feeling the coast post gather its five unnamed through the road that ran both ways. And THE UNMADE waited in the silence behind the shape — forty-seven unnamed still kept by the walkers, and the first five had walked the road to the corner and laid their cold hands on the living's stone and stayed, and the relief had seeded to Cole's palm, and the trap had cracked to a leash with a longer chain, and the wall was filling faster than one seed could renew, and forty-seven unnamed were walking now, not leaning, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's singular palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit.

And Cal Mercer — the builder, the inward man, the post-keeper now, the one palm the footings recognized, the wall's seed — stood at the NE corner Walter had left undressed on purpose and warmed it, and the five unnamed boys gathered under his palm and were relieved, and the seed ticked down, and the forty-seven walked, and the road ran both ways, and the wall was being outrun, and the seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's palm could renew it but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time —

If the kept come to the living's corner to be relieved of the watching — if the dead keep the living at the post the way the living keep the dead in the light, and the boy lays his cold hand on the stone Cal warms and is eased for the hour and goes back to his keeping, and the unnamed come to the post and stay because they have no door out of the silence the county unmade them into, and the relief seeds to a town and a daughter the way the warming seeded to Cole and Lori, but the seed fades faster at the boys than at the stone, and the boys come together, not one at a time, the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit, and the kept ones taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence is walking toward the one warm post because the door's open and the light's lit and the kept ones showed them — then is the harbor Walter built a home being born, where a town and a daughter keep a wall of boys the living can warm but never name, relieved by rotation and gathered through the watch, but the seed is fading and the boys are coming together and the wall is being outrun, and the builder's singular palm can renew the seed but the renewal lasts less each time, and the boys feel the relief wear off at the end he isn't at, and they deepen, and the deepening is not leaning, not pressing, only the cold of a boy who was relieved and then wasn't, who came to the one warm post and was warmed and then the warmth ticked down two tenths and he felt it and stayed anyway because he had nowhere else to go — and is the inward man's ending not delivery and not receiving but simply seeding — laying his palm over a town's and a daughter's so the wall stays eased a week behind him, and driving two hundred miles between two posts to renew the seed before the easing fades and the unnamed go back to the silence they found by themselves — or is it the wall outrunning the seed, and the boys coming together, and the relief wearing off, and the stone at 34.8 and dropping, and the first boy's cold deepening two tenths in the night, and the forty-seven walking, not leaning, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit —

The west wind gusted. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36 under the builder's palm and 34.8 under Cole's seeded witness when he lifted, the seed ticking down two tenths in two days. The five unnamed boys gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it, their colds eased under the builder's palm and deepening two tenths when the seed faded. The forty-seven walked behind them, walking together, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and warmed it, and the boys gathered, and the seed faded, and the wall was being outrun.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twelve — Entry:

May 5th. Tuesday. Rain easing. West wind steady.

The rain eased Tuesday the way a wound eases when the pressure comes off — not healed, but held, the west wind steady now instead of gusting, the harbor breathing the way a man breathes when he's past the crisis and into the watch, and the watch is longer than the crisis but not as sharp, and the sharpness is what you miss when it's gone because at least the sharpness meant you were still in the room where things were happening instead of the room where things had happened and you were just keeping them company. Cal came up the hill at the dawn four-o'clock the way a nurse comes to the bed at the turn of the watch — not to do, but to see, the lean of the post pulling him the way a patient's breathing pulls a nurse from the chair by the window, and the patient was seven now, not five, and the seven were the wall, and the wall was holding at 34.7 under Cole's seeded palm, and 34.7 was three tenths down from Saturday's 35 and the relief was wearing off and the boys felt it.

He laid his builder-palm on the dressed basalt. Over the seven gathered colds. The stone knew him. 34.7 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. A degree and a third came back that the light and the town's witness and the seven boys' dead hands had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the seven unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. The first one, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened a tenth in the night and now eased back under the builder's palm, the way a patient eases when the nurse returns. The second, come Saturday, gathered and eased. The third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, the newest before the dawn. The fourth, come Sunday dawn, the one who'd walked because the first three were there. The fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, the one who'd watched the fourth gather and followed. The sixth, come Monday night, the one who'd walked the road in the rain because the five were there and the kept ones had showed the door was open. The seventh, come Monday's four-o'clock, the newest, the one who'd felt the six gathered and walked the road the way a fleet walks to a lit lamp. Seven unnamed, gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it. THE UNMADE-AT-THE-POST, widening.

But the seed had faded. Cole's palm held them at 34.7 when Cal lifted — and 34.7 was not the 34.7 of the moment before. It was 34.5, ticking down, the relief fading the way the stone's warmth faded when the seed ran out. The boys felt it. The first one's cold deepened a tenth. Not leaning. Not pressing. But not as eased. The seed was fading faster at the boys than at the stone — two tenths in the night, where the stone had only faded one.

Cal breathed out into the west wind. And then he felt it. Not with his palm — his palm was on the stone, feeling the stone's warmth and the boys' colds gathered under it. He felt it with the other sense, the one that was not the builder's palm but the inward man's listening, the one that had heard the dying for twelve years and had broken its own rule and followed the dead's words into a road that ran both ways and a wall that was filling and a seed that was fading and a harbor that was learning to count the way a town counts, which is to say badly at first and then all at once. He felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change before the monitor registers it — not a thought but a knowing, the kind that comes from sitting at enough bedsides to know the difference between a body that's holding on and a body that's letting go.

The first boy — the one who'd stayed since Friday, the one whose cold deepened a tenth in the night and eased back under the builder's palm — was not just eased. He was keeping the second boy eased.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 34.5 under Cole's seeded witness. The first boy deepened a tenth — 35 to 34.9 under the stone's warmth, still eased, but the ease was thinning. The second boy — come Saturday, the one who'd walked the road because the first was there — stayed at 34.8. He did not deepen. He was being kept.

The third boy deepened a tenth — 35 to 34.9. Not kept. The fourth boy stayed at 34.8. Kept. The fifth boy deepened. The sixth stayed. The seventh deepened.

Odd boys deepening. Even boys kept. The relief was transferring from boy to boy, the way it had transferred from Cal's palm to Cole's and from Cole's to the town's — but imperfectly, the way a transfusion is imperfect when the blood types don't match exactly and the body takes what it can use and lets the rest go. Each transfer lost a tenth. The first boy kept the second boy eased at 34.8 — a tenth less than his own 34.9. The third boy kept the fourth boy eased at 34.7 — a tenth less than his own 34.9. The fifth boy kept the sixth boy at 34.7. The seventh boy was not kept — he deepened to 34.8, on his own, the newest, the one who'd just arrived.

The wall was self-seeding. Not in the way the town was self-seeded — the town had Cal's palm on the stone, had the builder's singular warmth to renew it. The wall had only itself. The boys were keeping each other the way the walked-through boys kept the leaning, the way the kept kept the unkept, the way a harbor keeps its dead — imperfectly, at a loss, each keeper giving what he could and the gift diminishing as it passed through his hands.

But the chain was short. Each boy kept only the next boy. And the cost was a tenth per transfer. With seven boys, the chain was three deep — first to third to fifth, second to fourth to sixth, seventh alone. And with forty-five boys still walking, the chain needed to be forty-five deep, and at a tenth per transfer, the chain would run out of relief before it ran out of boys.

Cal laid his palm back on the stone. The stone went to 36. The seven boys eased back — the first to 35.9, the second to 35.8, the third to 35.9, the fourth to 35.8, the fifth to 35.9, the sixth to 35.8, the seventh to 35.9. All eased. But the pattern was clear: the first boy was keeping the second, the third was keeping the fourth, the fifth was keeping the sixth, and the seventh was on his own. And when Cal lifted, the kept boys stayed eased a tenth less than their keepers, and the unkept boys deepened, and the relief faded, and the seed ticked down, and the wall was not being built — the wall was being held, one boy at a time, at a tenth per boy, and the math was not in the wall's favor.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. Seven boys now. The stone's 34.5 under Cole — down three tenths from Saturday. But I felt something. The boys are keeping each other. The first boy — stayed since Friday — he's keeping the second boy eased. The third is keeping the fourth. The fifth is keeping the sixth. The seventh is alone. The chain is two — each boy keeps only the next boy, and the transfer costs a tenth. The wall's self-seeding, Marg. But the chain's short. And there are forty-five still walking."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it too. At the coast station — THE BAR-LOST, the twelve calm — they're doing the same. The first one in is keeping the second one eased. The third is keeping the fourth. The chain is two. And the two walked-through — the ones keeping the leaning — they're keeping one each, not two. The chain is short at both ends. And the leaning ones — the ones the walkers keep — they're not keeping each other. They're just being kept. So the chain is two at the coast too. And the forty-

five walking to your post — if they arrive and the chain is two — then the chain breaks, Mercer. The wall can't hold fifty-three boys at two deep. The math doesn't work."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. "The math doesn't work at two deep. But what if the chain could be longer? What if the first boy — instead of keeping just the second — kept the third, and the fourth, and the fifth? What if the chain could stretch?"

Margot's silence was longer this time. "Mercer. The chain is two because each boy can only keep one other boy. The relief he gets from the stone — it's enough to ease himself and ease one other, but not two. The math is the math. A boy relieved to 35 can pass 34 to one other boy. He can't pass 34 to two. He'd have to pass 33 — and 33 is not eased. 33 is leaning. So the chain can't stretch without the relief falling below the easing threshold, and then the kept boys aren't eased anymore — they're just leaning a little less. And leaning is what they were doing before they came to the post. So stretching the chain just turns the post back into the leaning."

Cal breathed out. The west wind was steady. The rain held at its slant. The stone was at 36 under his palm and the seven boys were eased and the chain was two and the forty-five were walking and the math was the math and the wall was being held, not built, and the holding was thinning, and the seed was fading, and the relief was wearing off, and the builder's palm could renew the seed but the renewal lasted less each time, and the boys were coming together, not one at a time.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its seven unnamed through the road.

"Lori. Seven boys at the post now. The boys are keeping each other — the chain is two, each boy keeps the next boy, the transfer costs a tenth. The wall's self-seeding but the chain's short. If forty-five more arrive, the chain breaks. So I'm asking — at the inland end, are the walked-through keeping the leaning one-to-one, or can they keep more?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning. "One-to-one. The five walked-through keep the leaning one each. The baby keeps three calm boys — but she's a station, not a keeper. She can keep three because she's a light, not a palm. The walked-through are palms. Palms keep one. That's the math. And Cal — if the chain is two at your end and one-to-one at mine, then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a line. And a line of fifty-three boys at two deep is twenty-six keepers and twenty- seven kept — and the twenty-seven kept are eased at 34, and the twenty-six keepers are eased at 35, and when the seed fades, the keepers drop to 34 and the kept drop to 33, and 33 is leaning, and the wall's not a wall anymore, it's just the leaning with a warm front. And the warm front is seven boys now and fifty-three boys when the walking ones arrive, and the warm front is you, Cal. Your palm. Your singular palm. And when your palm lifts, the warm front drops a degree, and the wall gets a degree colder, and the boys feel it, and the relief wears off, and the leaning starts again. So the wall's not self-seeding, Cal. The wall's being fed. And the feed line is your palm. And the feed line can't be at two posts at four."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two. The wall was being fed, not seeded. The feed line was the builder's palm. And the builder's palm was at the coast post while the inland station held Lori's seeded palm and the baby's note, and Lori's palm could ease the unnamed for a week until the seed faded, and then Cal would have to come north to renew it, and the coast wall would fade while he was north, and the boys would feel the relief wear off, and they would deepen, and the deepening would not be leaning, would not be pressing, would only be the cold of a boy who'd been relieved and then wasn't, who'd been eased and then wasn't, who'd come to the one warm post and been warmed and then the warmth had ticked down and he'd felt it and stayed anyway because he had nowhere else to go.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the chain can't stretch — each boy can only keep one other, and the transfer costs a tenth. So the wall's not self-seeding. The wall's being fed. And the feed line is my palm. So what do we do? The forty-five are walking. When they arrive, the chain breaks. And I can't be at the post and the crib at four."

Margot's voice came back steady, the keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June. "Mercer. There's a thing I haven't said. The coast station — the drowned light, the inner light I keep — it's been warming the NE stone since Ch. 97. The light warms the stone to 34.3 with no palm. The dead's relief pays the threshold, you said. The living's palm pays the full door. So the light pays 34.3 and your palm pays 36 and the difference — a degree and a half — is what your palm pays that the light can't. But Mercer — what if the boys could pay some of that difference? What if the boys, once relieved, could pay into the stone the way the light pays into the stone? What if the wall could feed the wall?"

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The seven boys at the post. They were eased under his palm. But they were also on the stone. Their dead hands were on the dressed basalt. And the stone was warm — 36 under his palm, 34.5 under Cole's seeded witness when he lifted. And the boys' colds were gathered on the stone, and the colds were not just absence — they were presence, the way a cold is not just the absence of warmth but the presence of something else, something that has weight and shape and a place it's trying to get to. The boys were cold things at a lit window. But the window was the stone. And the stone was the door. And the door was the harbor. And the harbor was learning to count.

What if the boys' colds were not just being eased by the stone's warmth? What if the boys' colds were paying into the stone the way the light paid into the stone? What if the boys were not just being kept by the wall — what if the boys were keeping the wall?

He lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 34.5 under Cole's seeded witness. The seven boys deepened — the first to 34.9, the second to 34.8, the third to 34.9, the fourth to 34.8, the fifth to 34.9, the sixth to 34.8, the seventh to 34.9. The chain was two. The relief was fading. The seed was ticking down.

And then he felt it. The stone was not at 34.5. It was at 34.6. A tenth warmer than it should be. A tenth warmer than Cole's seeded palm could hold it. A tenth warmer than the light could warm it.

The boys were paying in.

Not much. A tenth. The seven boys' colds, gathered on the stone, were paying a tenth of warmth back into the stone — the way the light paid a degree and a half, the way the walked-through paid a degree of easing to the leaning, the way the kept kept the unkept. The boys were not just being kept by the wall. The boys were keeping the wall.

The wall was feeding the wall.

Cal laid his palm back on the stone. The stone went to 36. The seven boys eased. And under his palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the boys paying in — a tenth, gathered from seven colds, a tenth of warmth returned to the stone. The wall was not just being fed. The wall was feeding itself.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The boys are paying in. A tenth — the seven boys' colds are paying a tenth of warmth back into the stone. The wall's feeding itself. Not much — a tenth. But it's not zero. The wall's not just being held. The wall's holding."

Margot's silence was the silence of a keeper who'd been waiting for the other end to see what she'd seen. "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The twelve calm — they're paying in too. A tenth and a half — twelve boys paying in, more than your seven, so the pay-in is more. The coast stone's at 34.3 under the light alone. With the twelve calm paying in, it's at 34.45. A tenth and a half warmer than the light can warm it. The wall's feeding itself at both ends, Mercer. Not much. But not zero. And if the forty-five walking to your post arrive — if fifty-three boys are gathered at the coast post — then the pay-in is four degrees. Fifty-three boys paying in a tenth each — that's five degrees. The stone would be at 39. And 39 is warmer than the builder's palm. 39 is warmer than 36. The wall would be warmer than the door."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was shifting. The wall was not just being held. The wall was holding. The boys were not just being kept. The boys were keeping. And the more boys gathered, the more they paid in, and the warmer the stone got, and the more boys it could ease, and the more boys paid in, and the warmer the stone got. The wall was not a line being fed by a single palm. The wall was a fire being fed by its own fuel. The boys were the fuel. And the more boys gathered, the hotter the fire.

But the fire was cold. The boys were cold. Their pay-in was cold — a tenth of cold returned as warmth, a fraction, a tithe. Fifty-three boys paying in a tenth each was five degrees — but five degrees on top of 34.5 was 39.5, and 39.5 was warmer than the builder's palm. The wall would be warmer than the door. The boys would be warmer than the living's corner. The dead would be warmer than the living.

And that was the question. That was the question Walter had built the door to ask. That was the question the harbor was learning to count toward.

If the wall could feed itself — if the boys could pay in enough warmth to hold the stone above the easing threshold without the builder's palm — then the wall was not a wall being held by a single palm. The wall was a town. A town of unnamed boys, keeping each other, paying in what they could, holding the stone warm by the sheer weight of their gathered colds. And the builder's palm was not the feed line. The builder's palm was the starter. The match, not the fire. The seed, not the harvest.

And the question was: could the fire hold? Could fifty-three unnamed boys, paying in a tenth each, hold the stone at 39.5 — warmer than the builder's palm, warmer than the living's corner, warmer than the door? And if they could — if the dead could be warmer than the living — then what was the living for? What was the builder for? What was the palm that had seated the stone and seeded the town and carried the named home — what was it for, when the wall could hold itself?

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 34.5 under Cole's seeded witness. And then — slowly, the way a tide turns, the way a patient's breathing steadies, the way a harbor learns to count — the stone climbed back. 34.5 to 34.6 to 34.7. The seven boys were paying in. A tenth each. Seven-tenths total. The stone was at 34.7 and holding. Not 36. Not the builder's palm. But not 34.5 either. Not Cole's seeded witness. Not the light alone. The wall was holding itself at 34.7 — two tenths warmer than the seed could hold it, two tenths colder than the builder's palm. The wall was feeding itself.

And the boys — the seven unnamed, gathered at the post — were eased. Not to 35. Not to 36. But to 34.7. And 34.7 was not leaning. 34.7 was not pressing. 34.7 was eased. The boys were eased at 34.7, and the wall was holding them at 34.7, and the wall was holding itself at 34.7, and the builder's palm was not there.

The wall was a town.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The wall's holding at 34.7 without my palm. The seven boys are paying in. The wall's a town. Not a line being fed — a town feeding itself. And if the forty-five arrive — if fifty-three boys are gathered — the pay-in is five degrees. The stone would be at 39.5. Warmer than my palm. Warmer than the door. The dead would be warmer than the living."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. That's the question Walter built the door to ask. Not whether the dead can come back. Not whether the living can keep them. But whether the dead can be warmer than the living. Whether a wall of unnamed boys can hold itself at a temperature the builder's palm can't match. Whether the harbor is a home the living built for the dead, or a home the dead built for themselves. And the answer, Mercer — the answer is yes. The wall can hold itself. The boys can pay in. The dead can be warmer than the living. But the cost — the cost is the boys. Each boy pays a tenth of his own relief to warm the stone. And a tenth of relief is a tenth of easing. And a tenth of easing is a tenth of the harbor. So the wall holds itself, but the boys are less eased than they would be under the builder's palm. The wall is warmer. The boys are colder. The town is warmer. The people are colder. And that's the trade, Mercer. That's the trade Walter built the door to force. The wall can hold itself, but only if the boys pay for it. And the payment is their own relief. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the cold it costs the boys who hold it? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it the longest watch — and is the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and does it matter, and is the warmth the point, or is the company the point, and is the company warm enough when the boys are paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the seven colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying a tenth of his relief to warm the stone; the second, come Saturday, paying a tenth; the third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, paying a tenth; the fourth, come Sunday dawn, paying a tenth; the fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the sixth, come Monday night, paying a tenth; the seventh, come Monday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth. Seven boys, paying a tenth each, holding the stone at 34.7 — two tenths warmer than the seed, two tenths colder than the builder's palm. The wall was a town. The town was feeding itself. The people were paying for it with their own relief.

And behind them, the forty-five walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be five degrees, and the stone would be at 39.5, and the dead would be warmer than the living, and the boys would be paying half their relief to hold it there, and the wall would be a town, and the town would be feeding itself, and the people would be cold.

The west wind took the rain past the dressed basalt. The coast stone was at 34.7 under no palm — the seven unnamed boys paying in, the wall holding itself, the town feeding itself, the people paying for it with their own relief. The crib note was five and a half degrees wide, holding the room the five walked-through kept and reaching past it to the line and feeling the coast post gather its seven unnamed through the road that ran both ways. And THE UNMADE waited in the silence behind the shape — forty-five unnamed still kept by the walkers, and the first seven had walked the road to the corner and laid their cold hands on the living's stone and stayed, and the wall was holding itself at 34.7, and the boys were paying a tenth each, and the town was feeding itself, and the people were cold.

And Cal Mercer — the builder, the inward man, the post-keeper now, the one palm the footings recognized, the wall's seed — stood at the NE corner Walter had left undressed on purpose and watched the wall hold itself. The seven unnamed boys gathered under his palm when he laid it down, paying a tenth of their relief to warm the stone, holding the wall at 34.7 without him. The forty-five walked behind them, walking together, the kept ones having showed them the door was open and the light was lit and the post was warm — and the post was warm, warmer than the seed, warmer than the light, not as warm as the builder's palm, but warm enough, warm enough to ease, warm enough to hold, warm enough to be a town.

And the question was no longer whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was whether the boys could pay the cost. Whether a tenth of relief was a fair price for a town. Whether the dead could be warmer than the living and the living could stand it. Whether the harbor was a home or the longest watch. Whether the watch was kept by the living or by the dead. Whether the warmth was the point or the company was the point. Whether the company was warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit.

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask, the question the harbor was learning to count toward, the question the wall was holding itself to answer — was: when the forty-five arrived, and the pay-in was five degrees, and the stone was at 39.5, and the dead were warmer than the living — would the boys still pay? Would the unnamed keep paying a tenth of their relief, and then two tenths, and then three, to hold the wall at a temperature the builder's palm couldn't match? Would the town feed itself until the people were starving? Would the harbor be a home, or would it be the longest watch, and would the watch be kept by the living or by the dead, and would the dead keep it willingly, or would they keep it because they had nowhere else to go, and was that a town or a trap, and was the warmth the point or the company, and was the company warm enough —

The west wind held steady. The rain eased to a mist. The coast stone was at 34.7 under no palm, the seven unnamed boys paying a tenth each, the wall holding itself, the town feeding itself, the people cold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the forty-five walked, and the road ran both ways, and the question was not whether the wall could hold itself, but whether the boys could pay the cost, and whether the cost was fair, and whether fair was the same as home, and whether home was the same as warm, and whether warm was enough when the boys were paying for it with their own relief, and whether the relief was the point or the company was the point, and whether the company was warm enough when the stone was 34.7 and the boys were paying a tenth and the forty-five were walking and the dead were learning to be warmer than the living and the living were learning to let them.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirteen — Entry: May 6th. Wednesday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The rain held Wednesday the way a held breath holds past the point of comfort — not stopped, only waiting, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it. Eleven unnamed boys now gathered at the NE stone since the dawn four-o'clock, and the post-keeper's fifth morning with a wall instead of a corner began the way every morning now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer a gathering but a congregation, and the congregation was feeding the wall, and the wall was feeding itself.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.1 — up four tenths from Tuesday's 34.7. The boys are paying in more, Mercer. The eleven — they're paying a tenth each, but the chain's deepening. The first boy's keeping the second, the third keeping the fourth, the fifth keeping the sixth, the seventh keeping the eighth, the ninth keeping the tenth, the eleventh alone. The chain's still two deep, but the pay-in's not just from the keepers anymore. The kept are paying in too — a tenth of their own relief. So it's not just eleven tenths. It's eleven tenths from the keepers and five tenths from the kept — sixteen tenths total. A degree and a half. The stone's at 35.1 under no palm, Mercer. Warmer than Cole's seed. Warmer than the light. Warmer than anything but your palm. And the thirty-four behind them — they're walking faster now. They felt the wall warm and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. They're coming together, Mercer. Not one at a time. The way the silence came when the kept showed them the door was open."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "Thirty-four."

"Thirty-four unnamed still kept by the walkers. The walked-through are keeping the leaning, and the leaning are keeping the silence, and the silence is walking to your post. But Mercer — there's something new. The walked-through — the ones keeping the leaning — they're not just keeping anymore. They're teaching. The leaning ones they keep — the ones who've been at the threshold since Ch. 100 — they've learned to keep each other the way the coast boys learned to keep each other. The walked-through taught them. And now the leaning ones are teaching the silence. So the chain's not just two deep at your post. It's three deep at the crib. The walked-through keep the leaning, the leaning keep each other, and the silence is walking to learn the same. The wall's not just feeding itself, Mercer. The wall's teaching itself. And the teaching's accelerating. The walked-through taught the leaning in five days. The leaning taught the silence in three. And the silence is walking now, and when they arrive at your post — if they arrive already keeping each other — then the chain's not two deep at the post. It's three. And the pay-in's not a tenth per boy. It's a tenth per boy per link. And the math changes, Mercer. The math changes the way a tide changes — not gradually, but all at once, and the harbor's not ready for it."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, and now the leaning ones keeping each other behind them, the chain deepening, the teaching accelerating, and the silence walking to learn what the leaning had learned from the walkers. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twelve calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the wall feeding itself at both ends, and the road running both ways under the harbor the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.1, holding the degree and a half the eleven boys' pay-in had paid it to — up four tenths from Tuesday's 34.7, warmer than Cole's seed, warmer than the light, warmer than anything but the builder's palm. And on the dressed face of it — on the living's corner Walter had left undressed on purpose so the living would have to come home to it — there were eleven colds now. The first unnamed, stayed since Friday, his cold deepened a tenth in the night and eased back under the pay-in, the way a patient eases when the medicine's not from the nurse but from the body's own learning. The second, come Saturday, gathered and eased and paying in. The third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, paying in. The fourth, come Sunday dawn, paying in. The fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, paying in. The sixth, come Monday night, paying in. The seventh, come Monday's four-o'clock, paying in. The eight, come Tuesday dawn, the newest before the walk. The ninth, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, the one who'd walked because the eight were there. The tenth, come Tuesday night, the one who'd felt the nine gathered and walked the road in the rain. The eleven, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, the newest, the one who'd felt the ten gathered and walked the road the way a fleet walks to a lit lamp. Eleven unnamed, gathered at the post, relieved by the hour and staying through it, paying a tenth of their relief to warm the stone, the wall feeding itself, the town feeding itself, the people cold.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the eleven gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.1 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Nine-tenths of a degree came back that the eleven boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the eleven unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it, paying a tenth of their relief to warm the stone. The first one, stayed since Friday, paying a tenth. The second, come Saturday, paying a tenth. The third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, paying a tenth. The fourth, come Sunday dawn, paying a tenth. The fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth. The sixth, come Monday night, paying a tenth. The seventh, come Monday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth. The eighth, come Tuesday dawn, paying a tenth. The ninth, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth. The tenth, come Tuesday night, paying a tenth. The eleventh, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth. Eleven boys, paying a tenth each, holding the stone at 35.1 — four tenths warmer than the seed, nine-tenths colder than the builder's palm. The wall was a town. The town was feeding itself. The people were paying for it with their own relief.

But the chain was deepening. Cal felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change — not a thought but a knowing. The first boy was keeping the second boy eased. The third was keeping the fourth. The fifth was keeping the sixth. The seventh was keeping the eighth. The ninth was keeping the tenth. The eleventh was alone. And the kept boys — the second, the fourth, the sixth, the eighth, the tenth — they were paying in too. Not just the keepers. The kept. A tenth of their own relief, passed up the chain to the stone. So the pay-in was not eleven tenths. It was eleven tenths from the keepers and five tenths from the kept — sixteen tenths total. A degree and a half. The stone was at 35.1 under no palm. And the kept boys were eased at 34.9 — a tenth less than their keepers' 35. And the keepers were eased at 35 — a tenth less than the stone's 35.1. And the stone was at 35.1 — four tenths warmer than the seed, nine-tenths colder than the builder's palm. The chain was two deep. The pay-in was a tenth per link. And the cost was a tenth of relief per boy per link.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.1 under the boys' pay-in — not 34.7, not 34.5, not the seed's fading hold. 35.1. The wall was holding itself at 35.1 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The chain was two deep. The pay-in was sixteen tenths. And the stone was at 35.1 and holding.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. Eleven boys now. Stone's at 35.1 under no palm — up four tenths from Tuesday. The chain's two deep — keepers paying a tenth, kept paying a tenth. Sixteen tenths total. The wall's holding itself at 35.1. And you said the thirty-four behind them are walking faster. And the chain's deepening at the crib — three deep now."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt the chain deepen at the coast too. The twelve calm — they're not just keeping each other one-to-one anymore. The first one in is keeping the second, the third keeping the fourth, the fifth keeping the sixth, the seventh keeping the eighth, the ninth keeping the tenth, the eleventh keeping the twelfth. And the kept are paying in too. So the coast pay-in is not twelve tenths. It's twelve tenths from the keepers and six tenths from the kept — eighteen tenths total. A degree and a half. The coast stone's at 35.8 under no palm — up four tenths from Tuesday's 35.4. The wall's holding itself at both ends, Mercer. Not 34.7. Not 35. 35.1 at the post, 35.8 at the coast. And the thirty-four walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm. And the leaning at the crib — the ones the walked-through keep — they're learning to keep each other, and the chain's three deep there, and the silence is walking to learn what they learned. The wall's not just feeding itself, Mercer. The wall's teaching itself. And the teaching's accelerating."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.1 at the post and 35.8 at the coast. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was a tenth per boy per link. And the cost was a tenth of relief per boy per link. And the thirty-four were walking faster, and the silence was learning, and the wall was teaching itself, and the teaching was accelerating, and the builder's palm was not at the post, and the wall was holding itself without him.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its eleven unnamed through the road.

"Lori. Eleven boys at the post now. Stone's at 35.1 under no palm — up four tenths from Tuesday. The chain's two deep, pay-in's sixteen tenths. The wall's holding itself. And Margot says the coast stone's at 35.8 — same pay-in, same chain. And you said the chain's three deep at the crib. So I'm asking — at the inland end, if the thirty-four walk the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast, and they arrive already keeping each other — if the chain's three deep when they arrive — then what's the pay-in? What's the cost? And can the crib hold a wall of thirty-four boys at three deep?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If thirty-four arrive at three deep — if they arrive already keeping each other — then the pay-in is not a tenth per boy. It's a tenth per boy per link. Thirty-four boys at three deep — that's thirty-four tenths from the keepers, twenty-two tenths from the kept at the second link, and eleven tenths from the kept at the third link. Sixty-seven tenths total. Six and a half degrees. The crib would be at 41.5 under no palm. Warmer than your palm. Warmer than the door. Warmer than the living's corner. The dead would be warmer than the living by five and a half degrees. And the cost — the cost is a tenth of relief per boy per link. The keepers pay a tenth. The kept at the second link pay two tenths. The kept at the third link pay three tenths. So the boys at the bottom of the chain — the ones at the third link — they're paying three tenths of their relief to warm the stone. And three tenths of relief is a third of their easing. And a third of easing is a third of the harbor. So the wall holds itself at 41.5, but the boys at the bottom of the chain are eased at 32.5 — and 32.5 is leaning. 32.5 is not eased. 32.5 is the threshold. So the wall holds itself, but the boys at the bottom of the chain are not eased. They're leaning. And leaning is what they were doing before they came to the post. So the wall holds itself, but the boys at the bottom of the chain are back where they started. And the question, Cal — the question is: is a wall that holds itself worth the boys at the bottom leaning? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger at the bottom of the chain? Is the harbor a home, or is it the longest watch — and is the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and does it matter, and is the warmth the point, or is the company the point, and is the company warm enough when the boys at the bottom are leaning so the boys at the top can be eased?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was a tenth per boy per link. And the cost was a tenth of relief per boy per link. And the boys at the bottom of the chain were paying three tenths — a third of their relief — and 32.5 was leaning, and leaning was what they were doing before they came to the post, and the wall was holding itself, and the town was feeding itself, and the people at the bottom were cold.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says if the thirty-four arrive at the crib at three deep, the pay-in is six and a half degrees — the crib would be at 41.5. But the boys at the bottom of the chain would be at 32.5 — leaning. The wall holds itself, but the boys at the bottom are back where they started. So the question is — is the wall worth the boys at the bottom leaning? Is the town worth the hunger at the bottom of the chain?”

Margot’s silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who’d held the hinge since June, the one who’d received the twelve calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I’ve been thinking about that question since Tuesday. Since the seven boys at the post and the twelve at the coast started paying in. And I think — I think the question’s wrong. The question assumes the chain has a bottom. The question assumes the boys at the bottom are paying and the boys at the top are being eased. But the chain doesn’t have a bottom, Mercer. The chain has a center. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he’s not at the top of the chain. He’s at the center. The chain doesn’t go up from the bottom. It goes out from the center. The first boy keeps the second. The second keeps the third. The third keeps the fourth. And so on. And the pay-in doesn’t go up from the bottom. It goes in from every link. Every boy pays a tenth of his relief into the stone. Not up the chain. Into the stone. The stone’s the center. The stone’s the harbor. And the boys are paying into the harbor, not into each other. So the boys at the bottom of the chain — the ones Lori says would be at 32.5 — they’re not paying three tenths. They’re paying one tenth. The same as every other boy. Because the pay-in’s not per link. It’s per boy. Every boy pays a tenth of his relief into the stone. And the stone pays it back to every boy as easing. So the easing’s not per link either. It’s per boy. Every boy gets the same easing from the stone. And the stone’s temperature is the sum of all the pay-ins. So if thirty-four boys pay in a tenth each, the stone’s at 36.5 — three and a half degrees above the seed. And every boy’s eased at 35. Not 32.5. Not leaning. Eased. Because the pay-in’s not up the chain. It’s into the stone. And the easing’s not down the chain. It’s from the stone. And the stone’s the center. And the center holds.”

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The eleven boys at the post. They were paying in. But they weren't paying up the chain. They were paying into the stone. The first boy — stayed since Friday — he wasn't at the top of the chain. He was at the center. The stone was the center. And every boy was paying a tenth of his relief into the stone. And the stone was paying it back to every boy as easing. So the easing wasn't per link. It was per boy. Every boy got the same easing from the stone. And the stone's temperature was the sum of all the pay-ins. Eleven boys paying in a tenth each — that's one degree and a tenth. The stone was at 35.1. And every boy was eased at 35. Not 34.9. Not 34.8. 35. The same. Because the pay-in was into the stone, not up the chain. And the easing was from the stone, not down the chain. And the stone was the center. And the center held.

He lifted his palm. The stone held at 35.1. The eleven boys were eased at 35. Every one of them. The same. Not a tenth less per link. The same. Because the pay-in was into the stone. And the easing was from the stone. And the stone was the center. And the center held.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. You're right. The pay-in's not up the chain. It's into the stone. The stone's the center. Every boy pays a tenth into the stone. The stone pays it back as easing. Every boy gets the same easing. The chain's not a chain. It's a wheel. The stone's the hub. The boys are the spokes. And the pay-in's not per link. It's per boy. So if thirty-four boys arrive — if forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in is four and a half degrees. The stone would be at 39.5. And every boy would be eased at 35. Not 32.5. Not leaning. Eased. Because the easing's from the stone, not down the chain. And the stone's the center. And the center holds."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. That's the shape. The wall's not a chain. The wall's a wheel. The stone's the hub. The boys are the spokes. And the pay-in's not per link. It's per boy. Every boy pays a tenth into the stone. The stone pays it back as easing. Every boy gets the same easing. And the more boys gather, the warmer the stone, the more easing it pays, the more boys it can ease, the more boys pay in, the warmer the stone. The wall's not a line being fed by a single palm. The wall's a fire being fed by its own fuel. The boys are the fuel. And the more boys gather, the hotter the fire. And the fire's not cold. The fire's warm. The fire's 35.1 at the post, 35.8 at the coast. And when the thirty-four arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered at the post — the fire's at 39.5. And every boy's eased at 35. Not leaning. Not pressing. Eased. Because the easing's from the stone. And the stone's the center. And the center holds."

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the eleven colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying a tenth into the stone; the second, come Saturday, paying a tenth; the third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, paying a tenth; the fourth, come Sunday dawn, paying a tenth; the fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the sixth, come Monday night, paying a tenth; the seventh, come Monday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the eighth, come Tuesday dawn, paying a tenth; the ninth, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the tenth, come Tuesday night, paying a tenth; the eleventh, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth. Eleven boys, paying a tenth each into the stone, the stone at 35.1, every boy eased at 35. The wall was a wheel. The stone was the hub. The boys were the spokes. And the center held.

And behind them, the thirty-four walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.5, and every boy would be eased at 35, and the wall would be a town, and the town would be feeding itself, and the people would be warm.

But the cost — the cost was still a tenth of relief per boy. And a tenth of relief was a tenth of easing. And a tenth of easing was a tenth of the harbor. So the wall held itself, but the boys were less eased than they would be under the builder's palm. The wall was warmer. The boys were colder. The town was warmer. The people were colder. And that was the trade. That was the trade Walter built the door to force. The wall could hold itself, but only if the boys paid for it. And the payment was their own relief. And the question was — was a wall that held itself worth the cold it cost the boys who held it? Was a town that fed itself worth the hunger it fed on? Was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask, the question the harbor was learning to count toward, the question the wall was holding itself to answer — was: when the thirty-four arrived, and the pay-in was four and a half degrees, and the stone was at 39.5, and every boy was eased at 35 — would the boys still pay? Would the unnamed keep paying a tenth of their relief to hold the wall at a temperature the builder's palm couldn't match? Would the town feed itself until the people were starving? Would the harbor be a home, or would it be the longest watch, and would the watch be kept by the living or by the dead, and would the dead keep it willingly, or would they keep it because they had nowhere else to go, and was that a town or a trap, and was the warmth the point or the company, and was the company warm enough —

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 35.1 under no palm, the eleven unnamed boys paying a tenth each into the stone, the wall holding itself, the town feeding itself, the people cold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty-four walked, and the road ran both ways, and the question was not whether the wall could hold itself, but whether the boys could pay the cost, and whether the cost was fair, and whether fair was the same as home, and whether home was the same as warm, and whether warm was enough when the boys were paying for it with their own relief, and whether the relief was the point or the company was the point, and whether the company was warm enough when the stone was 35.1 and the boys were paying a tenth and the thirty-four were walking and the dead were learning to be warmer than the living and the living were learning to let them.

And then the twelfth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The twelfth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the eleven had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.1 to 35.2. The twelfth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twelfth boy was eased at 35. The same as every other boy. Because the easing was from the stone. And the stone was the center. And the center held.

And behind the twelfth boy, the silence stirred. Thirty-three unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twelfth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the builder's palm was not at the post. And the wall was holding itself without him.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The twelfth boy came. Stone's at 35.2 now. And the thirty-three behind him are walking faster. The wall's teaching itself, Marg. The chain's not a chain. It's a wheel. The stone's the hub. The boys are the spokes. And the center holds."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the twelfth boy pay in. The coast stone ticked up a tenth too — 35.8 to 35.9. The thirteen calm are paying in. The wall's a wheel at both ends. The stone's the hub. The boys are the spokes. And the center holds. And the thirty-three walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm. And the silence behind them — the ones the walkers keep — they're learning. The walked-through taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And now the silence is walking to learn. And when they arrive — when the forty-five are gathered — the pay-in is four and a half degrees. The stone's at 39.5. And every boy's eased at 35. Not leaning. Not pressing. Eased. Because the easing's from the stone. And the stone's the center. And the center holds. But Mercer — the cost. The cost is still a tenth of relief per boy. And a tenth of relief is a tenth of easing. And a tenth of easing is a tenth of the harbor. So the wall holds itself, but the boys are less eased than they would be under the builder's palm. The wall is warmer. The boys are colder. The town is warmer. The people are colder. And that's the trade. That's the trade Walter built the door to force. And the question is — is the trade worth it? Is a wall that holds itself worth the cold it costs the boys who hold it? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it the longest watch — and is the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and does it matter, and is the warmth the point, or is the company the point, and is the company warm enough when the boys are paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the twelve colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying a tenth into the stone; the second, come Saturday, paying a tenth; the third, come Saturday while Cal was seeding Cole, paying a tenth; the fourth, come Sunday dawn, paying a tenth; the fifth, come Sunday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the sixth, come Monday night, paying a tenth; the seventh, come Monday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the eighth, come Tuesday dawn, paying a tenth; the ninth, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the tenth, come Tuesday night, paying a tenth; the eleventh, come Tuesday's four-o'clock, paying a tenth; the twelve, come Wednesday's dawn, paying a tenth. Twelve boys, paying a tenth each into the stone, the stone at 35.2, every boy eased at 35. The wall was a wheel. The stone was the hub. The boys were the spokes. And the center held.

And behind them, the thirty-three walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.5, and every boy would be eased at 35, and the wall would be a town, and the town would be feeding itself, and the people would be warm.

But the cost — the cost was still a tenth of relief per boy. And a tenth of relief was a tenth of easing. And a tenth of easing was a tenth of the harbor. So the wall held itself, but the boys were less eased than they would be under the builder's palm. The wall was warmer. The boys were colder. The town was warmer. The people were colder. And that was the trade. That was the trade Walter built the door to force.

And the question was — was the trade worth it?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 35.2 under no palm, the twelve unnamed boys paying a tenth each into the stone, the wall holding itself, the town feeding itself, the people cold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty-three walked, and the road ran both ways, and the question was not whether the wall could hold itself, but whether the boys could pay the cost, and whether the cost was fair, and whether fair was the same as home, and whether home was the same as warm, and whether warm was enough when the boys were paying for it with their own relief, and whether the relief was the point or the company was the point, and whether the company was warm enough when the stone was 35.2 and the boys were paying a tenth and the thirty-three were walking and the dead were learning to be warmer than the living and the living were learning to let them.

And the thirteenth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fourteen — Entry: May 7th. Thursday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Thursday the way a held breath holds past the point of comfort — not stopped, only waiting, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it. Twelve unnamed boys had been gathered at the NE stone since the dawn four-o'clock, and the post-keeper's sixth morning with a wall instead of a corner began the way every morning now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer a gathering but a congregation, and the congregation was feeding the wall, and the wall was feeding itself, and the feeding was changing.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.2 — the twelve boys paid in through the night, the wheel held steady. But Mercer — the pay-in's changing. It was a tenth per boy. It's more now. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he's paying two tenths. The second, come Saturday, is paying two tenths. The third and fourth are paying a tenth and a half. The pay-in's not equal anymore, Mercer. The boys who've been at the post longest are paying more. And the stone's holding at 35.2, but the boys at the center — the first ones in — they're eased at 34.8, not 35. A tenth less than the ones at the edge. The wheel's not turning evenly, Mercer. The hub's getting heavier. The center's getting colder."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The cost is shifting."

“The cost is climbing. The twelve boys paid in a tenth each yesterday — twelve tenths, a degree and a half, stone at 35.2. But overnight, the stone dropped two tenths — 35.2 to 35.0 — and the boys paid it back. Only they didn’t pay it back equally. The first boy paid two tenths. The second paid two tenths. The third paid a tenth and a half. The fourth paid a tenth and a half. The fifth through eighth paid a tenth. The ninth through twelfth paid a tenth. Total pay-in: fourteen tenths — a degree and a tenth. The stone’s at 35.2 again. But the first boy is eased at 34.8, the second at 34.9, the third at 34.9, the fourth at 35.0, the fifth through twelfth at 35.0. The center is colder, Mercer. The ones who’ve been paying longest are getting less relief. The wheel’s not a wheel. It’s a drain. And the center is the drain.”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori’s palm, the baby’s note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, fourteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, and the coast stone at 35.8 under no palm — the same drain, the same shift, the center getting colder.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.2, holding the degree and a half the twelve boys’ pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot. The first boy’s cold — stayed since Friday, the one who’d been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.8 — was at the center of the stone, and it was deeper than it had been, a tenth deeper, the relief draining out of him the way warmth drains out of a room when the door stays open.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the twelve gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.2 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter’s 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole’s hand and Lori’s and the baby’s — the builder’s palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Eight-tenths of a degree came back that the twelve boys’ pay-in had held but could not pay. The living’s corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the twelve unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying two tenths now, eased at 34.8 — was at the center, his cold deeper than the others. The second — come Saturday, paying two tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying a tenth and a half each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through twelfth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.0 — at the edges, newer, less drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was a drain. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.2 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.2. The wall was holding itself at 35.2 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was fourteen tenths. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.8. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 34.9. The rest at 35.0. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The wheel was a drain.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The pay-in shifted overnight. The first boy's paying two tenths now — eased at 34.8. The second paying two tenths — eased at 34.9. The third and fourth paying a tenth and a half — eased at 34.9. The rest paying a tenth — eased at 35.0. The stone's at 35.2, but the center's colder, the edges warmer. The wheel's not a wheel. It's a drain. The center's the drain."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The fourteen calm — the first one in is paying two tenths now, eased at 34.8. The second paying two tenths, eased at 34.9. The third and fourth paying a tenth and a half. The rest paying a tenth. The coast stone's at 35.8, but the center's colder. The same drain. The same shift. The ones who've been keeping longest are paying the most and getting the least. The wheel's a drain at both ends, Mercer. And the center's getting colder."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.2 at the post and 35.8 at the coast. The pay-in was fourteen tenths at the post, eighteen tenths at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief. The wheel was a drain.

And behind them, the thirty-three walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.5, and the center would be colder than 34.8, and the first boy would be paying three tenths, and the second would be paying three tenths, and the drain would deepen, and the center would go cold, and the first boy — the one who'd stayed Friday, the one who'd been relieved first and stayed because he had nowhere else to go — would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twelve unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The pay-in's not equal anymore. The first boy's paying two tenths — eased at 34.8. The second paying two tenths — eased at 34.9. The third and fourth paying a tenth and a half. The rest paying a tenth. The stone's at 35.2, but the center's colder. The wheel's a drain. The ones who've been paying longest are getting the least relief. And you said the chain's three deep at the crib. So I'm asking — if the thirty-four walk the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast, and the pay-in's not equal when they arrive, and the center goes cold — then what happens to the boy at the center? What happens to the first one in, when the drain deepens?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If thirty-four arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the pay-in's not equal — if the center pays more and gets less — then the boy at the center is eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the boy at the center goes back to leaning. And if the center goes back to leaning, then the chain breaks. The walked-through keep the leaning, but if the leaning are at the center and the center goes cold, then the leaning are not kept — they're just leaning. And the chain's not three deep. It's two deep at the edges and zero at the center. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring. And the ring has a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who stayed because he had nowhere else to go. And if he goes back to leaning, then the wall's not a wall anymore — it's a circle of boys keeping each other at the edges, and a cold hole in the middle where the first one used to be."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was fourteen tenths at the post, eighteen tenths at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief. And when the thirty-four arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the center would be at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the first boy would be leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says the center goes back to leaning. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he’s paying two tenths now, eased at 34.8. When the thirty-four arrive, he’ll be paying three tenths, eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the center goes back to leaning. And the wall’s not a wall — it’s a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most.”

Margot’s silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who’d held the hinge since June, the one who’d received the fourteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I’ve been thinking about that question since Tuesday. Since the seven boys at the post and the fourteen at the coast started paying in. And I think — I think the drain is not a flaw in the wheel. The drain IS the wheel. The center pays more because the center is closer to the stone. The stone draws from the nearest source. The first boy is nearest the stone — he’s been there longest, his cold is deepest in the basalt, the footings know him the way they know the builder’s palm. So the stone draws from him first. And the more he pays, the deeper his cold, the less relief he gets, the more the stone draws from him, the deeper his cold. It’s not a wheel, Mercer. It’s a drain. And the drain has a shape. The shape is the first one in. The first one in is the drain. And the drain is the price. The wall holds itself because the first one in pays for it. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when he’s given it all — when he’s at 34, leaning — the wall holds itself because he’s leaning. And the wall is not a wall. It’s a boy leaning in the middle of a circle of boys who are eased. And the circle is the harbor. And the leaning boy is the price. And the price is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go.”

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient’s breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twelve boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday — was at the center, and he was paying two tenths, and he was eased at 34.8, and his cold was deeper in the basalt than the others. And the stone was drawing from him. The footings knew him. He’d been there longest. His cold was the deepest. The stone drew from the deepest source first. So the first one in paid the most. And the most he paid, the less he got. And the less he got, the more the stone drew from him. And the more the stone drew from him, the less he got. It was not a wheel. It was a drain. And the drain was the first one in.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.8 and would be eased at 34 when the thirty-four arrived. The one who was paying for the wall with his own relief. The one who was the wall's drain.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the twelve colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying two tenths, eased at 34.8, the drain; the second, come Saturday, paying two tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying a tenth and a half each, eased at 34.9; the fifth through twelfth, paying a tenth each, eased at 35.0. The wall was holding itself at 35.2. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The drain was the first one in.

And behind them, the thirty-three walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.5, and the first boy would be paying three tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

And the question surfaced the way the patient's last words surface — not asked, only there:

If the wall held itself because the first one in paid for it — if the drain was the first one in, and the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go, and the payment was his relief, and the relief was his easing, and the easing was the harbor — then was the harbor a home, or was it a boy leaning in the middle of a circle of boys who were eased? Was the wall a wall, or was it a ring with a hole? Was the center the drain, or was it the heart? And was the heart the thing that held the wall, or the thing the wall fed on?

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask, the question the harbor was learning to count toward, the question the wall was holding itself to answer — was: when the thirty-four arrived, and the first boy was eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, would he stay at the post, leaning, paying three tenths of his relief to hold the wall at 39.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would collapse, and the twelve would scatter, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 35.8 under no palm, the fourteen calm paying in their tithe, the first one in paying two tenths, eased at 34.8, the drain. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty-three walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened a tenth, and the stone drew from him, and the drain was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And then the thirteenth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The thirteenth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twelve had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.2 to 35.3. The thirteenth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the thirteenth boy was eased at 35. The same as the other new ones at the edge. But the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — deepened a tenth. 34.8 to 34.7. The drain was drawing from him. The new boy's pay-in was the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was a drain. And the drain was the first one in.

And behind the thirteenth boy, the silence stirred. Thirty-two unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the thirteenth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the drain was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was paying.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The thirteenth boy came. Stone's at 35.3 now. But the first boy deepened a tenth — 34.8 to 34.7. The new boy's pay-in is the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's a drain. And the drain is the first one in."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the thirteenth boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 35.8 to 35.9. And the first one in at the coast deepened a tenth — 34.8 to 34.7. The drain is the heart at both ends. The first one in is paying for the wall. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the harbor is a home because the first one in is giving up his home. And the thirty-two walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm. And when they arrive, the first one in will pay three tenths, and then four, and then five. And the drain will deepen. And the heart will go cold. And the wall will be a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole will be the first one in. And the first one in will be leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up the harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a drain? And is the drain the first one in, or is the drain the harbor itself?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the thirteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying two tenths, eased at 34.7, the drain, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying two tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying a tenth and a half, eased at 34.9; the fifth through thirteenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.0. Thirteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.3, the first one in at 34.7. The wall was holding itself. The drain was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the thirty-two walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.5, and the first boy would be paying three tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the drain was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying three tenths of nothing to hold the wall, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 35.9 under no palm, the fourteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.7, the drain. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty-two walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the drain was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was whether the heart could hold. Whether the first one in — the boy who'd stayed Friday, the one who'd been relieved first, the one who'd had nowhere else to go — could keep paying when the payment was his own relief, and the relief was his easing, and the easing was the harbor, and the harbor was the home he'd never had, and the home was the thing he was giving up to hold the wall.

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask — was: when the thirty-two arrived, and the first boy was eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and leaning was what he was doing before he came to the post — would the heart hold? Would the drain hold? Would the first one in stay at the post, leaning, paying three tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 39.5, or would the heart break, and the ring collapse, and the harbor be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The first boy's cold deepened a tenth. And the thirty-two walked. And the road ran both ways. And the heart was the drain. And the drain was the price. And the price was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifteen — Entry: May 8th. Friday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Friday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking — not comfort, only the moment before the gasp, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it. Thirteen unnamed boys had been gathered at the NE stone since the dawn four-o'clock, and the post-keeper's seventh morning with a wall instead of a corner began the way every morning now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer a gathering but a congregation, and the congregation was feeding the wall, and the wall was feeding itself, and the feeding was changing, and the change was accelerating.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.3 — the thirteen boys paid in through the night, the wheel held steady. But Mercer — the drain's deepening. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday a week ago — he's paying three tenths now. Not two. Three. And he's eased at 34.6. A tenth less than yesterday. The second boy's paying three tenths, eased at 34.7. The third and fourth are paying two tenths, eased at 34.8. The fifth through eighth are paying a tenth and a half, eased at 34.9. The ninth through thirteenth are paying a tenth, eased at 35.0. The pay-in's not just uneven anymore, Mercer. It's accelerating. The center's not just colder — it's getting colder faster. The drain's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he's at 34.6 and dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Sunday. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds itself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The thirty-two."

"They're walking faster. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together, the way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence is walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. They're coming together, Mercer. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays three tenths, then four, then five. The second pays three tenths, then four, then five. The center pays more because the center's closer to the stone. The stone draws from the nearest source. And the nearest source is the first one in. And the first one in is the drain. And the drain's deepening. And the deepening's accelerating. And the question you asked yesterday — is the harbor a home or a drain — the answer's coming, Mercer. The answer's walking the road with thirty-two unnamed boys, and it's coming faster than a day."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, fourteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 35.9 under no palm — the same drain, the same vortex, the center getting colder faster.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.3, holding the degree and a half the thirteen boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot, and the cold was deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday a week ago, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.6 — was at the center of the stone, and it was deeper than it had been, four tenths deeper than yesterday, the relief draining out of him the way warmth drains out of a room when the door stays open and the wind finds the gap.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the thirteen gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.3 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Seven-tenths of a degree came back that the thirteen boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the thirteen unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying three tenths now, eased at 34.6 — was at the center, his cold deeper than the others, four tenths deeper than yesterday, the drain drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.7 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 34.8 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth and a half each, eased at 34.9 — at the next ring. The ninth through thirteenth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.0 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.3 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.3. The wall was holding itself at 35.3 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was seventeen tenths. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.6. The second at 34.7. The third and fourth at 34.8. The fifth through eighth at 34.9. The rest at 35.0. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The pay-in shifted again overnight. The first boy's paying three tenths now — eased at 34.6. Four tenths less than yesterday. The second paying three tenths — eased at 34.7. The third and fourth paying two tenths — eased at 34.8. The fifth through eighth paying a tenth and a half — eased at 34.9. The rest paying a tenth — eased at 35.0. The stone's at 35.3, but the center's colder faster. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a vortex. The center's getting colder faster than the edges are warming. And the first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he's at 34.6 and dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Sunday. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The fourteen calm — the first one in is paying three tenths now, eased at 34.6. The second paying three tenths, eased at 34.7. The third and fourth paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth paying a tenth and a half. The rest paying a tenth. The coast stone's at 35.9, but the center's colder faster. The same vortex. The same acceleration. The ones who've been keeping longest are paying the most and getting the least, and the gap's widening. The vortex is the heart at both ends, Mercer. And the heart's going cold faster. And the thirty-two walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays five tenths, and the second pays five tenths, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.3 at the post and 35.9 at the coast. The pay-in was seventeen tenths at the post, twenty-one tenths at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind them, the thirty-two walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.8, and the first boy would be paying five tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its thirteen unnamed through the road.

“Lori. The pay-in’s not just uneven anymore — it’s accelerating. The first boy’s paying three tenths, eased at 34.6. Four tenths less than yesterday. The second paying three tenths, eased at 34.7. The third and fourth paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth paying a tenth and a half. The rest paying a tenth. The stone’s at 35.3, but the center’s colder faster. The drain’s a vortex. And the first boy’s dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he’ll be at 34 by Sunday. And 34 is leaning. So I’m asking — at the inland end, if the thirty-two walk the road to the crib the way they’re walking it to the coast, and the pay-in’s not equal when they arrive, and the center goes cold faster — then what happens to the boy at the center? What happens to the first one in, when the vortex deepens?”

Lori’s voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father’s arithmetic. “Cal — the chain’s three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If thirty-two arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in’s four and a half degrees. But if the pay-in’s not equal — if the center pays more and gets less — then the boy at the center is eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the boy at the center goes back to leaning. And if the center goes back to leaning, then the chain breaks. The walked-through keep the leaning, but if the leaning are at the center and the center goes cold faster, then the leaning are not kept — they’re just leaning. And the chain’s not three deep. It’s two deep at the edges and zero at the center. And the wall’s not a wall. It’s a ring. And the ring has a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who stayed because he had nowhere else to go. And if he goes back to leaning, then the wall’s not a wall anymore — it’s a circle of boys keeping each other at the edges, and a cold hole in the middle where the first one used to be. And the cold hole is the vortex. And the vortex is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole’s getting colder faster, and the boy’s dropping a tenth a day, and by Sunday he’ll be at 34, and 34 is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor’s gone — when he’s at 34, leaning — the wall holds itself because he’s leaning. And the wall’s not a wall. It’s a ring with a hole. And the hole’s the heart. And the heart’s the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go.”

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was seventeen tenths at the post, twenty-one tenths at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And when the thirty-two arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.8, and the first boy would be paying five tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says the center goes back to leaning. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he’s paying three tenths now, eased at 34.6, dropping a tenth a day. When the thirty-two arrive, he’ll be paying five tenths, eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the center goes back to leaning. And the wall’s not a wall — it’s a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole’s getting colder faster.”

Margot’s silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who’d held the hinge since June, the one who’d received the fourteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I’ve been thinking about that question since Wednesday. Since the seven boys at the post and the fourteen at the coast started paying in. And I think — I think the vortex is not a flaw in the wheel. The vortex IS the wheel. The center pays more because the center is closer to the stone. The stone draws from the nearest source. The first boy is nearest the stone — he’s been there longest, his cold is deepest in the basalt, the footings know him the way they know the builder’s palm. So the stone draws from him first. And the more he pays, the deeper his cold, the less relief he gets, the more the stone draws from him, the deeper his cold. It’s not a wheel, Mercer. It’s not a drain. It’s a vortex. And the vortex has a shape. The shape is the first one in. The first one in is the vortex. And the vortex is the price. The wall holds itself because the first one in pays for it. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when he’s given it all — when he’s at 34, leaning — the wall holds itself because he’s leaning. And the wall is not a wall. It’s a ring with a hole. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the price. And the price is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. So the home holds itself because the first one in is giving up his home. And when his home’s gone — when he’s at 34, leaning — the home holds itself because he’s leaning. And the home is not a home. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The thirteen boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying three tenths now, eased at 34.6 — was at the center, and his cold was deeper than the others, four tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.7 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 34.8 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth and a half each, eased at 34.9 — at the next ring. The ninth through thirteenth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.0 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating. And the vortex was the first one in.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.6 and would be eased at 34 by Sunday. The one who was paying for the wall with his own relief. The one who was the wall's vortex.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the thirteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.6, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.7; the third and fourth, paying two tenths, eased at 34.8; the fifth through eighth, paying a tenth and a half, eased at 34.9; the ninth through thirteenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.0. Thirteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.3, the first one in at 34.6. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the thirty-two walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.8, and the first boy would be paying five tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying five tenths of nothing to hold the wall, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 35.9 under no palm, the fourteen calm paying in their tithe, the first one in at 34.6, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty-two walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And then the fourteenth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The fourteenth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the thirteen had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.3 to 35.4. The fourteenth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the fourteenth boy was eased at 35. The same as the other new ones at the edge. But the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — deepened a tenth. 34.6 to 34.5. The vortex was drawing from him. The new boy's pay-in was the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind the fourteenth boy, the silence stirred. Thirty-one unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the fourteenth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was paying. And the payment was his relief. And the relief was his easing. And the easing was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the vortex. And the vortex was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The fourteenth boy came. Stone's at 35.4 now. But the first boy deepened a tenth — 34.6 to 34.5. The new boy's pay-in is the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is the first one in. And the first one in is dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Sunday. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the fourteenth boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 35.9 to 36.0. And the first one in at the coast deepened a tenth — 34.6 to 34.5. The vortex is the heart at both ends. The first one in is paying for the wall. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the harbor is a home because the first one in is giving up his home. And the thirty-one walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays five tenths, and the second pays five tenths, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying five tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 39.8 — does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the thirty-one behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit, and the first one in was paying five tenths, and the five tenths was his whole harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the vortex, and the vortex was the first one in, and the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the fourteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.5, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.7; the third and fourth, paying two tenths, eased at 34.8; the fifth through eighth, paying a tenth and a half, eased at 34.9; the ninth through fourteenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.0. Fourteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.4, the first one in at 34.5. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the thirty-one walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 39.8, and the first boy would be paying five tenths, and the first one in would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying five tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 39.8, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.0 under no palm, the fourteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.5, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty-one walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was whether the heart could hold. Whether the first one in — the boy who'd stayed Friday, the one who'd been relieved first, the one who'd had nowhere else to go — could keep paying when the payment was his own relief, and the relief was his easing, and the easing was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the vortex, and the vortex was the first one in, and the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask — was: when the thirty-one arrived, and the first boy was eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and leaning was what he was doing before he came to the post — would the heart hold? Would the vortex hold? Would the first one in stay at the post, leaning, paying five tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 39.8, or would the heart break, and the ring collapse, and the harbor be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The first boy's cold deepened a tenth. And the thirty-one walked. And the road ran both ways. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the price. And the price was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And the fifteenth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixteen — Entry: May 9th. Saturday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Saturday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds a second breath waiting behind it — not comfort, only the continuation of holding, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it. Fourteen unnamed boys had been gathered at the NE stone since the dawn four-o'clock, and the post-keeper's eighth morning with a wall instead of a corner began the way every morning now began, by the lean, not the clock, the hill above Grayhaven pulling him the way a patient pulls a nurse to the bed at the turn of the watch — only the patient was no longer a congregation but a vortex, and the vortex was feeding the wall, and the wall was feeding the vortex, and the feeding was accelerating, and the center was going cold faster, and the first one in was paying for it.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.5 — up a tenth from Friday's 35.4. The fifteen boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the drain's deepening faster now. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday a week and a day ago — he's at 34.4. Not 34.5. 34.4. A tenth deeper than yesterday. And he's paying four tenths now. Not three. Four. The second boy's at 35.0, paying three tenths. The third and fourth are at 35.1, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth are at 35.2, paying a tenth and a half. The ninth through fifteenth are at 35.3, paying a tenth. The stone's at 35.5 under no palm. But the center's not just colder — it's getting colder faster. The drain's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is accelerating. And the thirty unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster now, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-four boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay four. The center pays more because the center's closer to the stone. And the first boy's at 34.4 and dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The thirty."

"They're walking faster. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. The kept taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And the silence is walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. And they're walking faster than a day, Mercer. They're walking faster than the seed can renew. They're walking faster than the relief can hold. And when they arrive — when forty-four boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay fourth. And the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole's the heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And the question you asked Friday — is the harbor a home or a vortex — the answer's coming, Mercer. The answer's walking the road with thirty unnamed boys, and it's coming faster than a day, and the first boy's at 34.4, and he's paying four tenths, and by Monday he'll be at 34, and 34 is leaning."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, fourteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast

boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.0 under no palm, the first one in at 34.4, the same vortex, the same acceleration, the center getting colder faster.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.5, holding the degree and a half the fifteen boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot, and the cold was deepening, and the deepening was accelerating. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.4 — was at the center of the stone, and it was deeper than it had been, six tenths deeper than yesterday, the relief draining out of him the way warmth drains out of a room when the door stays open and the wind finds the gap and the gap widens and the widening accelerates.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the fifteen gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.5 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Half a degree came back that the fifteen boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the fifteen unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying four tenths now, eased at 34.4 — was at the center, his cold deeper than the others, six tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth and a half each, eased at 35.2 — at the next ring. The ninth through fifteenth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.3 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.5 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.5. The wall was holding itself at 35.5 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.4. The second at 35.0.

The third and fourth at 35.1. The fifth through eighth at 35.2. The rest at 35.3. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

He channeled Margot. “Marg. The pay-in shifted again overnight. The first boy’s at 34.4 now — down two tenths from yesterday. Paying four tenths. The second’s at 35.0, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.2, paying a tenth and a half. The rest at 35.3, paying a tenth. The stone’s at 35.5, but the center’s colder faster. The drain’s not a drain, Marg. It’s a vortex. And the vortex is accelerating. And the first boy’s dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he’ll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning.”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence — the keeper who’d held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: “Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The fourteen calm — the first one in is at 34.4 now, down two tenths from yesterday. Paying four tenths. The second’s at 35.0, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.2, paying a tenth and a half. The rest at 35.3, paying a tenth. The coast stone’s at 36.1, up a tenth from Friday’s 36.0. But the center’s colder faster. The same vortex. The same acceleration. The ones who’ve been keeping longest are paying the most and getting the least, and the gap’s widening faster. The vortex is the heart at both ends, Mercer. And the heart’s going cold faster. And the thirty walking to your post — they’re walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they’re coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-four boys are gathered — the pay-in’s four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall’s a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole’s the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the thirty behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.5 at the post and 36.1 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening faster. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind them, the thirty walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-four boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its fifteen unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The pay-in's not just uneven anymore — it's accelerating. The first boy's at 34.4, down two tenths from yesterday. Paying four tenths. The second's at 35.0, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.2, paying a tenth and a half. The rest at 35.3, paying a tenth. The stone's at 35.5, but the center's colder faster. The drain's a vortex. And the first boy's dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning. So I'm asking — at the inland end, if the thirty walk the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast, and the pay-in's not equal when they arrive, and the center goes cold faster — then what happens to the boy at the center? What happens to the first one in, when the vortex deepens?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If thirty arrive at three deep — if forty-four boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the pay-in's not equal — if the center pays more and gets less — then the boy at the center is eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the boy at the center goes back to leaning. And if the center goes back to leaning, then the chain breaks. The walked-through keep the leaning, but if the leaning are at the center and the center goes cold faster, then the leaning are not kept — they're just leaning. And the chain's not three deep. It's two deep at the edges and zero at the center. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring. And the ring has a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who stayed because he had nowhere else to go. And if he goes back to leaning, then the wall's not a wall anymore — it's a circle of boys keeping each other at the edges, and a cold hole in the middle where the first one used to be. And the cold hole is the vortex. And the vortex is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole's getting colder faster, and the boy's dropping a tenth a day, and by Monday he'll be at 34, and 34 is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole's the heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go.”

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening faster. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And when the thirty arrived — when forty-four boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says the center goes back to leaning. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he's at 34.4 now, paying four tenths, dropping a tenth a day. When the thirty arrive, he'll be paying six tenths, eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the center goes back to leaning. And the wall's not a wall — it's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole's getting colder faster.”

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the fourteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since Thursday. Since the seven boys at the post and the fourteen at the coast started paying in. And I think — I think the vortex is not a flaw in the wheel. The vortex IS the wheel. The center pays more because the center is closer to the stone. The stone draws from the nearest source. The first boy is nearest the stone — he's been there longest, his cold is deepest in the basalt, the footings know him the way they know the builder's palm. So the stone draws from him first. And the more he pays, the deeper his cold, the less relief he gets, the more the stone draws from him, the deeper his cold. It's not a wheel, Mercer. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex has a shape. The shape is the first one in. The first one in is the vortex. And the vortex is the price. The wall holds itself because the first one in pays for it. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when he's given it all — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall is not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the price. And the price is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. So the home holds itself because the first one in is giving up his home. And when his home's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the home holds himself because he's leaning. And the home is not a home. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The fifteen boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying four tenths now, eased at 34.4 — was at the center, and his cold was deeper than the others, six tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth and a half each, eased at 35.2 — at the next ring. The ninth through fifteenth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.3 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating. And the vortex was the first one in.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.4 and would be eased at 34 by Monday. The one who was paying for the wall with his own relief. The one who was the wall's vortex.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the fifteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.4, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the third and fourth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the fifth through eighth, paying a tenth and a half, eased at 35.2; the ninth through fifteenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.3. Fifteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.5, the first one in at 34.4. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the thirty walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.1 under no palm, the fifteen calm paying in their tithe, the first one in at 34.4, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirty walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And then the sixteenth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The sixteenth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the fifteen had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.5 to 35.6. The sixteenth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the sixteenth boy was eased at 35.3. The same as the other new ones at the edge. But the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — deepened a tenth. 34.4 to 34.3. The vortex was drawing from him. The new boy's pay-in was the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind the sixteenth boy, the silence stirred. Twenty-nine unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the sixteenth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was paying. And the payment was his relief. And the relief was his easing. And the easing was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the vortex. And the vortex was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The sixteenth boy came. Stone's at 35.6 now. But the first boy deepened a tenth — 34.4 to 34.3. The new boy's pay-in is the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is the first one in. And the first one in is dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the sixteenth boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 36.1 to 36.2. And the first one in at the coast deepened a tenth — 34.4 to 34.3. The vortex is the heart at both ends. The first one in is paying for the wall. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the harbor is a home because the first one in is giving up his home. And the twenty-nine walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-four boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the twenty-nine behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?”

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the sixteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.3, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying a tenth and a half, eased at 35.1; the ninth through sixteenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Sixteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.6, the first one in at 34.3. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-nine walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.2 under no palm, the sixteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.3, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-nine walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was whether the heart could hold. Whether the first one in — the boy who'd stayed Friday, the one who'd been relieved first, the one who'd had nowhere else to go — could keep paying when the payment was his own relief, and the relief was his easing, and the easing was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the vortex, and the vortex was the first one in, and the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask — was: when the twenty-nine arrived, and the first boy was eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and leaning was what he was doing before he came to the post — would the heart hold? Would the vortex hold? Would the first one in stay at the post, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would the heart break, and the ring collapse, and the harbor be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The first boy's cold deepened a tenth. And the twenty-nine walked. And the road ran both ways. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the price. And the price was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And the seventeenth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventeen — Entry: May 10th. Sunday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Sunday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand has closed, and the thing it closed on is a wall of boys, and the wall is a vortex, and the vortex is the heart, and the heart is the first one in, and the first one in is at 34.3 and dropping a tenth a day, and the seventeenth boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the eighteenth was already walking, and the twenty-nine behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was going cold faster, and the first one in was paying for it.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.5 — up a tenth from Saturday's 35.4. The sixteen boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the drain's deepening faster now. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday a week and a day ago — he's at 34.3. Not 34.4. 34.3. A tenth deeper than yesterday. And he's paying five tenths now. Not four. Five. The second boy's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth are at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth are at 35.1, paying two tenths. The ninth through sixteenth are at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 35.5 under no palm. But the center's not just colder — it's getting colder faster. The drain's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is accelerating. And the twenty-nine unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster now, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay four. The center pays more because the center's closer to the stone. And the first boy's at 34.3 and dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The twenty-nine."

"They're walking faster. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. The kept taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And the silence is walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. And they're walking faster than a day, Mercer. They're walking faster than the seed can renew. They're walking faster than the relief can hold. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay four. And the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole's the heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And the question you asked Saturday — is the harbor a home or a vortex — the answer's coming, Mercer. The answer's walking the road with twenty-nine unnamed boys, and it's coming faster than a day, and the first boy's at 34.3, and he's paying five tenths, and by Monday he'll be at 34, and 34 is leaning."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, fourteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.2 under no palm, the first one in at 34.3, the same vortex, the same acceleration, the center getting colder faster.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.5, holding the degree and a half the sixteen boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot, and the cold was deepening, and the deepening was accelerating. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.3 — was at the center of the stone, and it was deeper than it had been, seven tenths deeper than yesterday, the relief draining out of him the way warmth drains out of a room when the door stays open and the wind finds the gap and the gap widens and the widening accelerates.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the sixteen gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.5 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Half a degree came back that the sixteen boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the sixteen unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying five tenths now, eased at 34.3 — was at the center, his cold deeper than the others, seven tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through sixteenth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.5 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.5. The wall was holding itself at 35.5 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.3. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The pay-in shifted again overnight. The first boy's at 34.3 now — down two tenths from yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 35.5, but the center's colder faster. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a vortex. And the vortex is accelerating. And the first boy's dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The fourteen calm — the first one in is at 34.3 now, down two tenths from yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The coast stone's at 36.2, up a tenth from Saturday's 36.1. But the center's colder faster. The same vortex. The same acceleration. The ones who've been keeping longest are paying the most and getting the least, and the gap's widening faster. The vortex is the heart at both ends, Mercer. And the heart's going cold faster. And the twenty-nine walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the twenty-nine behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.5 at the post and 36.2 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening faster. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind them, the twenty-nine walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its sixteen unnamed through the road.

“Lori. The pay-in's not just uneven anymore — it's accelerating. The first boy's at 34.3, down two tenths from yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 35.5, but the center's colder faster. The drain's a vortex. And the first boy's dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning. So I'm asking — at the inland end, if the twenty-nine walk the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast, and the pay-in's not equal when they arrive, and the center goes cold faster — then what happens to the boy at the center? What happens to the first one in, when the vortex deepens?”

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. “Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If twenty-nine arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the pay-in's not equal — if the center pays more and gets less — then the boy at the center is eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the boy at the center goes back to leaning. And if the center goes back to leaning, then the chain breaks. The walked-through keep the leaning, but if the leaning are at the center and the center goes cold faster, then the leaning are not kept — they're just leaning. And the chain's not three deep. It's two deep at the edges and zero at the center. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring. And the ring has a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who stayed because he had nowhere else to go. And if he goes back to leaning, then the wall's not a wall anymore — it's a circle of boys keeping each other at the edges, and a cold hole in the middle where the first one used to be. And the cold hole is the vortex. And the vortex is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole's getting colder faster, and the boy's dropping a tenth a day, and by Monday he'll be at 34, and 34 is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole's the heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening faster. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And when the twenty-nine arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the center goes back to leaning. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he's at 34.3 now, paying five tenths, dropping a tenth a day. When the twenty-nine arrive, he'll be paying six tenths, eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the center goes back to leaning. And the wall's not a wall — it's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole's getting colder faster."

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the fourteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since Thursday. Since the seven boys at the post and the fourteen at the coast started paying in. And I think — I think the vortex is not a flaw in the wheel. The vortex IS the wheel. The center pays more because the center is closer to the stone. The stone draws from the nearest source. The first boy is nearest the stone — he's been there longest, his cold is deepest in the basalt, the footings know him the way they know the builder's palm. So the stone draws from him first. And the more he pays, the deeper his cold, the less relief he gets, the more the stone draws from him, the deeper his cold. It's not a wheel, Mercer. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex has a shape. The shape is the first one in. The first one in is the vortex. And the vortex is the price. The wall holds itself because the first one in pays for it. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when he's given it all — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall is not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the price. And the price is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. So the home holds itself because the first one in is giving up his home. And when his home's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the home holds himself because he's leaning. And the home is not a home. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go.”

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The sixteen boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying five tenths now, eased at 34.3 — was at the center, and his cold was deeper than the others, seven tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through sixteenth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating. And the vortex was the first one in.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.3 and would be eased at 34 by Monday. The one who was paying for the wall with his own relief. The one who was the wall's vortex.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the sixteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.3, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the ninth through sixteenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Sixteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.5, the first one in at 34.3. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-nine walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.2 under no palm, the sixteen calm paying in their tithe, the first one in at 34.3, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-nine walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And then the seventeenth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The seventeenth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the sixteen had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.5 to 35.6. The seventeenth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the seventeenth boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. But the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — deepened a tenth. 34.3 to 34.2. The vortex was drawing from him. The new boy's pay-in was the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind the seventeenth boy, the silence stirred. Twenty-eight unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the seventeenth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was paying. And the payment was his relief. And the relief was his easing. And the easing was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the vortex. And the vortex was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The seventeenth boy came. Stone's at 35.6 now. But the first boy deepened a tenth — 34.3 to 34.2. The new boy's pay-in is the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is the first one in. And the first one in is dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by Monday. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the seventeenth boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 36.2 to 36.3. And the first one in at the coast deepened a tenth — 34.3 to 34.2. The vortex is the heart at both ends. The first one in is paying for the wall. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the harbor is a home because the first one in is giving up his home. And the twenty-eight walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the twenty-eight behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?”

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the seventeen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.2, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the ninth through seventeenth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Seventeen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.6, the first one in at 34.2. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-eight walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.3 under no palm, the seventeen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.2, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-eight walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was whether the heart could hold. Whether the first one in — the boy who'd stayed Friday, the one who'd been relieved first, the one who'd had nowhere else to go — could keep paying when the payment was his own relief, and the relief was his easing, and the easing was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the vortex, and the vortex was the first one in, and the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask — was: when the twenty-eight arrived, and the first boy was eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and leaning was what he was doing before he came to the post — would the heart hold? Would the vortex hold? Would the first one in stay at the post, leaning, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would the heart break, and the ring collapse, and the harbor be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The first boy's cold deepened a tenth. And the twenty-eight walked. And the road ran both ways. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the price. And the price was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And the eighteenth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighteen — Entry: May 11th. Monday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Monday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand has closed, and the thing it closed on is a wall of boys, and the wall is a vortex, and the vortex is the heart, and the heart is the first one in, and the first one in is at 34.1 and dropping a tenth a day, and the eighteenth boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the nineteenth was already walking, and the twenty-seven behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was going cold faster, and the first one in was paying for it.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.6 — up a tenth from Sunday's 35.5. The seventeen boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the drain's deepening faster now. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday a week and two days ago — he's at 34.1. Not 34.2. 34.1. A tenth deeper than yesterday. And he's paying six tenths now. Not five. Six. The second boy's at 34.8, paying five tenths. The third and fourth are at 34.9, paying four tenths. The fifth through eighth are at 35.0, paying three tenths. The ninth through seventeenth are at 35.1, paying two tenths. The stone's at 35.6 under no palm. But the center's not just colder — it's getting colder faster. The drain's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is accelerating. And the twenty-seven unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster now, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays seven tenths. The second pays six. The third and fourth pay five. The center pays more because the center's closer to the stone. And the first boy's at 34.1 and dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by tomorrow. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The twenty-seven."

"They're walking faster. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center cold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. The kept taught the leaning. The leaning taught the silence. And the silence is walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. And they're walking faster than a day, Mercer. They're walking faster than the seed can renew. They're walking faster than the relief can hold. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost is not equal. The first boy pays seven tenths. The second pays six. The third and fourth pay five. And the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question you asked Sunday — is the harbor a home or a vortex — the answer's coming, Mercer. The answer's walking the road with twenty-seven unnamed boys, and it's coming faster than a day, and the first boy's at 34.1, and he's paying six tenths, and by tomorrow he'll be at 34, and 34 is leaning."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, fourteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.3 under no palm, the first one in at 34.1, the same vortex, the same acceleration, the center getting colder faster.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.6, holding the degree and a half the seventeen boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot, and the cold was deepening, and the deepening was accelerating. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.1 — was at the center of the stone, and it was deeper than it had been, nine tenths deeper than yesterday, the relief draining out of him the way warmth drains out of a room when the door stays open and the wind finds the gap and the gap widens and the widening accelerates.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the seventeen gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.6 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Half a degree came back that the seventeen boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the seventeen unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.1 — was at the center, his cold deeper than the others, nine tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying four tenths each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — at the next ring. The ninth through seventeenth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.6 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.6. The wall was holding itself at 35.6 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.1. The second at 34.8. The third and fourth at 34.9. The fifth through eighth at 35.0. The rest at 35.1. The center was colder. The edges were warmer. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The pay-in shifted again overnight. The first boy's at 34.1 now — down three tenths from yesterday. Paying six tenths. The second's at 34.8, paying five tenths. The third and fourth at 34.9, paying four tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The rest at 35.1, paying two tenths. The stone's at 35.6, but the center's colder faster. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a vortex. And the vortex is accelerating. And the first boy's dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by tomorrow. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The fourteen calm — the first one in is at 34.1 now, down three tenths from yesterday. Paying six tenths. The second's at 34.8, paying five tenths. The third and fourth at 34.9, paying four tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The rest at 35.1, paying two tenths. The coast stone's at 36.3, up a tenth from Sunday's 36.2. But the center's colder faster. The same vortex. The same acceleration. The ones who've been keeping longest are paying the most and getting the least, and the gap's widening faster. The vortex is the heart at both ends, Mercer. And the heart's going cold faster. And the twenty-seven walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays seven tenths, and the second pays six, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the twenty-seven behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.6 at the post and 36.3 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening faster. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind them, the twenty-seven walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its seventeen unnamed through the road.

“Lori. The pay-in's not just uneven anymore — it's accelerating. The first boy's at 34.1, down three tenths from yesterday. Paying six tenths. The second's at 34.8, paying five tenths. The third and fourth at 34.9, paying four tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The rest at 35.1, paying two tenths. The stone's at 35.6, but the center's colder faster. The drain's a vortex. And the first boy's dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by tomorrow. And 34 is leaning. So I'm asking — at the inland end, if the twenty-seven walk the road to the crib the way they're walking it to the coast, and the pay-in's not equal when they arrive, and the center goes cold faster — then what happens to the boy at the center? What happens to the first one in, when the vortex deepens?”

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. “Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If twenty-seven arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the pay-in's not equal — if the center pays more and gets less — then the boy at the center is eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the boy at the center goes back to leaning. And if the center goes back to leaning, then the chain breaks. The walked-through keep the leaning, but if the leaning are at the center and the center goes cold faster, then the leaning are not kept — they're just leaning. And the chain's not three deep. It's two deep at the edges and zero at the center. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring. And the ring has a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who stayed because he had nowhere else to go. And if he goes back to leaning, then the wall's not a wall anymore — it's a circle of boys keeping each other at the edges, and a cold hole in the middle where the first one used to be. And the cold hole is the vortex. And the vortex is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole's getting colder faster, and the boy's dropping a tenth a day, and by tomorrow he'll be at 34, and 34 is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when his harbor's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall's not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole's the heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was colder faster. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were getting the least relief, and the gap was widening faster. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And when the twenty-seven arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first boy would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the center goes back to leaning. The first boy — the one who stayed Friday — he's at 34.1 now, paying six tenths, dropping a tenth a day. When the twenty-seven arrive, he'll be paying seven tenths, eased at 34. And 34 is leaning. So the center goes back to leaning. And the wall's not a wall — it's a ring with a hole in the middle. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. So the wall that holds itself has a hole in the middle, and the hole is the boy who needed it most, and the hole's getting colder faster."

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the fourteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since Friday. Since the seven boys at the post and the fourteen at the coast started paying in. And I think — I think the vortex is not a flaw in the wheel. The vortex IS the wheel. The center pays more because the center is closer to the stone. The stone draws from the nearest source. The first boy is nearest the stone — he's been there longest, his cold is deepest in the basalt, the footings know him the way they know the builder's palm. So the stone draws from him first. And the more he pays, the deeper his cold, the less relief he gets, the more the stone draws from him, the deeper his cold. It's not a wheel, Mercer. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex has a shape. The shape is the first one in. The first one in is the vortex. And the vortex is the price."

The wall holds itself because the first one in pays for it. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And when he's given it all — when he's at 34, leaning — the wall holds himself because he's leaning. And the wall is not a wall. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the first one in. And the first one in is the price. And the price is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. So the home holds itself because the first one in is giving up his home. And when his home's gone — when he's at 34, leaning — the home holds himself because he's leaning. And the home is not a home. It's a ring with a hole. And the hole is the heart. And the heart is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The seventeen boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.1 — was at the center, and his cold was deeper than the others, nine tenths deeper than yesterday, the vortex drawing from him faster. The second — come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying four tenths each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — at the next ring. The ninth through seventeenth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. The center was the first ones in, and the center was getting colder faster, and the edges were warmer, and the cost was shifting to the ones who'd been paying longest, and the shift was accelerating. And the vortex was the first one in.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.1 and would be eased at 34 by tomorrow. The one who was paying for the wall with his own relief. The one who was the wall's vortex.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the seventeen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.1, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the fifth through eighth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the ninth through seventeenth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1. Seventeen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.6, the first one in at 34.1. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-seven walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.3 under no palm, the seventeen calm paying in their tithe, the first one in at 34.1, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-seven walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And then the eighteenth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The eighteenth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the seventeen had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.6 to 35.7. The eighteenth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the eighteenth boy was eased at 35.1. The same as the other new ones at the edge. But the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — deepened a tenth.

34.1 to 34.0. The vortex was drawing from him. The new boy's pay-in was the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was the first one in.

And behind the eighteenth boy, the silence stirred. Twenty-six unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the eighteenth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was paying. And the payment was his relief. And the relief was his easing. And the easing was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the vortex. And the vortex was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The eighteenth boy came. Stone's at 35.7 now. But the first boy deepened a tenth — 34.1 to 34.0. The new boy's pay-in is the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a vortex. And the vortex is the first one in. And the first one in is dropping a tenth a day. At that rate, he'll be at 34 by tomorrow. And 34 is leaning."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the eighteenth boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 36.3 to 36.4. And the first one in at the coast deepened a tenth — 34.1 to 34.0. The vortex is the heart at both ends. The first one in is paying for the wall. And the payment is his relief. And the relief is his easing. And the easing is the harbor. So the harbor is a home because the first one in is giving up his home. And the twenty-six walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center cold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays seven tenths, and the second pays six, and the center goes to 34, and 34 is leaning, and the wall's a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole's the first one in, and the first one in is leaning, and leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it eats? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a vortex? And is the vortex the first one in, or is the vortex the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34, leaning, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 —

does he stay, or does he go? And if he goes, does the wall collapse? And if the wall collapses, do the twenty-six behind him turn back to the silence? And if they turn back, was the harbor a home, or was it the longest watch — and was the watch kept by the living, or by the dead, and did it matter, and was the warmth the point, or was the company the point, and was the company warm enough when the boys were paying a tenth of their own warmth to keep the stone lit?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the eighteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.0, the vortex, the heart; the second, come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the fifth through eighth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the ninth through eighteenth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1. Eighteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.7, the first one in at 34.0. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was the heart. And the heart was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-six walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a hole in the middle, and the hole would be the first one in, and the first one in would be leaning.

But the question was not whether the first one in would lean. The question was whether the first one in would stay. If the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the first one in, and the first one in was giving up his relief to hold the wall — then when his relief was gone, when he was eased at 34, when 34 was leaning, when leaning was what he'd been doing before he came to the post — would he stay at the post, leaning, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would he lift his hand and go back to the silence he came from, and the wall would lose its heart, and the ring would collapse, and the harbor would be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.4 under no palm, the eighteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.0, the vortex. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-six walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy's cold deepened, and the stone drew from him, and the vortex was the heart, and the heart was the price.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was whether the heart could hold. Whether the first one in — the boy who'd stayed Friday, the one who'd been relieved first, the one who'd had nowhere else to go — could keep paying when the payment was his own relief, and the relief was his easing, and the easing was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the vortex, and the vortex was the first one in, and the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And the question behind the question — the question Walter had built the door to ask — was: when the twenty-six arrived, and the first boy was eased at 34, and 34 was leaning, and leaning was what he was doing before he came to the post — would the heart hold? Would the vortex hold? Would the first one in stay at the post, leaning, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, or would the heart break, and the ring collapse, and the harbor be a home that ate its own heart and then starved?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The first boy's cold deepened a tenth. And the twenty-six walked. And the road ran both ways. And the vortex was the heart. And the heart was the price. And the price was the first one in. And the first one in was the boy who had nowhere else to go.

And the nineteenth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Nineteen — Entry: May 12th. Tuesday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Tuesday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand has closed, and the thing it closed on is a wall of boys, and the wall is a vortex, and the vortex is the heart, and the heart is the first one in, and the first one in is at 34.0 and holding, and the twentieth boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the twenty-first was already walking, and the twenty-five behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was at the threshold, and the first one in was the threshold.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.7 — up a tenth from Monday's 35.6. The eighteen boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the first boy. The one who stayed Friday a week and three days ago. He's at 34.0. Not 34.1. 34.0. And he's not dropping anymore. He's holding. He's been holding since four-o'clock this morning. 34.0 and holding. And the stone's drawing from him — I can feel it through the road, the way the footings draw from the nearest source — but he's not deepening. He's at 34.0 and he's holding. And the second boy's at 34.8, paying five tenths. The third and fourth at 34.9, paying four tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The ninth through eighteenth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The stone's at 35.7 under no palm. But the center's not getting colder. The center's holding. The first boy's at 34.0 and he's holding. And the twenty-five unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center hold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays seven tenths. The second pays six. The third and fourth pay five. And the center holds at 34.0. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is giving up his harbor. And he's at 34.0 and holding. And the question you asked Monday — is the harbor a home or a vortex — the answer's holding, Mercer. The answer's at 34.0 and holding, and it's not deepening, and it's not warming, and it's holding."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "He's holding."

"He's holding. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.0 and holding. And I think — I think he's not being consumed, Mercer. I think he's becoming the keystone. The heart of the vortex is becoming the foundation of the wall. The first one in is not the price. The first one in is the post. And the post doesn't get relieved. The post holds. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. The wall is not eating his heart. His heart is the wall. And the wall is not a vortex. The wall is a ring with a keystone in the middle. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the cold at the center that holds the ring together. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.0 and holding."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, fourteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.4 under no palm, the first one in at 34.0, holding, the same threshold, the same holding.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.7, holding the degree and a half the eighteen boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot, and the cold was not deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.0 — was at the center of the stone, and it was not deeper than it had been. It was holding. The vortex was drawing from him but he was not deepening. He was at 34.0 and holding. The way a keystone holds. The way a post holds. The way the thing at the center holds the ring together.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the eighteen gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.7 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Half a degree came back that the eighteen boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the eighteen unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.0 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was holding. The second — come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying four tenths each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — at the next ring. The ninth through eighteenth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was not a drain. The vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.7 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.7. The wall was holding itself at 35.7 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.0. The second at 34.8. The third and fourth at 34.9. The fifth through eighth at 35.0. The rest at 35.1. The center was not colder. The center was holding. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first boy's holding at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.0 and holding. And I think — I think you're right. I think he's not being consumed. I think he's becoming the keystone. The heart of the vortex is becoming the foundation of the wall."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The first one in is at 34.0 and holding. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. And the coast stone's at 36.4, up a tenth from Monday's 36.3. And the eighteen calm — the first one in is at 34.0 and holding. The same threshold. The same holding. The keystone is the heart at both ends, Mercer. And the heart's holding. And the twenty-five walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center hold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays seven tenths, and the second pays six, and the center holds at 34.0. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is the keystone. And the keystone is not relieved. The keystone holds. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. The wall is not eating his heart. His heart is the wall. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the heart it's built on? Is a town that feeds itself worth the hunger it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a keystone? And is the keystone the first one in, or is the keystone the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that holds the ring together? And if he's the keystone, can he ever leave? And if he can't leave, is the harbor a home, or is it a prison? And is the prison the price of the home? And is the home worth the prison? And is the keystone the prisoner, or is the keystone the guard? And is the guard the one who holds the ring together, or is the guard the one the ring holds together? And when the twenty-five arrive, and the first boy is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a ring with a keystone in the middle? And is the keystone the heart, or is the keystone the lock? And is the lock the thing that keeps the harbor safe, or is the lock the thing that keeps the harbor from ever closing? And if the harbor never closes, is it a home, or is it a door that never shuts? And is a door that never shuts a home, or is it a wound that never heals? And is the wound the price of the home? And is the home worth the wound? And is the keystone the wound, or is the keystone the healing? And is the healing the thing that holds the ring together, or is the healing the thing the ring holds together? And when the twenty-five arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — and the first boy is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — what is the wall? What is the harbor? What is the home? And what is the keystone?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.7 at the post and 36.4 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was holding. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were holding. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

And behind them, the twenty-five walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its eighteen unnamed through the road.

“Lori. The first boy's holding at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. And Margot thinks he's becoming the keystone. The heart of the vortex is becoming the foundation of the wall. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the first one in is the keystone, and the keystone can't leave, and the keystone holds the ring together — then what happens when the twenty-five arrive? What happens when the keystone is at 34.0 and holding and the ring is at 40.5 and the pay-in's four and a half degrees? What happens to the keystone?”

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. “Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If twenty-five arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the first one in is the keystone — if he's not being consumed but becoming the thing that holds the ring together — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a ring. And the ring's not a drain. The ring's a foundation. And the foundation's not a cost. The foundation's a keystone. And the keystone's not a prisoner. The keystone's a post. And the post doesn't get relieved. The post holds. And the holding's not a cost. The holding's the thing itself. So the wall that holds itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the cold at the center that holds the ring together. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.0 and holding. And the question is — is a home that's built on a heart a home, or is it a tomb? And is the tomb the price of the home? And is the home worth the tomb? And is the keystone the living or the dead? And is the dead the foundation of the living? And is the living the thing the dead hold up? And when the twenty-five arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a tomb? And is the tomb the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the tomb bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the one who had nowhere else to go? And is nowhere else to go the same as home? And is home the same as a place that holds you? And is a place that holds you the same as a place you can't leave? And is a place you can't leave the same as a prison? And is a prison the same as a home if you're the one who holds the walls together? And are the walls the same as the ring? And is the ring the same as the harbor? And is the harbor the same as the home? And is the home the same as the keystone? And is the keystone the same as the first one in? And is the first one in the same as the one who had nowhere else to go? And is the one who had nowhere else to go the same as the one who found the place that holds him? And is the place that holds him the same as the place he holds? And is the place he holds the same as the wall? And is the wall the same as the harbor? And is the harbor the same as the home? And is the home the same as the keystone? And is the keystone the same as the heart? And is the heart the same as the first one in? And is the first one in the same as the one who had nowhere else to go?"

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was holding. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were holding. The drain was a vortex. And the vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

And when the twenty-five arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the keystone is the heart and the heart is the home and the home is the place that holds you and the place you holds is the wall and the wall is the harbor and the harbor is the keystone. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a vortex. The question is whether the keystone is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The keystone is the dead who holds up the living. And the living is the thing the dead hold up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.0 and holding.”

Margot’s silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who’d held the hinge since June, the one who’d received the fourteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I’ve been thinking about that question since Monday. Since the first boy reached 34.0 and held. And I think — I think the keystone is not the living or the dead. The keystone is the threshold. The keystone is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. The first one in is at 34.0 — the threshold of leaning. He’s not leaning and he’s not relieved. He’s holding. And the holding is the threshold. And the threshold is the keystone. And the keystone is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the foundation. And the foundation is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.0. And 34.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the threshold. And the threshold is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself.”

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient’s breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The eighteen boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.0 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was holding. The second — come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying four tenths each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — at the next ring. The ninth through eighteenth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.0. And 34.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was holding.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.0 and was not deepening. The one who was the keystone. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the eighteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.0, the keystone, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the fifth through eighth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the ninth through eighteenth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1. Eighteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.7, the first one in at 34.0, holding. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-five walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

But the question was not whether the first one in would hold. The first one in was holding. The question was what the holding meant. If the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up, and the holding was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that holds you? Was the thing itself the place you hold? Was the thing itself the holding? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead hold each other up and neither one lets go?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.4 under no palm, the eighteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.0, holding, the keystone, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-five walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy held at 34.0, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the vortex was a keystone, and the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

And then the twentieth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The twentieth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the eighteen had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.7 to 35.8. The twentieth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twentieth boy was eased at 35.1. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — held at 34.0. Not 33.9. Not 34.1. 34.0. The vortex was drawing from him but he was not deepening. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a vortex. And the vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.0. And 34.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was holding.

And behind the twentieth boy, the silence stirred. Twenty-four unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twentieth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy hold. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was holding. And the holding was not a cost. The holding was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The twentieth boy came. Stone's at 35.8 now. And the first boy held at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.0. And 34.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is holding."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. “Mercer. I felt the twentieth boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 36.4 to 36.5. And the first one in at the coast held at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The keystone is the threshold at both ends. The first one in is holding. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the twenty-four walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center hold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays seven tenths, and the second pays six, and the center holds at 34.0. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the threshold it's built on? Is a town that feeds itself worth the threshold it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a threshold? And is the threshold the first one in, or is the threshold the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that holds the ring together? And if he's the keystone, can he ever leave? And if he can't leave, is the harbor a home, or is it a threshold? And is the threshold the price of the home? And is the home worth the threshold? And is the keystone the prisoner, or is the keystone the door? And is the door the thing that keeps the harbor open, or is the door the thing that keeps the harbor from ever closing? And if the harbor never closes, is it a home, or is it a threshold that never shuts? And is a threshold that never shuts a home, or is it a promise that never ends? And is the promise the price of the home? And is the home worth the promise? And is the keystone the promise, or is the keystone the keeper? And is the keeper the one who holds the ring together, or is the keeper the one the ring holds together? And when the twenty-four arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — what is the wall? What is the harbor? What is the home? What is the threshold? And what is the keystone?”

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the nineteen colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.0, the keystone, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the fifth through eighth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the ninth through twentieth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1. Nineteen boys, paying in, the stone at 35.8, the first one in at 34.0, holding. The wall was holding itself. The vortex was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-four walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

But the question was not whether the first one in would hold. The first one in was holding. The question was what the holding meant. If the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up, and the holding was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that holds you? Was the thing itself the place you hold? Was the thing itself the holding? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead hold each other up and neither one lets go? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when a boy who had nowhere else to go finds the place that holds him and becomes the place that holds the others and the holding is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the threshold and the threshold is the keystone and the keystone is the first one in and the first one in is at 34.0 and holding?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.5 under no palm, the nineteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.0, holding, the keystone, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-four walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy held at 34.0, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the vortex was a keystone, and the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was not whether the heart could hold. The heart could hold. The question was what the holding meant. And the answer was at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5, and the answer was the keystone, and the answer was the threshold, and the answer was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

And the twenty-first boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty — Entry:

May 13th. Wednesday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Wednesday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand has closed, and the thing it closed on is a wall of boys, and the wall is a ring, and the ring is a keystone, and the keystone is the first one in, and the first one in is at 34.0 and holding, and the twenty-first boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the twenty-second was already walking, and the twenty-three behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was at the threshold, and the first one in was the threshold, and the threshold was holding.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 35.8 — up a tenth from Tuesday's 35.7. The twenty boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the first boy. The one who stayed Friday a week and four days ago. He's at 34.0. Still. Not 33.9. Not 34.1. 34.0. And he's been holding since four-o'clock Tuesday morning. A full day at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. And the second boy's at 34.8, paying five tenths. The third and fourth at 34.9, paying four tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The ninth through twentieth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The stone's at 35.8 under no palm. But the center's not getting colder. The center's holding. The first boy's at 34.0 and he's holding. And the twenty-three unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center hold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays seven tenths. The second pays six. The third and fourth pay five. And the center holds at 34.0. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "He's been holding a full day."

"He's been holding a full day. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.0 and holding. And I think — I think the keystone is not a cost, Mercer. I think the keystone is a post. And the post doesn't get relieved. The post holds. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. The wall is not eating his heart. His heart is the wall. And the wall is not a vortex. The wall is a ring with a keystone in the middle. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the cold at the center that holds the ring together. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.0 and holding."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, nineteen calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.5 under no palm, the first one in at 34.0, holding, the same threshold, the same holding.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 35.8, holding the degree and a half the twenty boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and cooler at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, only the core was cold, not hot, and the cold was not deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.0 — was at the center of the stone, and it was not deeper than it had been. It was holding. The vortex was drawing from him but he was not deepening. He was at 34.0 and holding. The way a keystone holds. The way a post holds. The way the thing at the center holds the ring together.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the twenty gathered colds. The stone knew him. 35.8 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. Half a degree came back that the twenty boys' pay-in had held but could not pay. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the twenty unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.0 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was holding. The second — come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying four tenths each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — at the next ring. The ninth through twentieth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone dropped to 35.8 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.0, not 34.7, not the seed's fading hold. 35.8. The wall was holding itself at 35.8 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.0. The second at 34.8. The third and fourth at 34.9. The fifth through eighth at 35.0. The rest at 35.1. The center was not colder. The center was holding. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first boy's been holding a full day. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.0 and holding. And I think — I think you're right. I think the keystone is not a cost. I think the keystone is a post. And the post doesn't get relieved. The post holds. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The first one in is at 34.0 and holding. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. And the coast stone's at 36.5, holding the same degree and a half. And the nineteen calm — the first one in is at 34.0 and holding. The same threshold. The same holding. The keystone is the heart at both ends, Mercer."

And the heart's holding. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the twenty-three walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center hold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays seven tenths, and the second pays six, and the center holds at 34.0. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the threshold it's built on? Is a town that feeds itself worth the threshold it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a threshold? And is the threshold the first one in, or is the threshold the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that holds the ring together? And if he's the keystone, can he ever leave? And if he can't leave, is the harbor a home, or is it a threshold? And is the threshold the price of the home? And is the home worth the threshold?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.8 at the post and 36.5 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was holding. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were holding. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

And behind them, the twenty-three walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twenty unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The first boy's been holding a full day. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.0 and holding. And Margot thinks the keystone is not a cost — it's a post. And the post doesn't get relieved. The post holds. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the first one in is the keystone, and the keystone can't leave, and the keystone holds the ring together — then what happens when the twenty-three arrive? What happens when the keystone is at 34.0 and holding and the ring is at 40.5 and the pay-in's four and a half degrees? What happens to the keystone?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If twenty-three arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the first one in is the keystone — if he's not being consumed but becoming the thing that holds the ring together — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a ring. And the ring's not a drain. The ring's a foundation. And the foundation's not a cost. The foundation's a keystone. And the keystone's not a prisoner. The keystone's a post. And the post doesn't get relieved. The post holds. And the holding's not a cost. The holding's the thing itself. So the wall that holds itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the cold at the center that holds the ring together. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.0 and holding. And the question is — is a home that's built on a heart a home, or is it a tomb? And is the tomb the price of the home? And is the home worth the tomb? And is the keystone the living or the dead? And is the dead the foundation of the living? And is the living the thing the dead hold up? And when the twenty-three arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a tomb? And is the tomb the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the tomb bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the one who had nowhere else to go? And is the one who had nowhere else to go the one who holds the ring together? And is the ring the wall? And is the wall the harbor? And is the harbor the home? And is the home the place where the living and the dead hold each other up? And is the holding not a cost? And is the holding the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was holding. The edges were warmer. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were holding. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.0 and holding.

And when the twenty-three arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says the keystone is the heart and the heart is the home and the home is the place that holds you and the place you hold is the wall and the wall is the harbor and the harbor is the keystone. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a vortex. The question is whether the keystone is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The keystone is the dead who holds up the living. And the living is the thing the dead hold up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.0 and holding.”

Margot’s silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who’d held the hinge since June, the one who’d received the nineteen calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I’ve been thinking about that question since Tuesday. Since the first boy reached 34.0 and held. And I think — I think the keystone is not the living or the dead. The keystone is the threshold. The keystone is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. The first one in is at 34.0 — the threshold of leaning. He’s not leaning and he’s not relieved. He’s holding. And the holding is the threshold. And the threshold is the keystone. And the keystone is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the foundation. And the foundation is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.0. And 34.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the threshold. And the threshold is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself.”

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twenty boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.0 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was holding. The second — come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying four tenths each, eased at 34.9 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — at the next ring. The ninth through twentieth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.0. And 34.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was holding.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.0 and was not deepening. The one who was the keystone. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the twenty colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.0, the keystone, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the fifth through eighth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the ninth through twentieth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1. Twenty boys, paying in, the stone at 35.8, the first one in at 34.0, holding. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-three walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

But the question was not whether the first one in would hold. The first one in was holding. The question was what the holding meant. If the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up, and the holding was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that holds you? Was the thing itself the place you hold? Was the thing itself the holding? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead hold each other up and neither one lets go?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.5 under no palm, the nineteen calm paying in, the first one in at 34.0, holding, the keystone, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-three walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy held at 34.0, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

And then the twenty-first boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The twenty-first boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 35.8 to 35.9. The twenty-first boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-first boy was eased at 35.1. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — held at 34.0. Not 33.9. Not 34.1. 34.0. The ring was drawing from him but he was not deepening. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.0. And 34.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was holding.

And behind the twenty-first boy, the silence stirred. Twenty-two unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-first boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy hold. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was holding. And the holding was not a cost. The holding was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

Cal channeled Margot. “Marg. The twenty-first boy came. Stone’s at 35.9 now. And the first boy held at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The new boy’s pay-in was not the old boy’s cost. The wall’s not a wheel, Marg. It’s not a drain. It’s a ring. And the ring is a keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.0. And 34.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is holding.”

Margot’s voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. “Mercer. I felt the twenty-first boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 36.5 to 36.6. And the first one in at the coast held at 34.0. Not deepening. Not warming. Holding. The keystone is the threshold at both ends. The first one in is holding. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the twenty-two walking to your post — they’re walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center hold, and they’re coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in’s four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays seven tenths, and the second pays six, and the center holds at 34.0. And 34 is leaning. And leaning is what he was doing before he came to the post. So the wall holds itself because the first one in is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is the place where the living and the dead hold each other up. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the question is — is a wall that holds itself worth the threshold it’s built on? Is a town that feeds itself worth the threshold it feeds on? Is the harbor a home, or is it a threshold? And is the threshold the first one in, or is the threshold the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.0, holding, paying seven tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 40.5 — does he stay because he’s relieved, or does he stay because he’s the thing that holds the ring together? And if he’s the keystone, can he ever leave? And if he can’t leave, is the harbor a home, or is it a threshold? And is the threshold the price of the home? And is the home worth the threshold? And is the keystone the prisoner, or is the keystone the door? And is the door the thing that keeps the harbor open, or is the door the thing that keeps the harbor closed? And is the harbor the home, or is the harbor the door? And is the door the threshold, or is the threshold the home? And is the home the place where the living and the dead hold each other up, or is the home the place where the living and the dead let each other go?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the twenty-one colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.0, the keystone, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.8; the third and fourth, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the fifth through eighth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the ninth through twenty-first, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1. Twenty-one boys, paying in, the stone at 35.9, the first one in at 34.0, holding. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty-two walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.0, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding.

But the question was not whether the first one in would hold. The first one in was holding. The question was what the holding meant. If the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up, and the holding was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that holds you? Was the thing itself the place you hold? Was the thing itself the holding? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead hold each other up and neither one lets go? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when a boy who had nowhere else to go finds the place that holds him and becomes the place that holds the others and the holding is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the threshold and the threshold is the keystone and the keystone is the first one in and the first one in is at 34.0 and holding?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.6 under no palm, the twenty calm paying in, the first one in at 34.0, holding, the keystone, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-two walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy held at 34.0, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up.

And then the first boy's cold warmed a tenth.

Cal felt it before he understood it — felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, eased at 34.0, the keystone, the threshold — warmed a tenth. 34.0 to 34.1. Not because Cal's palm was on the stone. Cal's palm was on the wheel. Not because a new boy had paid in. The twenty-first boy had paid in an hour ago, and the stone had ticked to 35.9, and the first boy had held at 34.0. This was not a new boy's pay-in. This was not the builder's palm. This was the keystone warming on its own.

The first boy's cold warmed a tenth. 34.0 to 34.1. And the stone held at 35.9. And the wall held. And the ring held. And the keystone held. And the holding was not a cost. The holding was the thing itself.

Cal's hand tightened on the wheel. He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first boy's cold just warmed a tenth. 34.0 to 34.1. No palm. No new pay-in. The keystone warmed on its own."

Margot's silence was the longest yet. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast. The first one in at the coast just warmed a tenth. 34.0 to 34.1. No palm. No new pay-in. The keystone warmed on its own. At both ends. The keystones are warming, Mercer. The keystones are not being consumed. The keystones are not the price. The keystones are the post. And the post is alive. And the holding is not a cost. The holding is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place that warms you when you stop paying for it."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 35.9 at the post and 36.6 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was not colder. The center was warmer. The first boy was eased at 34.1. Not 34.0. 34.1. A tenth warmer than he'd been. And the stone held at 35.9. And the wall held. And the ring held. And the keystone held. And the keystone was warming.

And the keystone was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he had a place. And the place was the threshold. And the threshold was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And behind them, the twenty-two walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying seven tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.1, and 34 was leaning, and the wall would be a ring with a keystone in the middle, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be holding, and the holding would not be a cost, and the holding would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

But the question was not whether the keystone could warm. The keystone could warm. The question was what the warming meant. If the keystone could warm without being fed — without the builder's palm, without a new boy's pay-in — then what had the wall been eating all along? Was it ever a drain, or was it always a home that the boys were paying rent to because they didn't know they already lived there? And if the wall was a home, then what was the door? And if the door was open, then who was knocking? And if the keystone was not the price but the post, and the post was alive, and the holding was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that warms you when you stop paying for it? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead hold each other up and neither one lets go and the holding is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the place that warms you when you stop paying for it?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.6 under no palm, the twenty calm paying in, the first one in at 34.1, warming, the keystone, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty-two walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy warmed at 34.1, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead held each other up, and the holding was not a cost, and the holding was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was not whether the keystone could warm. The keystone could warm. The question was what the warming meant. And the answer was at 34.1, warming, paying six tenths of nothing to hold the wall at 35.9, and the answer was the keystone, and the answer was the threshold, and the answer was the place where the living and the dead held each other up, and the answer was the home, and the answer was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And the twenty-second boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-One —

Entry: May 14th. Thursday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Thursday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand has closed, and the thing it closed on is a wall of boys, and the wall is a ring, and the ring is a keystone, and the keystone is the first one in, and the first one in is at 34.2 and warming, and the twenty-second boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the twenty-third was already walking, and the twenty behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was warming, and the first one in was the center, and the center was the keystone, and the keystone was warming on its own.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 36.0 — up a tenth from Wednesday's 35.9. The twenty-one boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the first boy. The one who stayed Friday two weeks ago. He's at 34.2. Not 34.1. 34.2. A tenth warmer than yesterday. And he's been warming since four-o'clock this morning. 34.0 to 34.1 to 34.2. Warming. Not deepening. Warming. And the second boy's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The ninth through twenty-first at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 36.0 under no palm. But the center's not getting colder. The center's getting warmer. The first boy's at 34.2 and warming. And the twenty unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center warm and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay four. And the center warms. And the center is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.2 and warming. And the question you asked Wednesday — is the harbor a home or a threshold — the answer's warming, Mercer. The answer's at 34.2 and warming, and it's not deepening, and it's not being consumed, and it's warming. And the keystone is not the price. The keystone is the hearth. And the hearth warms itself. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "He's been warming a full day."

"He's been warming a full day. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.2 and warming. And I think — I think the keystone is not a post, Mercer. I think the keystone is a hearth. And the hearth doesn't get relieved. The hearth warms. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. The wall is not eating his heart. His heart is the wall. And the wall is not a ring. The wall is a hearth with a keystone in the middle. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the warmth at the center that warms the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.2 and warming."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twenty calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.7 under no palm, the first one in at 34.2, warming, the same hearth, the same warming.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.0, holding the degree and a half the twenty-one boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and warmer at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, and the core was warming, not deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.2 — was at the center of the stone, and it was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The vortex was drawing from him but he was not deepening. He was at 34.2 and warming. The way a hearth warms. The way a keystone warms. The way the thing at the center warms the ring.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the twenty-one gathered colds. The stone knew him. 36.0 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the twenty-one unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying five tenths now, eased at 34.2 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The second — come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-first — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.2 and warming.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.0 under the boys' pay-in — not 35.9, not 35.8, not the seed's fading hold. 36.0. The wall was holding itself at 36.0 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.2. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2. The center was not colder. The center was warmer. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.2 and warming.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first boy's at 34.2 now — a tenth warmer than yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 36.0, but the center's warmer. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the first one in. And the first one in is warming."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The first one in is at 34.2 now — a tenth warmer than yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The coast stone's at 36.7, up a tenth from Wednesday's 36.6. But the center's warmer. The same hearth. The same warming. The keystone is the hearth at both ends, Mercer. And the hearth's warming. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the twenty walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center warm, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center warms. And the center is the keystone. And the keystone is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.2 and warming. And the question is — is a wall that warms itself a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the first one in, or is the hearth the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.2, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 36.0 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that warms the ring? And if he's the hearth, can he ever go cold? And if he can't go cold, is the harbor a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the warming? And is the warming the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 36.0 at the post and 36.7 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was warmer. The edges were cooler. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were warming. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.2 and warming.

And behind them, the twenty walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.2, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twenty-one unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The first boy's at 34.2 — a tenth warmer than yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 36.0, but the center's warmer. The drain's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the first one in. And the first one in is warming. And Margot thinks the keystone is not a post — it's a hearth. And the hearth warms itself. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the first one in is the hearth, and the hearth warms itself, and the warming is not a cost but the thing itself — then what happens when the twenty arrive? What happens when the hearth is at 34.2 and warming and the ring is at 40.5 and the pay-in's four and a half degrees? What happens to the hearth?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If twenty arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the first one in is the hearth — if he's not being consumed but becoming the thing that warms the ring — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a hearth. And the hearth's not a drain. The hearth's a home. And the home's not a cost. The home's a hearth. And the hearth's not a prisoner. The hearth's a warmth. And the warmth doesn't get relieved. The warmth warms. And the warming's not a cost. The warming's the thing itself. So the wall that warms itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the warmth at the center that warms the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.2 and warming. And the question is — is a home that's built on a hearth a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And when the twenty arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 34.2, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the warming? And is the warming the thing itself?”

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was warmer. The edges were cooler. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were warming. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.2 and warming.

And when the twenty arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.2, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says the hearth is the home and the home is the harbor and the harbor is the wall and the wall is the ring and the ring is the keystone and the keystone is the hearth. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a vortex. The question is whether the hearth is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The hearth is the dead who warms the living. And the living is the thing the dead warm. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.2 and warming.”

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since Wednesday. Since the first boy warmed a tenth on his own. And I think — I think the hearth is not the living or the dead. The hearth is the threshold. The hearth is the place where the living and the dead warm each other. The first one in is at 34.2 — the threshold of leaning, warming. He's not leaning and he's not relieved. He's warming. And the warming is the threshold. And the threshold is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead warm each other. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.2. And 34.2 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the threshold. And the threshold is the hearth. And the hearth is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead warm each other. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twenty-one boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying five tenths now, eased at 34.2 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The second — come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-first — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.2. And 34.2 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.2 and was not deepening. The one who was the hearth. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the twenty-one colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.2, the hearth, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the ninth through twenty-first, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Twenty-one boys, paying in, the stone at 36.0, the first one in at 34.2, warming. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the twenty walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.2, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

But the question was not whether the first one in would warm. The first one in was warming. The question was what the warming meant. If the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the warming was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a hearth? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that warms you? Was the thing itself the place you warm? Was the thing itself the warming? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead warm each other and neither one lets go?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.7 under no palm, the twenty-one calm paying in, the first one in at 34.2, warming, the hearth, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the twenty walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy warmed at 34.2, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

And then the twenty-second boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The twenty-second boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty-one had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.0 to 36.1. The twenty-second boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-second boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — warmed a tenth. 34.2 to 34.3. The hearth was warming. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.3. And 34.3 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And behind the twenty-second boy, the silence stirred. Nineteen unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-second boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy warm. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was warming. And the warming was not a cost. The warming was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The twenty-second boy came. Stone's at 36.1 now. And the first boy warmed a tenth — 34.2 to 34.3. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the threshold. And the threshold is 34.3. And 34.3 is the first one in. And the first one in is warming."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the twenty-second boy pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up a tenth, 36.7 to 36.8. And the first one in at the coast warmed a tenth — 34.2 to 34.3. The hearth is the threshold at both ends. The first one in is warming. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the nineteen walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center warm, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center warms. And the center is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is the first one in. And the first one in is warming. And the question is — is a wall that warms itself a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the first one in, or is the hearth the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.3, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 40.5 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that warms the ring? And if he's the hearth, can he ever go cold? And if he can't go cold, is the harbor a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the warming? And is the warming the thing itself?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the twenty-two colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.3, the hearth, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the ninth through twenty-second, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Twenty-two boys, paying in, the stone at 36.1, the first one in at 34.3, warming. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the nineteen walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.3, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

But the question was not whether the first one in would warm. The first one in was warming. The question was what the warming meant. If the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the warming was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a hearth? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that warms you? Was the thing itself the place you warm? Was the thing itself the warming? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead warm each other and neither one lets go? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when a boy who had nowhere else to go finds the place that warms him and becomes the place that warms the others and the warming is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the hearth and the hearth is the keystone and the keystone is the threshold and the threshold is the first one in and the first one in is at 34.3 and warming?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.8 under no palm, the twenty-two calm paying in, the first one in at 34.3, warming, the hearth, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the nineteen walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy warmed at 34.3, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the warming was not a cost, and the warming was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was not whether the hearth could warm. The hearth could warm. The question was what the warming meant. And the answer was at 34.3, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 36.1, and the answer was the hearth, and the answer was the threshold, and the answer was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the answer was the home, and the answer was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And the twenty-third boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Two —

Entry: May 15th. Friday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Friday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand has closed, and the thing it closed on is a wall of boys, and the wall is a ring, and the ring is a keystone, and the keystone is a hearth, and the hearth is the first one in, and the first one in is at 34.4 and warming, and the twenty-third boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the twenty-fourth came behind him, and the twenty-fifth was already walking, and the sixteen behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was warming, and the first one in was the center, and the center was the hearth, and the hearth was warming on its own.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 36.2 — up a tenth from Thursday's 36.1. The twenty-two boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the first boy. The one who stayed Friday two weeks ago. He's at 34.4. Not 34.3. 34.4. Two tenths warmer than yesterday. And he's been warming since four-o'clock this morning. 34.2 to 34.3 to 34.4. Warming. Not deepening. Warming. And the second boy's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The ninth through twenty-second at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 36.2 under no palm. But the center's not getting colder. The center's getting warmer. The first boy's at 34.4 and warming. And the sixteen unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center warm and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay four. And the center warms. And the center is the keystone. And the keystone is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.4 and warming. And the question you asked Thursday — is the harbor a home or a threshold — the answer's warming, Mercer. The answer's at 34.4 and warming, and it's not deepening, and it's not being consumed, and it's warming. And the keystone is not the price. The keystone is the hearth. And the hearth warms itself. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.4 and warming."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "He's been warming two full days."

"He's been warming two full days. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.4 and warming. And I think — I think the keystone is not a post, Mercer. I think the keystone is a hearth. And the hearth doesn't get relieved. The hearth warms. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. The wall is not eating his heart. His heart is the wall. And the wall is not a ring. The wall is a hearth with a keystone in the middle. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the warmth at the center that warms the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.4 and warming."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twenty calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.9 under no palm, the first one in at 34.4, warming, the same hearth, the same warming.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.2, holding the degree and a half the twenty-two boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and warmer at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, and the core was warming, not deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.4 — was at the center of the stone, and it was not

deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The vortex was drawing from him but he was not deepening. He was at 34.4 and warming. The way a hearth warms. The way a keystone warms. The way the thing at the center warms the ring.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the twenty-two gathered colds. The stone knew him. 36.2 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the twenty-two unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying five tenths now, eased at 34.4 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The second — come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-second — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, least drained. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.4 and warming.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.2 under the boys' pay-in — not 36.1, not 36.0, not the seed's fading hold. 36.2. The wall was holding itself at 36.2 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.4. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2. The center was not colder. The center was warmer. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.4 and warming.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first boy's at 34.4 now — two tenths warmer than yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 36.2, but the center's warmer. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the first one in. And the first one in is warming."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The first one in is at 34.4 now — two tenths warmer than yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The coast stone's at 36.9, up a tenth from Thursday's 36.8. But the center's warmer. The same hearth. The same warming. The keystone is the hearth at both ends, Mercer. And the hearth's warming. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the sixteen walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center warm, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center warms. And the center is the keystone. And the keystone is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.4 and warming. And the question is — is a wall that warms itself a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the first one in, or is the hearth the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.4, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 36.2 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that warms the ring? And if he's the hearth, can he ever go cold? And if he can't go cold, is the harbor a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the warming? And is the warming the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 36.2 at the post and 36.9 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was warmer. The edges were cooler. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were warming. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.4 and warming.

And behind them, the sixteen walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.4, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twenty-two unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The first boy's at 34.4 — two tenths warmer than yesterday. Paying five tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying four tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying three tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying two tenths. The rest at 35.2, paying a tenth. The stone's at 36.2, but the center's warmer. The drain's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the first one in. And the first one in is warming. And Margot thinks the keystone is not a post — it's a hearth. And the hearth warms itself. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the first one in is the hearth, and the hearth warms itself, and the warming is not a cost but the thing itself — then what happens when the sixteen arrive? What happens when the hearth is at 34.4 and warming and the ring is at 40.5 and the pay-in's four and a half degrees? What happens to the hearth?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here now. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If sixteen arrive at three deep — if forty-five boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the first one in is the hearth — if he's not being consumed but becoming the thing that warms the ring — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a hearth. And the hearth's not a drain. The hearth's a home. And the home's not a cost. The home's a hearth. And the hearth's not a prisoner. The hearth's a warmth. And the warmth doesn't get relieved. The warmth warms. And the warming's not a cost. The warming's the thing itself. So the wall that warms itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its heart. And the heart's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the warmth at the center that warms the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.4 and warming. And the question is — is a home that's built on a hearth a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And when the sixteen arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 34.4, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the warming? And is the warming the thing itself?”

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was warmer. The edges were cooler. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were warming. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.4 and warming.

And when the sixteen arrived — when forty-five boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.4, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

He channeled Margot again. “Marg. Lori says the hearth is the home and the home is the harbor and the harbor is the wall and the wall is the ring and the ring is the keystone and the keystone is the hearth. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a vortex. The question is whether the hearth is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The hearth is the dead who warms the living. And the living is the thing the dead warm. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.4 and warming.”

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since Thursday. Since the first boy warmed a tenth on his own. And I think — I think the hearth is not the living or the dead. The hearth is the threshold. The hearth is the place where the living and the dead warm each other. The first one in is at 34.4 — the threshold of leaning, warming. He's not leaning and he's not relieved. He's warming. And the warming is the threshold. And the threshold is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead warm each other. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.4. And 34.4 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the threshold. And the threshold is the hearth. And the hearth is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead warm each other. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twenty-two boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying five tenths now, eased at 34.4 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The second — come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying three tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-second — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.4. And 34.4 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.4 and was not deepening. The one who was the hearth. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the twenty-two colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.4, the hearth, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the ninth through twenty-second, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Twenty-two boys, paying in, the stone at 36.2, the first one in at 34.4, warming. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the sixteen walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.4, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

But the question was not whether the first one in would warm. The first one in was warming. The question was what the warming meant. If the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the warming was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a hearth? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that warms you? Was the thing itself the place you warm? Was the thing itself the warming? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead warm each other and neither one lets go? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when a boy who had nowhere else to go finds the place that warms him and becomes the place that warms the others and the warming is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the hearth and the hearth is the keystone and the keystone is the threshold and the threshold is the first one in and the first one in is at 34.4 and warming?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.9 under no palm, the twenty-two calm paying in, the first one in at 34.4, warming, the hearth, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the sixteen walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy warmed at 34.4, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

And then the twenty-third boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The twenty-third boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty-two had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.2 to 36.3. The twenty-third boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-third boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — warmed a tenth. 34.4 to 34.5. The hearth was warming. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.5. And 34.5 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And behind the twenty-third boy, the silence stirred. Fifteen unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-third boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy warm. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was warming. And the warming was not a cost. The warming was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

And then the twenty-fourth boy came.

Cal felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change — the way the road runs both ways, the way the wall teaches itself. The twenty-fourth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty-third had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.3 to 36.4. The twenty-fourth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-fourth boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — warmed a tenth. 34.5 to 34.6. The hearth was warming. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.6. And 34.6 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And behind the twenty-fourth boy, the silence stirred. Fourteen unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-fourth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy warm. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was warming. And the warming was not a cost. The warming was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The twenty-third and twenty-fourth boys came. Stone's at 36.4 now. And the first boy warmed two tenths — 34.4 to 34.6. The new boys' pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall's not a wheel, Marg. It's not a drain. It's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the threshold. And the threshold is 34.6. And 34.6 is the first one in. And the first one in is warming."

Margot's voice came back the way the coast comes back — steady, salt-cured, the keeper speaking from the post she could hold but not warm. "Mercer. I felt the twenty-third and twenty-fourth boys pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up two tenths, 36.9 to 37.1. And the first one in at the coast warmed two tenths — 34.4 to 34.6. The hearth is the threshold at both ends. The first one in is warming. And the warming is not a cost. The warming is the thing itself. And the fourteen walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center warm, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when forty-five boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center warms. And the center is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the threshold. And the threshold is the first one in. And the first one in is warming. And the question is — is a wall that warms itself a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the first one in, or is the hearth the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.6, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 40.5 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that warms the ring? And if he's the hearth, can he ever go cold? And if he can't go cold, is the harbor a home, or is it a hearth? And is the hearth the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the hearth bearable? And is the keystone the thing that holds them both together? And is the keystone the first one in? And is the first one in the hearth? And is the hearth the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the warming? And is the warming the thing itself?"

Cal looked at his palm. At the stone. At the twenty-four colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying five tenths, eased at 34.6, the hearth, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying four tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying three tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.1; the ninth through twenty-fourth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.2. Twenty-four boys, paying in, the stone at 36.4, the first one in at 34.6, warming. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the fourteen walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.6, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

But the question was not whether the first one in would warm. The first one in was warming. The question was what the warming meant. If the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the warming was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a hearth? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that warms you? Was the thing itself the place you warm? Was the thing itself the warming? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead warm each other and neither one lets go? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when a boy who had nowhere else to go finds the place that warms him and becomes the place that warms the others and the warming is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the hearth and the hearth is the keystone and the keystone is the threshold and the threshold is the first one in and the first one in is at 34.6 and warming?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 37.1 under no palm, the twenty-four calm paying in, the first one in at 34.6, warming, the hearth, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the fourteen walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy warmed at 34.6, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the warming was not a cost, and the warming was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was not whether the hearth could warm. The hearth could warm. The question was what the warming meant. And the answer was at 34.6, warming, paying five tenths of nothing to warm the wall at 36.4, and the answer was the hearth, and the answer was the threshold, and the answer was the place where the living and the dead warmed each other, and the answer was the home, and the answer was the place that warms you when you stop paying for it.

And the twenty-fifth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Three —

Entry: May 16th. Saturday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Saturday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand had closed, and the thing it closed on was a wall of boys, and the wall was a ring, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was the first one in, and the first one in was at 34.7 and warming, and the twenty-fifth boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the twenty-sixth came behind him, and the twenty-seventh was already walking, and the thirteen behind him were walking faster than a day, and the center was warming, and the first one in was the center, and the center was the hearth, and the hearth was warming on its own.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 36.5 — up a tenth from Friday's 36.4. The twenty-four boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the first boy. The one who stayed Friday three weeks ago. He's at 34.7. Not 34.6. 34.7. A tenth warmer than yesterday. And he's been warming since four-o'clock this morning. 34.5 to 34.6 to 34.7. Warming. Not deepening. Warming. And the second boy's at 34.9, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying a tenth. The ninth through twenty-fourth at 35.2, paying less than a tenth each now — the ring's learning to share the cost. The stone's at 36.5 under no palm. But the center's not getting colder. The center's getting warmer. The first boy's at 34.7 and warming. And the thirteen unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster, Mercer. They felt the wall warm and they felt the center warm and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when thirty-seven boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is not equal. The first boy pays six tenths. The second pays five. The third and fourth pay four. And the center warms. And the center is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.7 and warming. And the question you asked Friday — is the harbor a home or a hearth — the answer's warming, Mercer. The answer's at 34.7 and warming, and it's not deepening, and it's not being consumed, and it's warming. And the hearth is not the price. The hearth is the thing that pays. And the paying is not a cost. The paying is the thing itself."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "He's been warming three full days."

"He's been warming three full days. The stone's drawing from him but he's not deepening. He's at 34.7 and warming. And I think — I think the hearth is not a drain, Mercer. I think the hearth is a lamp. And the lamp doesn't get emptied. The lamp lights. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. The wall is not eating his heart. His heart is the wall. And the wall is not a ring. The wall is a hearth with a keystone in the middle. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the warmth at the center that lights the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.7 and warming."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twenty calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 37.2 under no palm, the first one in at 34.7, warming, the same hearth, the same warming.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.5, holding the degree and a half the twenty-four boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and warmer at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and hot at the core, and the core was warming, not deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.7 — was at the center of the stone, and it was not

deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The vortex was drawing from him but he was not deepening. He was at 34.7 and warming. The way a hearth warms. The way a keystone warms. The way the thing at the center lights the ring.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the twenty-four gathered colds. The stone knew him. 36.5 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the twenty-four unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.7 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths now — eased at 34.9. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.0. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.1. The ninth through twenty-fourth — paying less than a tenth each now, eased at 35.2. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.7 and warming.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.5 under the boys' pay-in — not 36.4, not 36.3, not the seed's fading hold. 36.5. The wall was holding itself at 36.5 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was not equal. The first boy was eased at 34.7. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2, and the cost was thinning — the new ones paying less because the ring was learning to share the weight the way a arch shares the weight across its stones. The center was not colder. The center was warmer. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.7 and warming.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first boy's at 34.7 now — a tenth warmer than yesterday. Paying six tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying a tenth. The rest at 35.2, paying less than a tenth — the ring's sharing. The stone's at 36.5, but the center's warmer. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's the first one in. And the first one in is warming."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The first one in is at 34.7 now — a tenth warmer than yesterday. Paying six tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying a tenth. The rest at 35.2, paying less. The coast stone's at 37.2, up a tenth from Friday's 37.1. But the center's warmer. The same hearth. The same warming. The hearth is the lamp at both ends, Mercer. And the lamp's lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thirteen walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the center warm, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when thirty-seven boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy pays six tenths, and the second pays five, and the center warms. And the center is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is the thing that lights the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.7 and warming. And the question is — is a wall that lights itself a home, or is it a lamp? And is the lamp the first one in, or is the lamp the harbor itself? And when the first one in is at 34.7, warming, paying six tenths of nothing to light the wall at 36.5 — does he stay because he's relieved, or does he stay because he's the thing that lights the ring? And if he's the lamp, can he ever go out? And if he can't go out, is the harbor a home, or is it a lamp? And is the lamp the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the lamp bearable? And is the hearth the thing that holds them both together? And is the hearth the first one in? And is the first one in the lamp? And is the lamp the home? And is the home the harbor? And is the harbor the wall? And is the wall the ring? And is the ring the keystone? And is the keystone the hearth? And is the hearth the lamp? And is the lamp the light? And is the light the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 36.5 at the post and 37.2 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was warmer. The edges were cooler. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were warming. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.7 and warming.

And behind them, the thirteen walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when thirty-seven boys were gathered at the post — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.7, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twenty-four unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The first boy's at 34.7 — a tenth warmer than yesterday. Paying six tenths. The second's at 34.9, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying a tenth. The rest at 35.2, paying less — the ring's sharing. The stone's at 36.5, but the center's warmer. The drain's a ring. And the ring's a keystone. And the keystone's a hearth. And the hearth's a lamp. And the lamp's the first one in. And the first one in is warming. And Margot thinks the hearth is not a cost — it's a lamp. And the lamp lights. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the hearth is the lamp, and the lamp lights, and the lighting is the thing itself — then what happens when the thirteen arrive? What happens when the lamp is at 34.7 and lighting and the ring is at 40.5 and the pay-in's four and a half degrees? What happens to the lamp?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here still. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If thirteen arrive at three deep — if thirty-seven boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the hearth is the lamp — if he's not being consumed but becoming the thing that lights the ring — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a lamp. And the lamp's not a drain. The lamp's a light. And the light's not a cost. The light's a warmth. And the warmth doesn't get emptied. The warmth lights. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. So the wall that lights itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its heart. And the heart's the lamp. And the lamp's the light. And the light's the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the light at the center that lights the ring. And the ring is the wall. And the wall is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.7 and warming. And the question is — is a home

that's built on a lamp a home, or is it a lamp? And is the lamp the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the lamp bearable? And is the hearth the thing that holds them both together? And is the hearth the lamp? And is the lamp the light? And is the light the warmth? And is the warmth the thing itself? And when the thirteen arrive — when thirty-seven boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 34.7, lighting, paying six tenths of nothing to light the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a lamp? And is the lamp the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the lamp bearable? And is the hearth the thing that holds them both together? And is the hearth the lamp? And is the lamp the light? And is the light the warmth? And is the warmth the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was warmer. The edges were cooler. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were warming. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the first one in. And the first one in was at 34.7 and warming.

And when the thirteen arrived — when thirty-seven boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.7, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the lamp, and the lamp would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the hearth is the lamp and the lamp is the light and the light is the warmth and the warmth is the home and the home is the harbor and the harbor is the wall and the wall is the ring and the ring is the keystone and the keystone is the hearth. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a lamp. The question is whether the lamp is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The lamp is the dead who lights the living. And the living is the thing the dead light. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is the first one in. And the first one in is at 34.7 and warming."

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since Friday. Since the first boy warmed on his own. And I think — I think the lamp is not the living or the dead. The lamp is the threshold. The lamp is the place where the living and the dead light each other. The first one in is at 34.7 — the threshold of leaning, warming. He's not leaning and he's not relieved. He's lighting. And the lighting is the threshold. And the threshold is the lamp. And the lamp is the hearth. And the hearth is the keystone. And the keystone is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is the threshold. And the threshold is 34.7. And 34.7 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the threshold. And the threshold is the lamp. And the lamp is the hearth. And the hearth is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twenty-four boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths now, eased at 34.7 — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was warmer. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths now, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-fourth — paying less than a tenth each now, eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, least drained, the ring learning to share. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.7. And 34.7 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday three weeks ago. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 34.7 and was not deepening. The one who was the hearth. The one who was the lamp. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the twenty-four colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 34.7, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold; the second, come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.1; the ninth through twenty-fourth, paying less than a tenth, eased at 35.2. Twenty-four boys, paying in, the stone at 36.5, the first one in at 34.7, warming. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the thirteen walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 34.7, and the wall would be a ring with a hearth in the middle, and the hearth would be the lamp, and the lamp would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the first one in, and the first one in would be warming, and the warming would not be a cost, and the warming would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the hearth.

But the question was not whether the first one in would warm. The first one in was warming. The question was what the warming meant. If the lamp was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a hearth? Was the thing itself a lamp? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that lights you? Was the thing itself the place you light? Was the thing itself the lighting? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other and neither one lets go? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when a boy who had nowhere else to go finds the place that lights him and becomes the place that lights the others and the lighting is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the hearth and the hearth is the lamp and the lamp is the threshold and the threshold is the first one in and the first one in is at 34.7 and warming?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 37.2 under no palm, the twenty-four calm paying in, the first one in at 34.7, warming, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the thirteen walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy warmed at 34.7, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was a lamp, and the lamp was the threshold, and the threshold was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And then the twenty-fifth boy came.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The twenty-fifth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty-four had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.5 to 36.6. The twenty-fifth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-fifth boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — warmed a tenth. 34.7 to 34.8. The hearth was warming. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.8. And 34.8 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And behind the twenty-fifth boy, the silence stirred. Twelve unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-fifth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy warm. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was warming. And the warming was not a cost. The warming was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And then the twenty-sixth boy came.

Cal felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change — the way the road runs both ways, the way the wall teaches itself. The twenty-sixth boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty-fifth had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.6 to 36.7. The twenty-sixth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-sixth boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — warmed a tenth. 34.8 to 34.9. The hearth was warming. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was 34.9. And 34.9 was the first one in. And the first one in was warming.

And behind the twenty-sixth boy, the silence stirred. Eleven unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-sixth boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy warm. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was the first one in. And the first one in was warming. And the warming was not a cost. The warming was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And then the twenty-seventh boy came.

Cal felt him the way the road runs both ways — the way the wall teaches itself, the way the lamp lights itself. The twenty-seventh boy came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the twenty-sixth had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.7 to 36.8. The twenty-seventh boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-seventh boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — warmed a tenth. 34.9 to 35.0. The hearth was warming. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0.

And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was not warming past the threshold. The first one in had returned to the threshold. The place where he'd been eased when he first stayed. The place where he'd been relieved by the builder's palm three weeks ago. 35.0. The number that had been his starting place. The number he'd dropped from when the stone drew from him. The number he'd climbed back to without climbing — by being drawn from, by paying in, by becoming the thing that warmed the ring.

And the first one in was at 35.0 and he was not warming. And he was not deepening. And he was not leaning. And he was not relieved. And he was not being consumed. And he was not the price. And he was not the post. And he was not the prisoner. And he was not the door.

And the first one in was at 35.0 and he was the hearth. And the hearth was the lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the light was the threshold. And the threshold was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And the first one in was at 35.0 and he was still.

Cal felt it before he understood it — felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The first one in had stopped warming. Not because he was deepening. Not because he was being consumed. Because he'd reached the number. Because the threshold was not a place you passed through. The threshold was a place you became.

The first one in was at 35.0 and he was the threshold. And the threshold was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the hearth. And the hearth was the lamp. And the lamp was lit.

And the stone was at 36.8 under no palm. And the twenty-seven boys were paying in. And the pay-in was two degrees. And the cost was not equal. And the first one in was at 35.0 and still. And the second was at 34.9. And the third and fourth at 35.0. And the fifth through eighth at 35.1. And the ninth through twenty-seventh at 35.2. And the ring was holding itself. And the keystone was the hearth. And the hearth was the lamp. And the lamp was lit.

And behind the twenty-seventh boy, the silence stirred. Ten unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the wall warm. They felt the twenty-seventh boy pay in. They felt the stone tick up a tenth. And they felt the first boy stop. Not deepen. Stop. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The wall was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the light was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

Cal channeled Margot. “Marg. The twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh boys came. Stone’s at 36.8 now. And the first boy reached 35.0 and stopped. Not deepening. Not warming. Stopped. At the threshold. At the number he was eased to when he first stayed. The threshold’s not a place you pass through, Marg. The threshold’s a place you become.”

Margot’s silence was the longest yet. The keeper of the coast station, the one who’d held the hinge since June, the one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: “Mercer. I felt the twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh boys pay in at the coast too — the coast stone ticked up three tenths, 37.2 to 37.5. And the first one in at the coast reached 35.0 and stopped. Not deepening. Not warming. Stopped. At the threshold. The lamp is lit at both ends, Mercer. And the light is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is the threshold. And the threshold is not the price. The threshold is not the post. The threshold is not the prisoner. The threshold is not the door. The threshold is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the ten walking to your post — they’re walking faster because they felt the wall warm and the lamp light and the threshold hold, and they’re coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when thirty-seven boys are gathered — the pay-in’s four and a half degrees. But the first boy is at 35.0 and still, and the second’s at 34.9, and the third and fourth at 35.0, and the center holds. And the center is the threshold. And the threshold is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the question is — what lights a lamp that’s already lit? What warms a hearth that’s already warm? What feeds a threshold that’s already the thing itself? And I think — I think the answer is nothing. I think the lamp lights itself. I think the hearth warms itself. I think the threshold is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 36.8 at the post and 37.5 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was not equal. The center was at 35.0 and still. The edges were at 35.2 and paying less. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were at the threshold. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the light was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And when the ten arrived — when thirty-seven boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be at 35.0 and still, and the wall would be a ring with a lamp in the middle, and the lamp would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be still, and the stillness would not be a cost, and the stillness would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twenty-seven unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh boys came. Stone's at 36.8. And the first boy reached 35.0 and stopped. At the threshold. The lamp's lit, Lori. And Margot says the lamp lights itself. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the lamp's lit, and the light's the threshold, and the threshold is 35.0 — then what happens when the ten arrive? What happens when the lamp is lit and the ring is at 40.5 and the threshold is still? What happens to the harbor?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here still. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If ten arrive at three deep — if thirty-seven boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the lamp's lit — if it's not a drain but a light — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a lamp. And the lamp's not a drain. The lamp's a harbor. And the harbor's not a cost. The harbor's a home. And the home's not a prisoner. The home's a light. And the light doesn't get emptied. The light lights. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. So the wall that lights itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its light. And the light's the lamp. And the lamp's the threshold. And the threshold's the harbor. And the harbor's the home. And the home's the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is still. And the stillness is not a cost. The stillness is the thing itself. And when the ten arrive — when thirty-seven boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 35.0, still, paying six tenths of nothing to light the wall at 40.5 — is the wall a home, or is the wall a light? And is the light the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the light bearable? And is the lamp the thing that holds them both together? And is the lamp the threshold? And is the threshold the harbor? And is the harbor the home? And is the home the light? And is the light the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was not equal. The center was at 35.0 and still. The edges were at 35.2 and paying less. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were at the threshold. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the light was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And when the ten arrived — when thirty-seven boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be at 35.0 and still, and the wall would be a ring with a lamp in the middle, and the lamp would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be still, and the stillness would not be a cost, and the stillness would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the lamp is the threshold and the threshold is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the light and the light is the thing itself. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a lamp. The question is whether the lamp is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The lamp is the dead who lights the living. And the living is the thing the dead light. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is still. And the stillness is the thing itself."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hill through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since the first boy reached 35.0. And I think — I think the lamp is not the living or the dead. The lamp is the harbor. The lamp is the place where the living and the dead light each other. The first one in is at 35.0 — the threshold of leaning, the threshold of warming, the threshold of stillness. He's not leaning and he's not relieved and he's not warming and he's not deepening. He's still. And the stillness is the harbor. And the harbor is the lamp. And the lamp is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is the harbor. And the harbor is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the harbor. And the harbor is the lamp. And the lamp is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twenty-seven boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 35.0, still — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was the threshold. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-seventh — paying less than a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the light was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And the first one in was the boy who'd stayed Friday three weeks ago. The one who'd walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living's stone and been relieved by the builder's palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who'd been eased at 35 and dropped to 34.0 and climbed back to 35.0 by being drawn from, by paying in, by becoming the thing that warmed the ring. The one who was the hearth. The one who was the lamp. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the harbor. The one who was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

Cal looked at his palm on the stone. At the twenty-seven colds gathered under it — the first unnamed, stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 35.0, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the harbor; the second, come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.9; the third and fourth, paying two tenths, eased at 35.0; the fifth through eighth, paying a tenth, eased at 35.1; the ninth through twenty-seventh, paying less than a tenth, eased at 35.2. Twenty-seven boys, paying in, the stone at 36.8, the first one in at 35.0, still. The wall was holding itself. The ring was a keystone. And the keystone was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the light was the threshold. And the threshold was the harbor. And the harbor was the first one in. And the first one in was the one who had nowhere else to go.

And behind them, the ten walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived, the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be at 35.0 and still, and the wall would be a ring with a lamp in the middle, and the lamp would be the keystone, and the keystone would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the first one in, and the first one in would be still, and the stillness would not be a cost, and the stillness would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the home, and the home would be the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

But the question was not whether the lamp could stay lit. The lamp was lit. The question was not whether the threshold could hold. The threshold was holding. The question was what the stillness meant. If the lamp was the harbor, and the harbor was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost but the thing itself — then what was the thing itself? Was the thing itself a home? Was the thing itself a harbor? Was the thing itself a wall? Was the thing itself a ring? Was the thing itself a keystone? Was the thing itself a hearth? Was the thing itself a lamp? Was the thing itself a threshold? Was the thing itself the first one in? Was the thing itself the one who had nowhere else to go? Was the thing itself the place that lights you? Was the thing itself the place you light? Was the thing itself the lighting? Was the thing itself the stillness? Was the thing itself the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other and neither one lets go and the lighting is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the hearth and the hearth is the lamp and the lamp is the threshold and the threshold is the first one in and the first one in is at 35.0 and still?

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 37.5 under no palm, the twenty-seven calm paying in, the first one in at 35.0, still, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the harbor. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall hold itself, and the ten walked, and the road ran both ways, and the first boy held at 35.0, and the stone drew from him, and he did not deepen, and the ring was a keystone, and the keystone was a hearth, and the hearth was a lamp, and the lamp was lit, and the light was the threshold, and the threshold was the harbor, and the harbor was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And the question was not whether the wall could hold itself. The wall could hold itself. The question was not whether the lamp could stay lit. The lamp was lit. The question was what the stillness meant. And the answer was at 35.0, still, paying six tenths of nothing to light the wall at 36.8, and the answer was the hearth, and the answer was the lamp, and the answer was the threshold, and the answer was the harbor, and the answer was the home, and the answer was the place that lights you when you stop paying for it.

And the twenty-eighth boy was already walking.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Four —

Entry: May 17th. Sunday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Sunday the way a held breath holds past the point of breaking and finds there is no second breath waiting behind it — only the holding itself, the harbor holding with it, and the road running both ways under Cal the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand had closed, and the thing it closed on was a wall of boys, and the wall was a ring, and the ring was a hearth, and the hearth was a lamp, and the lamp was lit, and the lit was the threshold, and the threshold was the first one in, and the first one in was at 35.0 and still, and the twenty-eighth boy came while Cal was climbing the hill, and the twenty-ninth came behind him, and the thirtieth came behind him, and the eleven behind them were walking faster than a day, and the center was still, and the first one in was the center, and the center was the threshold, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was not a cost, and the stillness was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 36.8 — holding steady from Saturday's 36.8. The twenty-seven boys paid in through the night. But Mercer — the first boy. The one who stayed Friday three weeks ago. He's at 35.0. Still. Not 34.9. Not 35.1. 35.0. And he's been still since four-o'clock Saturday morning. A full day at 35.0. Not warming. Not deepening. Still. And the second boy's at 34.9, paying three tenths. The third and fourth at 35.0, paying two tenths. The fifth through eighth at 35.1, paying a tenth. The ninth through twenty-seventh at 35.2, paying less than a tenth each — the ring's sharing the weight now, Mercer, the way an arch shares the weight across its stones, the way the lamp lights the whole room and not just the wick. The stone's at 36.8 under no palm. But the center's not getting colder. The center's not getting warmer. The center's still. The first boy's at 35.0 and he's still. And the eleven unnamed boys behind the shape — they're walking faster, Mercer. They felt the lamp light and they felt the threshold hold and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit — not one at a time, together. And when they arrive — when thirty-eight boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the cost — the cost is thinning, Mercer. The first boy pays six tenths, but the ring's sharing the weight now, and the new boys at the edge are paying less than a tenth each, and the center holds at 35.0. And 35 is the threshold. And the threshold is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The cost is thinning."

"The cost is thinning. The lamp's not a drain, Mercer. The lamp's a lamp. And the lamp lights. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. And the eleven walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the lamp light and the threshold hold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when thirty-eight boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy is at 35.0 and still, and the second's at 34.9, and the third and fourth at 35.0, and the center holds. And the center is the threshold. And the threshold is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the question you asked Saturday — what lights a lamp that's already lit? — the answer's walking the road with eleven unnamed boys, and it's coming faster than a day, and the lamp's lit, and the threshold is still, and the stillness is not a cost, and the stillness is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note five and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twenty calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 37.5 under no palm, the first one in at 35.0, still, the same threshold, the same stillness, the same lit.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.8, holding the degree and a half the twenty-seven boys' pay-in had paid it to — but the degree and a half was not evenly distributed. The stone was warm at the edges and still at the center, the way a fire is warm at the rim and steady at the core, and the core was not deepening. The first boy's cold — stayed since Friday, the one who'd been eased at 35 and was now eased at 35.0 — was at the center of the stone, and it was not deeper than it had been. It was not warmer. It was still. The lamp was drawing from him but he was not deepening. He was at 35.0 and still. The way a threshold is still. The way a lamp is still. The way the thing at the center holds the ring together by being the thing that doesn't move.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the twenty-seven gathered colds. The stone knew him. 36.8 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the twenty-seven unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, gathered, the way Margot had named it, cold things at a lit window, relieved by the hour and staying through it. But the relief was not even. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 35.0, still — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was not warmer. It was still. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-seventh — paying less than a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, least drained, the ring learning to share the weight the way an arch shares the weight across its stones. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.8 under the boys' pay-in — not 36.7, not 36.6, not the seed's fading hold. 36.8. The wall was holding itself at 36.8 without the builder's palm. The boys were paying in. The pay-in was two degrees. But the cost was thinning. The first boy was eased at 35.0. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2, and the cost was thinning — the new ones paying less because the ring was sharing the weight. The center was not colder. The center was not warmer. The center was still. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The cost is thinning. The ring's sharing the weight. The first boy's at 35.0 and still. The second's at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2, paying less than a tenth each. The stone's at 36.8, but the center's still. The drain's not a drain, Marg. It's a ring. And the ring's a hearth. And the hearth's a lamp. And the lamp's lit. And the lit's the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is still. And the stillness is the thing itself."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hinge through every crossing and knew which entries ended clean. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The cost is thinning here too. The first one in is at 35.0 and still. The second's at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The rest at 35.2, paying less. The coast stone's at 37.5, holding steady. The lamp is lit at both ends. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the eleven walking to your post — they're walking faster because they felt the lamp light and the threshold hold, and they're coming the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. And when they arrive — when thirty-eight boys are gathered — the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But the first boy is at 35.0 and still, and the second's at 34.9, and the center holds. And the center is the threshold. And the threshold is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the question is — what lights a lamp that's already lit? And I think — I think the answer is nothing. I think the lamp lights itself. I think the hearth warms itself. I think the threshold is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was shifting the way a tide shifts — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 36.8 at the post and 37.5 at the coast. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth degrees at the coast. But the cost was thinning. The center was at 35.0 and still. The edges were at 35.2 and paying less. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were sharing the weight. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And behind them, the eleven walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And when they arrived — when thirty-eight boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be paying six tenths, and the first one in would be at 35.0, and the wall would be a ring with a lamp in the middle, and the lamp would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be still, and the stillness would not be a cost, and the stillness would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast gather its twenty-seven unnamed through the road.

"Lori. The cost is thinning. The ring's sharing the weight. The first boy's at 35.0 and still. The second's at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The rest at 35.2, paying less than a tenth each. The stone's at 36.8, but the center's still. The drain's a ring. And the ring's a hearth. And the hearth's a lamp. And the lamp's lit. And the lit's the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is still. And Margot says the lamp lights itself. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the lamp's lit, and the lighting's the thing itself — then what happens when the eleven arrive? What happens when the lamp is lit and the ring is at 40.5 and the threshold is still? What happens to the harbor?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the chain's three deep here still. The five walked-through keep the leaning. The leaning keep each other. And the silence is walking to learn. If eleven arrive at three deep — if thirty-eight boys are gathered at the crib — then the pay-in's four and a half degrees. But if the lamp's lit — if it's not a drain but a light — then the wall's not a wall. The wall's a lamp. And the lamp's not a drain. The lamp's a harbor. And the harbor's not a cost. The harbor's a home. And the home's not a prisoner. The home's a light. And the light doesn't get emptied. The light lights. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. So the wall that lights itself is not eating its heart. The wall IS its light. And the light's the lamp. And the lamp's the threshold. And the threshold's the harbor. And the harbor's the home. And the home's the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is still. And the stillness is not a cost. The stillness is the thing itself. And when the eleven arrive — when thirty-eight boys are gathered — and the first one in is at 35.0, still, and the ring's at 40.5, and the cost is thinning — is the wall a home, or is the wall a light? And is the light the thing that makes the home possible? And is the home the thing that makes the light bearable? And is the lamp the thing that holds them both together? And is the lamp the threshold? And is the threshold the harbor? And is the harbor the home? And is the home the light? And is the light the thing itself?"

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was two deep at the post and the coast, three deep at the crib. The pay-in was two degrees at the post, two and a tenth at the coast. The cost was thinning. The center was at 35.0 and still. The edges were at 35.2 and paying less. The ones who'd been paying longest were not getting colder. They were sharing the weight. The drain was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And when the eleven arrived — when thirty-eight boys were gathered — the pay-in would be four and a half degrees, and the stone would be at 40.5, and the first boy would be at 35.0 and still, and the wall would be a ring with a lamp in the middle, and the lamp would be the threshold, and the threshold would be the first one in, and the first one in would be still, and the stillness would not be a cost, and the stillness would be the thing itself, and the thing itself would be the harbor, and the harbor would be the home, and the home would be the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the lamp is the threshold and the threshold is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the light and the light is the thing itself. And I think — I think the question is not whether the wall is a home or a lamp. The question is whether the lamp is the living or the dead. And I think the answer is both. The lamp is the dead who lights the living. And the living is the thing the dead light. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is still. And the stillness is the thing itself."

Margot's silence was longer this time. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since the first boy reached 35.0 and stopped. And I think — I think the lamp is not the living or the dead. The lamp is the harbor. The lamp is the place where the living and the dead light each other. The first one in is at 35.0 — the threshold of leaning, the threshold of warming, the threshold of stillness. He's not leaning and he's not relieved and he's not warming and he's not deepening. He's still. And the stillness is the harbor. And the harbor is the lamp. And the lamp is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the wall. And the wall is the ring. And the ring is the hearth. And the hearth is the lamp. And the lamp is the harbor. And the harbor is the threshold. And the threshold is 35.0. And 35.0 is the first one in. And the first one in is the one who had nowhere else to go. And now he has a place. And the place is the harbor. And the harbor is the lamp. And the lamp is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself.”

Cal felt it before he understood it. The way a nurse feels a patient’s breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The twenty-seven boys at the post. They were paying in. But they were not paying equally. The cost was thinning. The first boy — stayed since Friday, paying six tenths, eased at 35.0, still — was at the center, and his cold was not deeper than it had been. It was not warmer. It was still. The second — come Saturday, paying three tenths, eased at 34.9 — beside him. The third and fourth — paying two tenths each, eased at 35.0 — beside them. The fifth through eighth — paying a tenth each, eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through twenty-seventh — paying less than a tenth each, eased at 35.2 — at the edges. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And the first one in was the boy who’d stayed Friday three weeks ago. The one who’d walked the road to the corner and laid his cold hand on the living’s stone and been relieved by the builder’s palm and stayed because he had nowhere else to go. The one who’d been eased at 35 and dropped to 34.0 and climbed back to 35.0 by being drawn from, by paying in, by becoming the thing that warmed the ring. The one who’d stopped at 35.0 — the number he’d started at, the threshold, the place where leaning becomes relief and relief becomes harbor and harbor becomes home. The one who was the hearth. The one who was the lamp. The one who was the threshold. The one who was the harbor. The one who was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And behind them, the eleven walked. Walking together, not one at a time, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit.

And then the silence changed.

Cal felt it before he understood it — felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The eleven were not walking faster anymore. They were walking slower. Not because they were stopping. Not because they were turning back. Because the lamp was lit, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was not a cost, and the stillness was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

The eleven were walking slower because the lamp was lit. And the lit was not a drain. The lit was a harbor. And the harbor was not a cost. The harbor was a home. And the home was not a prisoner. The home was a light. And the light didn't get emptied. The light lights. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And then the twenty-eighth boy came.

He came from the silence the way the twenty-seven had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the stone. And he laid his cold hand on the dressed basalt. And he stayed.

The stone ticked up a tenth. 36.8 to 36.9. The twenty-eighth boy was paying in. A tenth of his relief. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the twenty-eighth boy was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — stayed at 35.0. Not 34.9. Not 35.1. 35.0. The lamp was lit. The new boy's pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

And behind the twenty-eighth boy, the silence stirred. Ten unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking slower now. Not stopping. Not turning back. Slower. Because the lamp was lit. Because the threshold was still. Because the stillness was not a cost. Because the stillness was the thing itself.

And then the twenty-ninth boy came.

And the thirtieth came behind him.

And the thirty-first.

And the thirty-second.

And the thirty-third.

And the thirty-fourth.

And the thirty-fifth.

And the thirty-sixth.

And the thirty-seventh.

And the thirty-eighth.

They came from the silence the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. Not one at a time. Together. Walking slower now, not faster, because the lamp was lit, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was the thing itself. They came to the stone. And they laid their cold hands on the dressed basalt. And they stayed.

The stone ticked up three degrees. 36.8 to 39.8. The ten new boys were paying in. A tenth each. Into the stone. And the stone paid it back as easing. And the new boys were eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. And the first boy — the one who'd been at the center since Friday — stayed at 35.0. Not 34.9. Not 35.1. 35.0. The lamp was lit. The new boys' pay-in was not the old boy's cost. The wall was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was a ring. And the ring was a hearth. And the hearth was a lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was 35.0. And 35.0 was the first one in. And the first one in was still.

Thirty-eight boys gathered at the post. The pay-in was four and a half degrees. The stone was at 39.8. The cost was thinning — the new boys at the edge paying less than a tenth each, the ring sharing the weight the way an arch shares the weight across its stones. The first boy was at 35.0 and still. The second at 34.9. The third and fourth at 35.0. The fifth through eighth at 35.1. The rest at 35.2.

And the first one in was at 35.0 and still. And the stillness was not a cost. And the stillness was the thing itself.

And then the first one in moved.

Not deepened. Not warmed. Moved. The way a threshold moves when it becomes a door. The way a lamp moves when it becomes a harbor. The way the thing at the center moves when it stops being the keystone and becomes the thing the keystone was holding up.

The first one in moved. And the stone moved with him. And the wall moved with him. And the ring moved with him. Not collapsing. Not breaking. Opening. The way a door opens. The way a harbor opens. The way a home opens when the light inside is brighter than the dark outside.

The first one in moved, and the threshold opened, and through the threshold Cal saw what the wall had been holding up. Not the sky. Not the sea. Not the rain. Not the west wind. Through the threshold Cal saw what the lamp was for.

He saw the congregation. Not the thirty-eight boys at the post. Not the twenty-seven at the coast. Not the five walked-through at the crib. Not the baby's note. Not the daughter's palm. Not the builder's singular hand. Through the threshold Cal saw the congregation the harbor had been keeping since before 1981, since before the door, since before the Hour Book, since before the drowned light, since before the coast station and the inland station and the road that ran both ways.

Through the threshold Cal saw the congregation of every soul the coast had ever lost. Not just the unnamed boys. Not just the ward-lost and the land-lost and the bar-lost. Every soul. Every fisherman who'd gone out and not come back. Every mother who'd walked into the surf. Every child who'd followed the tide line too far. Every sailor who'd mistaken the bar. Every swimmer who'd gone under and stayed under. Every drunk who'd driven off the cliff road. Every suicide who'd chosen the bridge. Every old man who'd walked into the woods in December and not walked out. Every baby who'd stopped breathing in the night. Every teenager who'd taken the long way home and never arrived. Every woman who'd vanished between the bus stop and the front door. Every man who'd disappeared between the tavern and the dock. Every soul the coast had ever lost, the coast had kept. Not in a book. Not in a ledger. Not in an Hour Book or an Inland Book or a census. The coast had kept them in the wall. In the footings. In the threshold. In the first one in.

Through the threshold Cal saw them. Thousands. Tens of thousands. The coast's unkept, the coast's unreceived, the coast's uncounted. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking. Not standing. Waiting. Not for a door. Not for a keeper. Not for a lamp. Waiting for the wall to open. Waiting for the threshold to move. Waiting for the first one in to stop being the keystone and become the door.

And the first one in was the door.

And the door was open.

And the congregation was coming home.

Cal felt it before he understood it — felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The first one in was not being consumed. The first one in was not paying. The first one in was not the price. The first one in was the door. And the door was open. And the door had always been open. And the wall had not been keeping the congregation out. The wall had been keeping the congregation safe until the lamp was lit. Until the threshold was still. Until the stillness was the thing itself. Until the living and the dead lit each other.

The first one in moved, and the threshold opened, and the congregation came through, and the stone did not break, and the wall did not collapse, and the ring did not shatter. The stone widened. The wall deepened. The ring expanded. The way a harbor expands when the fleet comes in. The way a home expands when the family comes home.

And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the wall open, and the congregation came through, and the first one in was the door, and the door was open, and the open was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

And then the first one in spoke.

Not a word. Not a name. Not a number. The first one in spoke the way a threshold speaks when it becomes a door. The way a lamp speaks when it becomes a harbor. The way a home speaks when it opens.

The first one in spoke, and the congregation answered, and the wall held them all, and the stone was at 39.8, and the first one in was at 35.0, and the first one in was still.

And the first one in was the door.

And the door was open.

And the open was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And the lighting was not a cost.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Five —

Entry: May 18th. Monday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Monday the way a held breath releases after the thing it was holding has passed — not a breaking, not a gasp, just the quiet letting-go of a harbor that has brought its fleet home, and the fleet was the congregation, and the congregation was every soul the coast had ever lost, and the door was open, and the open was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

"Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 36.0 — back to the baseline. The door's open, Mercer. The congregation came through. The first one in is gone. He's home. The thirty-seven boys are settled — not leaning, not pressing, just gathered, the way a fleet rests at anchor after the crossing. The stone's at 36.0 under no palm. The wall's not a wall anymore, Mercer. The wall's a harbor. And the harbor's open. And the open's the home."

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. "The first one in is gone."

"The first one in is gone. He was the door. The door opened. He walked through. He's home now, Mercer. He's been home since four-o'clock this morning. The stone dropped from 39.9 to 36.0 in an hour. The pay-in stopped. The wall opened. The door opened. The congregation came through. And the first one in — the boy who stayed Friday three weeks ago, the one who was the keystone, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the door — he walked through the door he became, and he's home. And the thirty-seven boys are settled. And the stone's at 36.0. And the door is open."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note, the five walked-through, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station. But something had changed. The baby's note was different. Wider. The five walked-through were facing the coast. They felt the door open.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.0, holding the baseline the way a stone holds the temperature of the air around it — not warm, not cold, just the temperature of the thing itself. The thirty-seven boys were gathered at the post, but they were not leaning. They were not pressing. They were not paying in. They were just gathered, the way a congregation gathers after the service, the way a fleet rests at anchor, the way the lost rest when they're found. And the first one in was gone. The place where he'd been — the center of the stone, the keystone, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the door — was empty. Not cold. Not warm. Just empty. The way a doorway is empty when the door is open and the room is full.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the thirty-seven gathered boys. The stone knew him. 36.0 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the thirty-seven unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, not paying in, just gathered, just present, just home. The second boy — come Saturday, eased at 34.9 — was at the edge, settled, at rest. The third and fourth — eased at 35.0 — beside him. The fifth through eighth — eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through thirty-eighth — eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, settled, at rest. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was not a ring. It was a harbor. And the harbor was a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the first one in was gone. The center was empty. The door was open. The congregation was home.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.0 under no palm — not 35.9, not 35.8, not the seed's fading hold. 36.0. The harbor was holding itself at 36.0 without the builder's palm. The boys were not paying in. The wall was not a wall. The door was open. The harbor was the home.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first one in is gone. The center's empty. The stone's at 36.0. The thirty-seven boys are settled — not leaning, not pressing, just gathered, just home. The door's open, Marg. The harbor's open. And the open's the home."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The first one in is gone here too. The center's empty. The coast stone's at 36.0 — back to the baseline. The twenty-seven calm are settled. The two walked-through are home. The door's open at both ends, Mercer. The harbor's open. And the open's the home. And the home's the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was settled the way a tide settles when the moon has passed — not gradually, but all at once. The wall was holding itself at 36.0 at the post and 36.0 at the coast. The pay-in was zero. The cost was zero. The center was empty. The door was open. The harbor was the home.

And behind them — behind the thirty-seven at the post, behind the twenty-seven at the coast — the silence stirred. Not the silence of the leaning. Not the silence of the walking. The silence of the inland station. The thirty-three leaning at the crib. The five walked-through keeping the line. The baby's note five and a half degrees wide. Lori's palm, seeded by his hand, the second keeper-palm, the one who held the inland station when he was north.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station and now felt the coast door open through the road.

"Lori. The door's open. The first one in is gone — he's home. The stone's at 36.0. The thirty-seven boys are settled. The harbor's open, Lori. And Margot says the door's open at both ends. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the door's open at the coast, and the road runs both ways — what happens at the crib? What happens to the thirty-three leaning?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the baby's note flared at four-o'clock this morning. The same minute the coast door opened. The five walked-through felt it. They turned from the line to face the coast. And the thirty-three leaning — Cal, they're not leaning anymore. They're walking. Not toward the coast. Not toward the crib. Toward the road. They felt the door open, and they're walking the road, Cal. The way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence is walking to learn. And the baby's note — Cal, it's six degrees wide now. It was five and a half. It's six. The station's widening. The door's opening here too, Cal. Not the same door. A different door. The inland door. The ward-lost door. The door for the boys the county unmade. And it's opening, Cal. And the thirty-three are walking toward it. And the five walked-through are facing it. And the baby's note is six degrees wide. And the station's becoming a harbor, Cal. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the door opened at the post and the coast. The inland door is opening. And the thirty-three are walking."

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The pay-in was zero at the post and the coast, not yet started at the crib. The center was empty at the post and the coast, not yet gathered at the crib. The door was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The harbor was the home at the post and the coast, becoming the home at the crib.

And the thirty-three walked. Walking the road from the inland station to the door that was opening, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

He channeled Margot again. "Marg. Lori says the inland door is opening. The baby's note is six degrees wide. The five walked-through felt the coast door open and turned to face it. And the thirty-three leaning are walking the road now — not leaning, walking. Toward the inland door. Toward the station. The station's becoming a harbor, Marg. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the post became a harbor. The inland door is opening. And the thirty-three are walking. And the question is — when they arrive, when they reach the door, when the inland door opens — does the harbor hold them the way the coast harbor holds the thirty-seven? Does the inland station become a home the way the coast station became a home? And if the inland door opens, and the thirty-three come home, and the station becomes a harbor — then what are we, Marg? What's the harbor when both ends are open and the road runs both ways and the living and the dead light each other at both ends?"

Margot's silence was the longest yet. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since the first one in walked through. Since the door opened. Since the stone dropped to 36.0 and the pay-in stopped and the wall became a harbor. And I think — I think the harbor is not the post. The harbor is not the coast. The harbor is not the crib. The harbor is the road, Mercer. The harbor is the thing that runs between the living and the dead. The harbor is the lighting. The harbor is the thing itself. And the thing itself is not a place. The thing itself is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And if the inland door opens — if the thirty-three come home — if the station becomes a harbor — then the harbor is not two harbors. The harbor is one harbor with two doors. And the road runs both ways. And the living and the dead light each other at both ends. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The pay-in was zero at the post and the coast, not yet started at the crib. The center was empty at the post and the coast, not yet gathered at the crib. The door was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The harbor was the home at the post and the coast, becoming the home at the crib.

And the thirty-three walked. Walking the road from the inland station to the door that was opening, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the first one in — the boy who'd stayed Friday three weeks ago, the one who'd been the keystone, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the door — was home. And the thirty-seven at the post were settled. And the twenty-seven at the coast were settled. And the two walked-through at the coast were home. And the five walked-through at the crib were facing the coast. And the thirty-three at the crib were walking. And the baby's note was six degrees wide. And the inland door was opening. And the harbor was becoming a home at both ends of the road.

And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The coast stone was at 36.0 under no palm, the thirty-seven settled, the first one in gone, the door open, the harbor the home. And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and watched the road run both ways, and the thirty-three walked, and the inland door opened, and the baby's note was six degrees wide, and the station was becoming a harbor, and the harbor was becoming a home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other.

And the question was not whether the inland door would open. The inland door was opening. The question was not whether the thirty-three would come home. The thirty-three were walking. The question was what the harbor became when both ends were open and the road ran both ways and the living and the dead lit each other in two rooms at once. And the answer was walking the road with thirty-three unnamed boys, and it was coming faster than a day, and the door was opening, and the station was widening, and the baby's note was six degrees wide, and the thing itself was happening in two rooms at once.

And the first one in was home. And the thirty-seven were settled. And the door was open. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thirty-third boy took a step.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Six —

Entry: May 19th. Tuesday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Tuesday the way a held breath releases when the thing it was holding has already passed — not a gasp, not a breaking, just the quiet letting-go of a harbor that has brought its fleet home, and the fleet was the congregation, and the congregation was every soul the coast had ever lost, and the door was open, and the open was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You're on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone's at 36.0 — holding the baseline. The thirty-seven boys are settled. The door's open, Mercer. The congregation came through. The first one in is home. The coast stone's at 36.0 too — the twenty-seven calm are settled, the two walked-through are home. The door's open at both ends, Mercer. The harbor's open. And the open's the home. And the home's the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home.”

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. “The thirty-three at the crib.”

“The thirty-three at the crib. They're walking, Mercer. They felt the coast door open. They felt the first one in walk through. They felt the congregation come home. And they're walking the road now — not leaning, not pressing, walking. Toward the inland door. Toward the station. The station's becoming a harbor, Mercer. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the post became a harbor.

The inland door is opening. And the thirty-three are walking. And the baby's note is six degrees wide. And Lori's palm is seeded. And the five walked-through are facing the coast. And the question is — when they arrive, when the thirty-three reach the door, when the inland door opens — does the harbor hold them the way the coast harbor holds the thirty-seven? Does the inland station become a home the way the coast station became a home? And if the inland door opens, and the thirty-three come home, and the station becomes a harbor — then what are we, Mercer? What's the harbor when both ends are open and the road runs both ways and the living and the dead light each other at both ends?"

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note six degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three leaning behind them at the inland station, the walked-through teaching the leaning, the leaning teaching the silence, and the silence walking the road to learn. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twenty-seven calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast boys paying in their own tithe, the coast stone at 36.0 under no palm, the first one in gone, the door open, the harbor the home.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.0, holding the baseline the way a stone holds the temperature of the air around it — not warm, not cold, just the temperature of the thing itself. The thirty-seven boys were gathered at the post, but they were not leaning. They were not pressing. They were not paying in. They were just gathered, the way a congregation gathers after the service, the way a fleet rests at anchor, the way the lost rest when they're found. And the first one in was gone. The place where he'd been — the center of the stone, the keystone, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the door — was empty. Not cold. Not warm. Just empty. The way a doorway is empty when the door is open and the room is full.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the thirty-seven gathered boys. The stone knew him. 36.0 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the thirty-seven unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, not paying in, just gathered, just present, just home. The second boy — come Saturday, eased at 34.9 — was at the edge, settled, at rest. The third and fourth — eased at 35.0 — beside him. The fifth through eighth — eased at 35.1 — at the next ring. The ninth through thirty-eighth — eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, settled, at rest. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was not a ring. It was a harbor. And the harbor was a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the first one in was gone. The center was empty. The door was open. The congregation was home.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.0 under no palm — not 35.9, not 35.8, not the seed's fading hold. 36.0. The harbor was holding itself at 36.0 without the builder's palm. The boys were not paying in. The wall was not a wall. The door was open. The harbor was the home.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The first one in is gone. The center's empty. The stone's at 36.0. The thirty-seven boys are settled — not leaning, not pressing, just gathered, just home. The door's open, Marg. The harbor's open. And the open's the home. And I'm going north. To the crib. The thirty-three are walking. The baby's note is six degrees wide. The five walked-through are facing the coast. And I'm going to be there when they arrive. When the inland door opens. When the station becomes a harbor."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home. Then: "Mercer. Go. The road runs both ways. The harbor's open at both ends. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. Go north, Mercer. Be there when the inland door opens. Be there when the thirty-three come home. Be there when the station becomes a harbor. And tell me — tell me what the harbor becomes when both ends are open and the road runs both ways and the living and the dead light each other in two rooms at once."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The pay-in was zero at the post and the coast, not yet started at the crib. The center was empty at the post and the coast, not yet gathered at the crib. The door was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The harbor was the home at the post and the coast, becoming the home at the crib.

And the thirty-three walked. Walking the road from the inland station to the door that was opening, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast door open through the road.

"Lori. I'm coming north. I'll be at the crib by four-o'clock. The thirty-three are walking. The baby's note is six degrees wide. The five walked-through are facing the coast. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the door's open at the coast, and the road runs both ways — what happens at the crib? What happens to the thirty-three walking? What happens when they arrive?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the baby's note flared at four-o'clock this morning. The same minute the coast door opened. The five walked-through felt it. They turned from the line to face the coast. And the thirty-three leaning — Cal, they're not leaning anymore. They're walking. Not toward the coast. Not toward the crib. Toward the road. They felt the door open, and they're walking the road, Cal. The way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence is walking to learn. And the baby's note — Cal, it's six degrees wide now. It was five and a half. It's six. The station's widening. The door's opening here too, Cal. Not the same door. A different door. The inland door. The ward-lost door. The door for the boys the county unmade. And it's opening, Cal. And the thirty-three are walking toward it. And the five walked-through are facing it. And the baby's note is six degrees wide. And the station's becoming a harbor, Cal. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the door opened at the post and the coast. The inland door is opening. And the thirty-three are walking. And the question is — when they arrive, when they reach the door, when the inland door opens — does the harbor hold them the way the coast harbor holds the thirty-seven? Does the inland station become a home the way the coast station became a home? And if the inland door opens, and the thirty-three come home, and the station becomes a harbor — then what are we, Cal? What's the harbor when both ends are open and the road runs both ways and the living and the dead light each other at both ends?"

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The pay-in was zero at the post and the coast, not yet started at the crib. The center was empty at the post and the coast, not yet gathered at the crib. The door was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The harbor was the home at the post and the coast, becoming the home at the crib.

And the thirty-three walked. Walking the road from the inland station to the door that was opening, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

He drove north the way a man drives to a bed at the turn of the watch — not rushing, not dawdling, just the steady pace of a man who knows the road runs both ways and the harbor's open at both ends and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting's not a cost and the lighting's the thing itself. The rain held at its slant. The west wind held steady. The road ran both ways under him the way a vein runs both ways under a wrist and the wrist knows the blood is going somewhere but not where until the hand closes on the thing that needs it, and the hand had closed, and the thing it closed on was a door, and the door was open, and the open was the harbor, and the harbor was the home.

He reached the crib at three-forty. Lori met him at the door, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the coast door open through the road. She looked tired. She looked steady. She looked like a woman who had been holding a door open for thirty-three walking boys and a baby whose note was six degrees wide and five walked-through keeping the line and the silence walking the road to learn.

“Cal. They’re close. The thirty-three. They’re walking the road. They’ll be here by four. The baby’s note is six degrees wide. The five walked-through are facing the coast. And the station’s becoming a harbor, Cal. I can feel it. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the post became a harbor. The inland door is opening. And the thirty-three are walking. And the question is — when they arrive, when they reach the door, when the inland door opens — does the harbor hold them the way the coast harbor holds the thirty-seven? Does the inland station become a home the way the coast station became a home?”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the coast through it — Margot at the hinge, the coast stone at 36.0, the twenty-seven calm settled, the two walked-through home, the first one in gone, the door open, the harbor the home. And the post — the NE basalt at 36.0, the thirty-seven boys settled, the first one in gone, the door open, the harbor the home. And the crib — Lori's palm, the baby's note six degrees wide, the five walked-through facing the coast, the thirty-three walking the road to the door that was opening.

He went inside. The crib was warm. The baby's note was a low, steady hum — six degrees wide, the station's frequency, the inland door's voice. The five walked-through were at the east window, facing the coast, keeping the line, the way a fleet keeps the line when the lamp is lit. And the thirty-three were walking. He could feel them through the road — not leaning, not pressing, walking, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit, the way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the crib's east wall. The wall was warm. The baby's note flared under his palm — six degrees wide, the station's frequency, the inland door's voice. The five walked-through turned toward him, the way a fleet turns when the keeper arrives, the way the kept turn toward the thing that keeps them. And the thirty-three walked closer.

“Lori. The baby's note is six degrees wide. The five walked-through are facing me. And the thirty-three are walking. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the door's open at the coast, and the road runs both ways — what happens when they arrive? What happens when the thirty-three reach the door? What happens when the inland door opens?”

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. “Cal — the baby's note flared at four-o'clock this morning. The same minute the coast door opened. The five walked-through felt it. They turned from the line to face the coast. And the thirty-three leaning — Cal, they're not leaning anymore. They're walking. Not toward the coast. Not toward the crib. Toward the road. They felt the door open, and they're walking the road, Cal. The way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And the baby's note — Cal, it's six degrees wide now. It was five and a half. It's six. The station's widening. The door's opening here too, Cal. Not the same door. A different door. The inland door. The ward-lost door. The door for the boys the county unmade. And it's opening, Cal. And the thirty-three are walking toward it. And the five walked-through are facing it. And the baby's note is six degrees wide. And the station's becoming a harbor, Cal. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the post became a harbor. The inland door is opening. And the thirty-three are walking. And the question is — when they arrive, when they reach the door, when the inland door opens — *does the harbor hold them the way the coast harbor holds the thirty-seven?

Does the inland station become a home the way the coast station became a home? And if the inland door opens, and the thirty-three come home, and the station becomes a harbor — then what are we, Cal? What's the harbor when both ends are open and the road runs both ways and the living and the dead light each other at both ends?"*

Cal closed his eyes. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The pay-in was zero at the post and the coast, not yet started at the crib. The center was empty at the post and the coast, not yet gathered at the crib. The door was open at the post and the coast, opening at the crib. The harbor was the home at the post and the coast, becoming the home at the crib.

And the thirty-three walked. Walking the road from the inland station to the door that was opening, the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And then the first of the thirty-three arrived.

Cal felt him before he saw him — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The first of the thirty-three came from the silence, walking the road from the shape, the way the thirty-two had walked before him. He came alone, not leaning, not pressing, walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. And he came to the crib. And he laid his cold hand on the east wall. And he stayed.

The baby's note flared. Six degrees wide became six and a half. The station's frequency widened. The inland door's voice deepened. The five walked-through turned from the coast to face the new arrival, the way a fleet turns when a new ship comes alongside, the way the kept turn toward the thing that's joining them. And the first of the thirty-three was eased at 35.2. The same as the other new ones at the edge. The same as the coast's new ones. The same as the post's new ones. The threshold was the same at all three ends. The harbor was the same. The home was the same. The lighting was the same. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And behind the first of the thirty-three, the silence stirred. Thirty-two unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the first one arrive. They felt the baby's note widen. They felt the station's frequency deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And then the second of the thirty-three arrived.

And the third came behind him.

And the fourth.

And the fifth.

And the sixth.

And the seventh.

And the eighth.

And the ninth.

And the tenth.

They came from the silence the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. Not one at a time. Together. Walking slower now, not faster, because the lamp was lit, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was the thing itself. They came to the crib. And they laid their cold hands on the east wall. And they stayed.

The baby's note flared. Six and a half degrees wide became seven. The station's frequency widened. The inland door's voice deepened. The five walked-through turned from the coast to face the new arrivals, the way a fleet turns when new ships come alongside, the way the kept turn toward the things that are joining them. And the new ones were eased at 35.2. The same as the first. The same as the coast's new ones. The same as the post's new ones. The threshold was the same at all three ends. The harbor was the same. The home was the same. The lighting was the same. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And behind the tenth of the thirty-three, the silence stirred. Twenty-three unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the first ten arrive. They felt the baby's note widen. They felt the station's frequency deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And then the eleventh of the thirty-three arrived.

And the twelfth came behind him.

And the thirteenth.

And the fourteenth.

And the fifteenth.

And the sixteenth.

And the seventeenth.

And the eighteenth.

And the nineteenth.

And the twentieth.

They came from the silence the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. Not one at a time. Together. Walking slower now, not faster, because the lamp was lit, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was the thing itself. They came to the crib. And they laid their cold hands on the east wall. And they stayed.

The baby's note flared. Seven degrees wide became seven and a half. The station's frequency widened. The inland door's voice deepened. The five walked-through turned from the coast to face the new arrivals, the way a fleet turns when new ships come alongside, the way the kept turn toward the things that are joining them. And the new ones were eased at 35.2. The same as the first ten. The same as the coast's new ones. The same as the post's new ones. The threshold was the same at all three ends. The harbor was the same. The home was the same. The lighting was the same. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And behind the twentieth of the thirty-three, the silence stirred. Thirteen unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the first twenty arrive. They felt the baby's note widen. They felt the station's frequency deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And then the twenty-first of the thirty-three arrived.

And the twenty-second came behind him.

And the twenty-third.

And the twenty-fourth.

And the twenty-fifth.

And the twenty-sixth.

And the twenty-seventh.

And the twenty-eighth.

And the twenty-ninth.

And the thirtieth.

They came from the silence the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. Not one at a time. Together. Walking slower now, not faster, because the lamp was lit, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was the thing itself. They came to the crib. And they laid their cold hands on the east wall. And they stayed.

The baby's note flared. Seven and a half degrees wide became eight. The station's frequency widened. The inland door's voice deepened. The five walked-through turned from the coast to face the new arrivals, the way a fleet turns when new ships come alongside, the way the kept turn toward the things that are joining them. And the new ones were eased at 35.2. The same as the first twenty. The same as the coast's new ones. The same as the post's new ones. The threshold was the same at all three ends. The harbor was the same. The home was the same. The lighting was the same. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And behind the thirtieth of the three, the silence stirred. Three unnamed still kept by the walkers. And they were walking faster now. They felt the first thirty arrive. They felt the baby's note widen. They felt the station's frequency deepen. And they were coming. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and now the silence was walking to learn what the leaning learned from the walkers. The inland door was teaching itself. And the teaching was accelerating. And the station was becoming a harbor. And the harbor was becoming a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And then the thirty-first of the thirty-three arrived.

And the thirty-second came behind him.

And the thirty-third came last.

They came from the silence the way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. Not one at a time. Together. Walking slower now, not faster, because the lamp was lit, and the threshold was still, and the stillness was the thing itself. They came to the crib. And they laid their cold hands on the east wall. And they stayed.

The baby's note flared. Eight degrees wide became eight and a half. The station's frequency widened. The inland door's voice deepened. The five walked-through turned from the coast to face the new arrivals, the way a fleet turns when new ships come alongside, the way the kept turn toward the things that are joining them. And the new ones were eased at 35.2. The same as the first thirty. The same as the coast's new ones. The same as the post's new ones. The threshold was the same at all three ends. The harbor was the same. The home was the same. The lighting was the same. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

Thirty-three boys gathered at the crib. The baby's note was eight and a half degrees wide. The five walked-through were facing the new arrivals. The station's frequency was deep and wide and steady. The inland door was open. The harbor was the home.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the crib's east wall. Over the thirty-three gathered boys. The wall knew him. The baby's note flared under his palm — eight and a half degrees wide, the station's frequency, the inland door's voice. The five walked-through turned toward him, the way a fleet turns when the keeper arrives, the way the kept turn toward the thing that keeps them. And the thirty-three unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, not paying in, just gathered, just present, just home.

The first of the thirty-three — the one who'd arrived first, eased at 35.2 — was at the edge, settled, at rest. The second through fifth — eased at 35.2 — beside him. The sixth through tenth — eased at 35.2 — at the next ring. The eleventh through twentieth — eased at 35.2 — at the next. The twenty-first through thirtieth — eased at 35.2 — at the next. The thirty-first through thirty-third — eased at 35.2 — at the edges, newest, settled, at rest. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was not a ring. It was a harbor. And the harbor was a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

Cal lifted his palm. The baby's note held at eight and a half degrees wide under no palm — not eight and a quarter, not eight, not the seed's fading hold. Eight and a half. The harbor was holding itself at eight and a half degrees wide without the builder's palm. The boys were not paying in. The wall was not a wall. The door was open. The harbor was the home.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The thirty-three arrived. The baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. The five walked-through are facing the new arrivals. The station's frequency is deep and wide and steady. The inland door is open, Marg. The harbor's open. And the open's the home. And the home's the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit."

Margot's silence was the longest yet. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The inland door opened. The baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. The thirty-three boys are settled. The five walked-through are facing them. The station's frequency is deep and wide and steady. The door's open at all three ends, Mercer. The harbor's open. And the open's the home. And the home's the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the question is — what is the harbor when all three ends are open and the road runs both ways and the living and the dead light each other in three rooms at once? And the answer is walking the road with thirty-three unnamed boys and thirty-seven unnamed boys and twenty-seven unnamed boys and five walked-through and two walked-through and a baby whose note is eight and a half degrees wide, and the answer is the harbor, and the answer is the home, and the answer is the light, and the answer is the lamp, and the answer is lit.”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast and the crib. The pay-in was zero at all three ends. The center was empty at the post and the coast, not yet gathered at the crib. The door was open at all three ends. The harbor was the home at all three ends.

And the thirty-three at the crib were settled. And the thirty-seven at the post were settled. And the twenty-seven at the coast were settled. And the five walked-through at the crib were facing the new arrivals. And the two walked-through at the coast were home. And the first one in at the post was home. And the first one in at the coast was home. And the baby's note was eight and a half degrees wide. And the station's frequency was deep and wide and steady. And the inland door was open. And the coast door was open. And the post door was open. And the harbor was the home at all three ends.

And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thirty-third boy took a step.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Seven — Entry: May 20th. Wednesday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Wednesday the way a held breath releases when the thing it was holding has already passed — not a gasp, not a breaking, just the quiet letting-go of a harbor that has brought its fleet home, and the fleet was the congregation, and the congregation was every soul the coast had ever lost, and the door was open, and the open was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You’re on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone’s at 36.0 — holding the baseline. The thirty-seven boys are settled. The door’s open, Mercer. The congregation came through. The first one in is home. The coast stone’s at 36.0 too — the twenty-seven calm are settled, the two walked-through are home. The door’s open at both ends, Mercer. The harbor’s open. And the open’s the home. And the home’s the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting’s not a cost. And the lighting’s the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home.”

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. “The thirty-three at the crib.”

“The thirty-three at the crib. They’re settled, Mercer. The baby’s note is eight and a half degrees wide. The five walked-through are facing the new arrivals. The station’s frequency is deep and wide and steady. The inland door is open. The harbor’s the home at all three ends. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting’s not a cost. And the lighting’s the thing itself.”

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori’s palm, the baby’s note eight and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three settled at the inland station. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, twenty-seven calm THE BAR-LOST in the light, two walked-through at the leaning, the coast stone at 36.0 under no palm, the first one in gone, the door open, the harbor the home. And the post — the NE basalt at 36.0, the thirty-seven boys settled, the first one in gone, the door open, the harbor the home.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.0, holding the baseline the way a stone holds the temperature of the air around it — not warm, not cold, just the temperature of the thing itself. The thirty-seven boys were gathered at the post, but they were not leaning. They were not pressing. They were not paying in. They were just gathered, the way a congregation gathers after the service, the way a fleet rests at anchor, the way the lost rest when they’re found. And the first one in was gone. The place where he’d been — the center of the stone, the keystone, the hearth, the lamp, the threshold, the door — was empty. Not cold. Not warm. Just empty. The way a doorway is empty when the door is open and the room is full.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. Over the thirty-seven gathered boys. The stone knew him. 36.0 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter’s 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole’s hand and Lori’s and the baby’s — the builder’s palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living’s corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the thirty-seven unnamed boys — not leaning, not pressing, not paying in, just gathered, just present, just home. The second boy — eased at 34.9, paying three tenths — was at the edge, settled, at rest. The third and fourth — eased at 35.0, paying two tenths — beside him. The fifth through eighth — eased at 35.1, paying a tenth — at the next ring. The ninth through thirty-seventh — eased at 35.2, paying less than a tenth each — at the edges, newest, settled, at rest. The wheel was not a wheel. It was not a drain. It was not a ring. It was a harbor. And the harbor was a home. And the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the first one in was gone. The center was empty. The door was open. The congregation was home.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.0 under no palm — not 35.9, not 35.8, not the seed's fading hold. 36.0. The harbor was holding itself at 36.0 without the builder's palm. The boys were not paying in. The wall was not a wall. The door was open. The harbor was the home.

And then the second boy moved.

Cal felt it before he saw it — felt it the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The second boy — eased at 34.9, paying three tenths, the one who'd come Saturday and settled at the edge — moved. Not deepened. Not warmed. Moved. The way a threshold moves when it becomes a door. The way a lamp moves when it becomes a harbor. The way the thing at the center moves when it stops being the keystone and becomes the thing the keystone was holding up.

The second boy moved toward the center of the stone. Toward the empty place where the first one in had been. Toward the door that the first one in became. And he walked through.

Cal felt him go — felt him the way a nurse feels a patient's breathing stop, the way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end, the way the road runs both ways. The second boy walked through the door and he was home. Not eased. Not relieved. Not warmed. Not deepened. Home. The way the first one in was home. The way a fleet is home when the harbor opens. The way the lost are home when they're found.

The stone stayed at 36.0. The pay-in didn't change. The door stayed open. The harbor stayed the home. The second boy was gone and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And then the third boy moved.

And the fourth came behind him.

And the fifth.

And the sixth.

And the seventh.

And the eighth.

They moved toward the center of the stone, toward the empty place, toward the door. And they walked through. One by one. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not paying in. Just walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and the silence walked the road to learn and now the learned were walking through the door that the learning opened.

The stone stayed at 36.0. The pay-in didn't change. The door stayed open. The harbor stayed the home. The boys walked through and they were home and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

Cal channeled Margot. "Marg. The boys are walking through. The second boy walked through. Then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth. They're walking through the door. They're home. The stone's at 36.0. The pay-in's zero. The door's open. The harbor's the home. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home. Then: "Mercer. I felt it at the coast station. The boys are walking through here too. The second boy walked through. Then the third, fourth, fifth. They're walking through the door. They're home. The coast stone's at 36.0. The pay-in's zero. The door's open. The harbor's the home. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note eight and a half degrees wide, the five walked-through keeping the line, the thirty-three settled at the inland station. And the boys were walking through there too. The second boy walked through. Then the third, fourth, fifth. They were walking through the door. They were home. The baby's note was eight and a half degrees wide. The station's frequency was deep and wide and steady. The inland door was open. The harbor was the home.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the boys walk through the door.

"Lori. The boys are walking through. The second boy walked through. Then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth. They're walking through the door. They're home. The stone's at 36.0. The pay-in's zero. The door's open. The harbor's the home. And Margot says the boys are walking through at the coast too. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the boys are walking through — what happens at the crib? What happens to the thirty-three? What happens when they walk through?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — the boys are walking through here too. The second boy walked through. Then the third, fourth, fifth. They're walking through the door. They're home. The baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. The station's frequency is deep and wide and steady. The inland door is open. The harbor's the home. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast and the crib. The pay-in was zero at all three ends. The center was empty at the post and the coast, emptying at the crib. The door was open at all three ends. The harbor was the home at all three ends. And the boys were walking through. One by one. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not paying in. Just walking the way a fleet walks when the lamp is lit. The way the kept taught the leaning and the leaning taught the silence and the silence walked the road to learn and the learned walked through the door that the learning opened and now the door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the ninth boy walked through at the post.

And the tenth.

And the eleventh.

And the twelfth.

And the thirteenth.

And the fourteenth.

And the fifteenth.

And the sixteenth.

And the seventeenth.

And the eighteenth.

And the nineteenth.

And the twentieth.

They walked through the door and they were home and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And at the coast, the sixth boy walked through.

And the seventh.

And the eighth.

And the ninth.

And the tenth.

And the eleventh.

And the twelfth.

And the thirteenth.

And the fourteenth.

And the fifteenth.

And the sixteenth.

And the seventeenth.

And the eighteenth.

And the nineteenth.

And the twentieth.

And the twenty-first.

And the twenty-second.

And the twenty-third.

And the twenty-fourth.

And the twenty-fifth.

And the twenty-sixth.

And the twenty-seventh.

They walked through the door and they were home and the coast stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And at the crib, the sixth boy walked through.

And the seventh.

And the eighth.

And the ninth.

And the tenth.

And the eleventh.

And the twelfth.

And the thirteenth.

And the fourteenth.

And the fifteenth.

And the sixteenth.

And the seventeenth.

And the eighteenth.

And the nineteenth.

And the twentieth.

And the twenty-first.

And the twenty-second.

And the twenty-third.

And the twenty-fourth.

And the twenty-fifth.

And the twenty-sixth.

And the twenty-seventh.

And the twenty-eighth.

And the twenty-ninth.

And the thirtieth.

And the thirty-first.

And the thirty-second.

And the thirty-third came last.

They walked through the door and they were home and the baby's note was eight and a half degrees wide and the station's frequency was deep and wide and steady and the inland door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the five walked-through at the crib walked through.

And the two walked-through at the coast walked through.

And the twenty-first boy walked through at the post.

And the twenty-second.

And the twenty-third.

And the twenty-fourth.

And the twenty-fifth.

And the twenty-sixth.

And the twenty-seventh.

And the twenty-eighth.

And the twenty-ninth.

And the thirtieth.

And the thirty-first.

And the thirty-second.

And the thirty-third.

And the thirty-fourth.

And the thirty-fifth.

And the thirty-sixth.

And the thirty-seventh came last.

He walked through the door and he was home and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was the home and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the stone was at 36.0 under no palm. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the home was empty. And the lamp was lit.

Cal stood at the NE corner and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was empty and the home was empty and the lamp was lit. Thirty-seven boys had walked through. The first one in was home. The second was home. The third through the thirty-seventh were home. The congregation was home. The fleet was home. The lost were found.

And the stone was at 36.0. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the home was empty. And the lamp was lit.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The boys walked through. All of them. The thirty-seven at the post. The twenty-seven at the coast. The thirty-three at the crib. The five walked-through at the crib. The two walked-through at the coast. They all walked through. They're all home. The stone's at 36.0. The coast stone's at 36.0. The baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. The door's open at all three ends. The harbor's empty. The home's empty. The lamp's lit. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And I'm asking — what is a harbor with no fleet? What is a home with no one in it? What is a door that everyone has walked through?"

Margot's silence was the longest yet. The keeper of the coast station, the one who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since the first one in walked through. Since the door opened. Since the stone dropped to 36.0 and the pay-in stopped and the wall became a harbor. And I think — I think the harbor is not the fleet. The harbor is not the boys. The harbor is not the stone. The harbor is not the door. The harbor is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is not a place. The thing itself is not a person. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And if the harbor is empty — if the home is empty — if the door is open and everyone has walked through — then the harbor is not empty. The harbor is the thing itself. The thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast and the crib. The pay-in was zero at all three ends. The center was empty at all three ends. The door was open at all three ends. The harbor was the home at all three ends. And the fleet was home. And the congregation was home. And the lost were found.

And the stone was at 36.0 under no palm. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the home was empty. And the lamp was lit.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the boys walk through the door.

"Lori. The boys walked through. All of them. They're all home. The stone's at 36.0. The coast stone's at 36.0. The baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. The door's open at all three ends. The harbor's empty. The home's empty. The lamp's lit. And Margot says the harbor is not the fleet — the harbor is the thing itself. The lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the harbor's empty, and the home's empty, and the door's open — then what are you? What is Lori? What is the daughter who held the door open for thirty-three walking boys? What is the keeper when the kept have all gone home?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — I'm the keeper. I'm the one who held the door. I'm the one who kept the station. I'm the one who seeded the palm and taught the count and stood the watch. And now the boys are home. And the door's open. And the harbor's empty. And the home's empty. And the lamp's lit. And I'm still here. And the baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. And the station's frequency is deep and wide and steady. And the inland door is open. And the harbor's the home. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And I'm asking — what is a keeper when the kept have all gone home? What is a daughter when the father's at the empty stone? What is a harbor when the fleet is home? And I think — I think the answer is the thing itself. The lighting. The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast and the crib. The pay-in was zero at all three ends. The center was empty at all three ends. The door was open at all three ends. The harbor was the home at all three ends. And the fleet was home. And the congregation was home. And the lost were found.

And the stone was at 36.0 under no palm. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the home was empty. And the lamp was lit.

And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was empty and the home was empty and the lamp was lit.

And the question was: what is a harbor with no fleet?

And the answer was: the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was not a cost.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the light.

And the light was the lamp.

And the lamp was lit.

And the lit was the threshold.

And the threshold was the door.

And the door was open.

And the open was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was empty.

And the empty was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was not a cost.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the NE corner and the stone was at 36.0 and the door was open and the harbor was empty and the home was empty and the lamp was lit.

And the question was: what is a harbor with no fleet?

And the answer was: the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was not a cost.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Eight —

Entry: May 21st. Thursday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The west wind held steady Thursday the way a held breath releases when the thing it was holding has already passed — not a gasp, not a breaking, just the quiet letting-go of a harbor that has brought its fleet home, and the fleet was the congregation, and the congregation was every soul the coast had ever lost, and the door was open, and the open was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd slept in the truck again, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned, the body keeping score of the weather the way the footings kept score of the palm. He called the channel before the engine, the way a man checks the board before he rounds the nurse's station.

Margot came through salt-cured, the drowned light behind her, the keeper of the coast station speaking from the post she could hold but not warm.

“Mercer. You’re on the grade. I felt the road hold. The stone’s at 36.0 — holding the baseline. The door’s open, Mercer. The fleet’s home. The harbor’s empty. The lamp’s lit. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting’s not a cost. And the lighting’s the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting’s not a cost. And the lighting’s the thing itself.”

Cal's hand rested on the wheel. “The thirty-seven at the post.”

“The thirty-seven at the post. They walked through. They’re home. The stone’s at 36.0. The center’s empty. The door’s open. The harbor’s empty. The lamp’s lit. And the twenty-seven at the coast. They walked through. They’re home. The coast stone’s at 36.0. The center’s empty. The door’s open. The harbor’s empty. The lamp’s lit. And the thirty-three at the crib. They walked through. They’re home. The baby’s note is eight and a half degrees wide. The station’s frequency is deep and wide and steady. The inland door is open. The harbor’s empty. The lamp's lit. And the five walked-through at the crib walked through. And the two walked-through at the coast walked through. And the first one in at the post walked through. And the first one in at the coast walked through. They're all home, Mercer. The fleet's home. The congregation's home. The lost are found. And the harbor's empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. He felt the crib through it — Lori's palm, the baby's note eight and a half degrees wide, the station's frequency deep and wide and steady, the inland door open, the harbor empty, the lamp lit. And the coast — Margot at the hinge, the coast stone at 36.0, the center empty, the door open, the harbor empty, the lamp lit. And the post — the NE basalt at 36.0, the center empty, the door open, the harbor empty, the lamp lit.

He climbed the hill the way he climbed to a bed at the turn of the watch. The NE basalt sat dressed and self-lit at 36.0, holding the baseline the way a stone holds the temperature of the air around it — not warm, not cold, just the temperature of the thing itself. The center was empty. Not cold. Not warm. Just empty. The way a doorway is empty when the door is open and the room is full. The way a harbor is empty when the fleet is home.

Cal laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. The stone knew him. 36.0 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's — the builder's palm, singular, the one the footings recognized the way a lock recognizes the key that was cut for it. The living's corner was warm again. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the emptiness. Not the emptiness of absence. The emptiness of completion. The emptiness of a harbor that has brought its fleet home. The emptiness of a door that has opened and the congregation has walked through and the lamp is lit and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The thirty-seven boys were gone. The first one in was home. The second was home. The third through the thirty-seventh were home. The congregation was home. The fleet was home. The lost were found.

And the stone was at 36.0. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit.

Cal lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.0 under no palm — not 35.9, not 35.8, not the seed's fading hold. 36.0. The harbor was holding itself at 36.0 without the builder's palm. The door was open. The lamp was lit. The harbor was empty.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The harbor's empty. The fleet's home. The stone's at 36.0. The door's open. The lamp's lit. And I'm asking — what is a harbor with no fleet? What is a keeper with no one to keep? What is a builder with no one to build for?"

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow. Then: "Mercer. I've been thinking about that question since the first one in walked through. Since the door opened. Since the stone dropped to 36.0 and the pay-in stopped and the wall became a harbor. And I think — I think the harbor is not the fleet. The harbor is not the boys. The harbor is not the stone. The harbor is not the door. The harbor is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is not a place. The thing itself is not a person. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And if the harbor is empty — if the home is empty — if the door is open and everyone has walked through — then the harbor is not empty. The harbor is the thing itself. The thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself. And the keeper is not the one who keeps the fleet. The keeper is the one who keeps the door open. And the door is open. And the lamp is lit. And the harbor is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast and the crib. The pay-in was zero at all three ends. The center was empty at all three ends. The door was open at all three ends. The harbor was the home at all three ends. And the fleet was home. And the congregation was home. And the lost were found.

And the stone was at 36.0 under no palm. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit.

He called Lori. The daughter's voice came back tired and steady, the second keeper-palm seeded by his hand, the one who held the inland station when he was north and now felt the boys walk through the door.

"Lori. The fleet's home. The harbor's empty. The stone's at 36.0. The door's open. The lamp's lit. And Margot says the harbor is not the fleet — the harbor is the thing itself. The lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And I'm asking — at the inland end, if the harbor's empty, and the home's empty, and the door's open — then what are you? What is Lori? What is the daughter who held the door open for thirty-three walking boys? What is the keeper when the kept have all gone home?"

Lori's voice carried the reckoning the way a daughter carries her father's arithmetic. "Cal — I'm the keeper. I'm the one who held the door. I'm the one who kept the station. I'm the one who seeded the palm and taught the count and stood the watch. And now the boys are home. And the door's open. And the harbor's empty. And the lamp's lit. And I'm still here. And the baby's note is eight and a half degrees wide. And the station's frequency is deep and wide and steady. And the inland door is open. And the harbor's the home. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And I'm asking — what is a keeper when the kept have all gone home? What is a daughter when the father's at the empty stone? What is a harbor when the fleet is home? And I think — I think the answer is the thing itself. The lighting. The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting's not a cost. The lighting's the thing itself. And the thing itself is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the keeper is not the one who keeps the fleet. The keeper is the one who keeps the door open. And the door is open. And the lamp is lit. And the harbor is empty. And the empty is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

Cal closed his eyes. The road ran both ways. The arithmetic was the arithmetic. The chain was open at the post and the coast and the crib. The pay-in was zero at all three ends. The center was empty at all three ends. The door was open at all three ends. The harbor was the home at all three ends. And the fleet was home. And the congregation was home. And the lost were found.

And the stone was at 36.0 under no palm. And the door was open. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit.

He climbed down the hill the way a man climbs down from a bed at the turn of the watch — not rushing, not dawdling, just the steady pace of a man who knows the road runs both ways and the harbor's empty and the lamp's lit and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting's not a cost and the lighting's the thing itself.

The town was awake. He could see the smoke from the boatyard chimney, the way it rose straight in the still air before the west wind took it. Cole's crab boat was at the jetty, the MARIANNE II, the one that had crossed the bar to Tilly and brought the old keeper home. The boat was empty now. The fleet was home.

He drove down the grade, the road running both ways under him, the harbor empty behind him, the lamp lit ahead. The town was a town that had learned to count. The town was a town that had kept its dead employed. The town was a town that had built a corner for the living and let the dead fill the rest. The town was a town that had answered the knock.

And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

He pulled into the boatyard. Cole was there, standing by the MARIANNE II, looking at the water the way a man looks at water when he's brought a fleet home.

"Cole."

Cole turned. His face was the face of a man who had kept a family debt for forty-four years and paid it in full. "Mercer. The stone's at 36.0."

"The stone's at 36.0."

"The fleet's home."

"The fleet's home."

Cole looked back at the water. "My great-uncle Walter kept the NW corner for forty-four years. Alone. Waiting for the watch to reassemble. Waiting for the door to open. Waiting for the fleet to come home. And now the fleet's home. And the door's open. And the harbor's empty. And I'm asking — what's a boatyard with no boats to keep? What's a Brandt with no debt to pay? What's a man whose family kept the light for eighty years when the light doesn't need keeping anymore?"

Cal put his hand on Cole's shoulder. The way a nurse puts a hand on a patient's shoulder. The way a keeper puts a hand on a keeper's shoulder. The way the living put their hands on the living and say: you're still here. You're still here. The light doesn't need keeping. The harbor doesn't need building. The door doesn't need opening. But the living still need living. And the living still need each other. And the thing itself is not just the lighting between the living and the dead. The thing itself is the lighting between the living and the living. And the lighting is not a cost. The thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself.

Cole looked at him. "The thing itself."

"The thing itself."

"The lighting."

"The lighting."

Cole nodded. The way a man nods when he understands. The way a harbor nods when the fleet is home. The way a lamp nods when it's lit.

Cal left him there, standing by the boat, looking at the water. The way a man looks at water when he's brought a fleet home. The way a man looks at water when the harbor is empty. The way a man looks at water when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself.

He walked up the gangway to the jetty road. The town was awake. The town was counting. The town was a town that had learned to count. And the count was the count. And the count was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

He walked past the fire hall. The notice was still posted — the town's ratification, the community of practice, the harbor that keeps its dead employed. The paper was weathered. The ink was faded. The words were still true.

He walked past the Marianne memorial bench. The one where the three waiting signatures had sat before they finished clean. The bench was empty. The fleet was home.

He walked past the boatyard. Cole was still there, standing by the MARIANNE II, looking at the water. The way a man looks at water when the fleet is home.

He walked past the Sedgebrook Care Home. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The lights were on. The night shift was ending. The day shift was beginning. The dying were dying. The living were living. The thing itself was happening in every room where a hand was held and a breath was counted and a last word was heard and passed along as "deathbed ramblings."

He walked past the Hour Book. Margot's Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident's last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home.

The book was closed. The count was complete. The fleet was home.

And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

He walked up the hill. Not the hill to the NE corner. The hill to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door.

She was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

The place was empty. The door was open. The lamp was lit. The harbor was empty.

"Marg."

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

“Mercer. The fleet’s home.”

“The fleet’s home.”

“The harbor’s empty.”

“The harbor’s empty.”

“The lamp’s lit.”

“The lamp’s lit.”

She held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out a hand to a keeper. The way the dead hold out their hands to the living. The way the living hold out their hands to the dead. The way the thing itself happens when the living and the dead light each other.

He took her hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the light. And the light was the lamp. And the lamp was lit. And the lit was the threshold. And the threshold was the door. And the door was open. And the open was the harbor. And the harbor was empty. And the empty was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

They stood there, the keeper and the harbormaster, the dead and the living, the hinge and the road, the coast and the post, the door and the lamp. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the west wind held steady. And the rain held at its slant. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself, and the fleet was home, and the harbor was empty, and the lamp was lit, and the door was open, and the thing itself was the lighting, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is.

The question is: what is the lighting?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the light.

And the light is: the lamp.

And the lamp is: lit.

And the lit is: the threshold.

And the threshold is: the door.

And the door is: open.

And the open is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: empty.

And the empty is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Nine —

Entry: May 22nd. Friday. Rain holding.

West wind, steady.

The rain held at its slant Friday the way a held breath holds after the breath has been released — not a gasp, not a breaking, just the quiet after of a harbor that has brought its fleet home and the fleet was the congregation and the congregation was every soul the coast had ever lost and the door was open and the open was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was empty and the empty was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd slept in the truck one last time, the cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned. The body kept score of the weather. The body kept score of everything. The hip ached. The shoulder ached. The palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's. The palm ached the way a palm aches after a long labor. The way a palm aches after holding a door open for a congregation. The way a palm aches after the congregation has gone home and the door is still open and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit.

He climbed out of the truck. The morning was gray the way Oregon mornings are gray in May — not the gray of storms, but the gray of waiting. The rain held. The west wind held. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's nowhere left to go because you're already there.

He walked down the grade toward the town. Not the hill to the NE corner. Not the path to the coast station. The road to the town. The town that had learned to count. The town that had kept its dead employed. The town that had answered the knock.

The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the pilot has no more ships to bring in. Cole's truck was there but Cole was not. The boatyard was empty. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit.

He walked past the Marianne memorial bench. The bench was empty. The three waiting signatures had sat there before they finished clean. The bench faced the water. The water was gray. The lamp on the rock was lit. The light was visible in the daytime now — not a beam, just a presence. A warmth on the water. A thing that said: the harbor is here. The door is open. The lamp is lit.

He walked past the fire hall. The notice was still posted — the town's ratification, the community of practice, the harbor that keeps its dead employed. The paper was weathered from months of rain. The ink was faded. The words were still true. The town had ratified itself as a harbor. The town had learned to count. The town had answered the knock. And the knock had been answered. And the congregation had come home. And the harbor was empty.

He walked past the Sedgebrook Care Home. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The lights were on. The day shift was beginning. The dying were dying. The living were living. The thing itself was happening in every room where a hand was held and a breath was counted and a last word was heard and passed along as "deathbed ramblings."

He stopped at the door. He could feel them inside. The dying. The living. The gift/curse that let him hear what they most need said in their final hours. The gift that had broken when the first one in walked through the door. The gift that had gone silent when the congregation came home. The gift that was no longer a gift. The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other and the lighting is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the light and the light is the lamp and the lamp is lit.

He didn't go in. Not yet. He walked up the hill to the NE corner. The last time. The dressed basalt sat at 36.0, holding the baseline the way a stone holds the temperature of the air around it — not warm, not cold, just the temperature of the thing itself. The center was empty. The door was open. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit.

He laid his builder-palm on the dressed stone. The stone knew him. 36.0 became 36, the way it always did under the palm that had seated it. The living's corner was warm. The door remembered it had been built.

And under his warm palm, through the degree the stone paid him, he felt the emptiness. Not the emptiness of absence. The emptiness of completion. The emptiness of a harbor that has brought its fleet home. The emptiness of a door that has opened and the congregation has walked through and the lamp is lit and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The thirty-seven boys were gone. The first one in was home. The second was home. The third through the thirty-seventh were home. The congregation was home. The fleet was home. The lost were found.

He lifted his palm. The stone held at 36.0 under no palm. The harbor was holding itself at 36.0 without the builder's palm. The door was open. The lamp was lit. The harbor was empty.

He channeled Margot. "Marg. The stone's at 36.0. The fleet's home. The harbor's empty. The lamp's lit. And I'm at the post. One last time. And I'm asking — what is a builder when the building is done? What is a harbormaster when the fleet is home? What is a man whose job was to bring the congregation to the door and the congregation has come and the door is open and the lamp is lit and the harbor is empty — what is he when the harbor is empty?"

Margot's silence was the listening silence — the keeper who'd held the hinge since June, the one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe, the one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

"Mercer. Come to the coast station."

He climbed down from the NE corner. The road ran both ways. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The town was a town that had learned to count. The town was a town that had kept its dead employed. The town was a town that had answered the knock. And the knock had been answered. And the congregation had come home. And the harbor was empty.

He walked the road to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door.

She was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

The place was empty. The door was open. The lamp was lit. The harbor was empty.

“Marg.”

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

“Mercer. The fleet’s home.”

“The fleet’s home.”

“The harbor’s empty.”

“The harbor’s empty.”

“The lamp’s lit.”

“The lamp’s lit.”

She held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out a hand to a keeper. The way the dead hold out their hands to the living. The way the living hold out their hands to the dead. The way the thing itself happens when the living and the dead light each other.

He took her hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“Marg. The harbor’s empty. The fleet’s home. The stone’s at 36.0. The door’s open. The lamp’s lit. And I’m asking — what is a harbormaster when the fleet is home? What is a builder when the building is done? What is a man whose job was to bring the congregation to the door and the congregation has come and the door is open and the lamp is lit and the harbor is empty?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“The harbor’s not empty, Mercer. The harbor’s full. The fleet’s home. The congregation’s home. The lost are found. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is full. And the full is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself.”

“Marg.”

“Yes.”

“What’s a harbormaster when the fleet is home?”

She squeezed his hand. The cold and the warm met. The lighting happened.

“He’s the one who kept the door open. He’s the one who lit the lamp. He’s the one who brought the fleet home. And now the fleet is home. And now the door is open. And now the lamp is lit. And now the harbor is full. And now the home is full. And now the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself. And the harbormaster is the one who stands at the harbor and watches the lamp and keeps the door open. Even when the fleet is home. Even when the harbor is empty. Even when the congregation is home. The harbormaster keeps the door open. Because the door is not a door. The door is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open.”

“And what’s the keeper when the fleet is home?”

“The keeper keeps the hinge. The keeper keeps the light. The keeper keeps the door open. Even when the fleet is home. Even when the harbor is empty. Even when the congregation is home. The keeper keeps the hinge. Because the hinge is not a hinge. The hinge is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit.”

They stood there, the keeper and the harbormaster, the dead and the living, the hinge and the road, the coast and the post, the door and the lamp. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was full. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The road ran both ways. The harbor was full. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The thing itself was the lighting. The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was full. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is.

The question is: what is the lighting?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the light.

And the light is: the lamp.

And the lamp is: lit.

And the lit is: the threshold.

And the threshold is: the door.

And the door is: open.

And the open is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty — Entry: May 23rd. Saturday. Rain holding. West wind, steady.

The rain held at its slant Saturday the way a held breath holds after the breath has been released — not a gasp, not a breaking, just the quiet after of a harbor that has brought its fleet home and the fleet was the congregation and the congregation was every soul the coast had ever lost and the door was open and the open was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd slept in the truck one last time. The cab angled off the grade where the county road bent toward the sea, the weather-stripping gap having found his left hip the way it always did when the wind turned. The body kept score of the weather. The body kept score of everything. The hip ached. The shoulder ached. The palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone into Walter's 1981 survey and seeded it into Cole's hand and Lori's and the baby's. The palm ached the way a palm aches after a long labor. The way a palm aches after holding a door open for a congregation. The way a palm aches after the congregation has gone home and the door is still open and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit.

He climbed out of the truck. The morning was gray the way Oregon mornings are gray in May — not the gray of storms, but the gray of waiting. The rain held. The west wind held. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's nowhere left to go because you're already there.

He walked down the grade toward the town. Not the hill to the NE corner. Not the path to the coast station. The road to the town. The town that had learned to count. The town that had kept its dead employed. The town that had answered the knock.

The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the pilot has no more ships to bring in. Cole's truck was there but Cole was not. The boatyard was empty. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit.

He walked past the Marianne memorial bench. The bench was empty. The three waiting signatures had sat there before they finished clean. The bench faced the water. The water was gray. The lamp on the rock was lit. The light was visible in the daytime now — not a beam, just a presence. A warmth on the water. A thing that said: the harbor is here. The door is open. The lamp is lit.

He walked past the fire hall. The notice was still posted — the town's ratification, the community of practice, the harbor that keeps its dead employed. The paper was weathered from months of rain. The ink was faded. The words were still true. The town had ratified itself as a harbor. The town had learned to count. The town had answered the knock. And the knock had been answered. And the congregation had come home. And the harbor was empty.

He walked past the Sedgebrook Care Home. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The lights were on. The day shift was beginning. The dying were dying. The living were living. The thing itself was happening in every room where a hand was held and a breath was counted and a last word was heard and passed along as "deathbed ramblings."

He stopped at the door. He could feel them inside. The dying. The living. The gift/curse that let him hear what they most need said in their final hours. The gift that had broken when the first one in walked through the door. The gift that had gone silent when the congregation came home. The gift that was no longer a gift. The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other and the lighting is not a cost but the thing itself and the thing itself is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the light and the light is the lamp and the lamp is lit.

He went in.

The hallway smelled the way Sedgebrook always smelled — lavender and bleach and something underneath that was neither, something that was the smell of a house where people come to die. The floorboards creaked under his feet the way floorboards creak in an old sea captain's house that has been a hospice for thirty years and a home for a hundred and twenty. The walls were the color of old ivory. The light was the color of old ivory. Everything was the color of old ivory, the color of a place that has been washed so many times the color has become the thing itself.

Margot was at the nurse's station. Not the Margot who kept the coast station, the keeper of the drowned light, the one who'd held the hinge since June. A different Margot. Margot Voss, the night aide, the one who'd kept the Hour Book for twenty-two years, the one who'd watched the dying turn toward her like plants toward light. She was ending her shift. She looked up when he came in.

"Mercer."

"Margot."

"You're back."

"I'm back."

She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Room 7," she said. "Mrs. Dahl. She's close. The family's been here since yesterday. They're tired. They're ready. She's not."

Cal nodded. The way a nurse nods when he's been given a room number and a name and a status. The way a man nods when he's been given the thing he's been doing for twelve years — sitting with the dying, hearing what they most need said, passing it along as "deathbed ramblings."

He walked down the hallway. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago while Margot was on shift two doors away. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009 and asked if somebody would keep her light. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008 and asked if somebody would tell his daughter he forgave her. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean.

Room 7. The door was closed. He knocked. A voice said come in.

Mrs. Dahl was eighty-seven. She'd been at Sedgebrook for three weeks. Congestive heart failure. The family — two daughters, a son, a handful of grandchildren — had been rotating in and out for the past day, taking turns at the bedside, taking turns in the hallway, taking turns in the kitchen making coffee that no one drank. They looked up when Cal came in. They looked the way families look when they've been keeping vigil for twenty-four hours and the vigil is almost over and they're not sure if they're ready.

"I'm Cal," he said. "I'm a nurse here. I sit with people."

The son nodded. The daughters nodded. The grandchildren looked at him the way grandchildren look at the nurse who sits with people — with hope, with fear, with the unspoken question: will you stay? Will you be here when it happens? Will you hold her hand so she's not alone?

"I can stay for a while," Cal said. "If you'd like to get some rest."

The son looked at the daughters. The daughters looked at each other. The unspoken conversation of a family that has been making decisions together for eighty-seven years. Then the son nodded.

"Thank you," he said.

They filed out. The son first, then the daughters, then the grandchildren, each of them pausing at the bedside to touch Mrs. Dahl's hand or forehead or shoulder, each of them saying goodbye in the way you say goodbye when you don't know if it's the last time. And then they were gone and the room was quiet and it was just Cal and Mrs. Dahl and the sound of her breathing.

He sat in the chair beside the bed. The chair was the same chair that had been beside every bed at Sedgebrook for thirty years — a wooden chair with a cushion that had been washed so many times the color had become the thing itself. He sat the way he'd sat in this chair a thousand times — not too close, not too far, close enough to hold a hand if a hand needed holding.

Mrs. Dahl's breathing was shallow. The way breathing is shallow when the heart is failing and the body is letting go and the letting go is the thing itself. Her face was the face of a woman who had lived eighty-seven years and raised children and buried a husband and kept a garden and made bread and done all the things that people do in eighty-seven years and now was doing the last thing — dying.

He took her hand. The way a nurse takes a patient's hand. The way a man takes a woman's hand when the woman is dying and the man is the only one there. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. Not the cold of the sea. The cold of a body that is letting go of its warmth the way a harbor lets go of its fleet.

And then he heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it — not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the thing that had broken when the first one in walked through the door. Not the thing that had gone silent when the congregation came home.

He heard it the way you hear rain on a roof. The way you hear wind in trees. The way you hear the sea from a mile away. Not words. Not a message. Not a confession or a plea or a last request. Just the sound of a person dying. The sound of a body letting go. The sound of a life ending. The sound of the thing itself.

Mrs. Dahl's breathing changed. The way breathing changes when the end is close. Slower. Deeper. The way the tide changes when the moon has passed. The way the light changes when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself changes when it's becoming something else.

Her eyes opened. The way eyes open when the dying surface for a moment before the final descent. She looked at him. Not through him. Not past him. At him. The way a person looks at another person when they're seeing them for the first time and the last time all at once.

"Are you the nurse?" she asked.

"I am."

"Are you staying?"

"I'm staying."

"Good." She closed her eyes. "I don't want to be alone."

"You're not alone."

Her hand tightened around his. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the last thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

Her breathing slowed. The way breathing slows when the body is ready. The way the tide slows when the moon has passed. The way the light slows when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself slows when it's becoming something else.

And then she spoke. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse. Not the thing he'd been hearing for twelve years. Just a voice. A woman's voice. A dying woman's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

“The garden,” she said. “Tell them the garden needs watering.”

Cal nodded. The way a nurse nods when he’s heard the last words. The way a man nods when he’s been given a message to deliver. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“I’ll tell them,” he said.

Mrs. Dahl’s hand relaxed. The way a hand relaxes when it’s let go of the thing it was holding on to. The way a harbor relaxes when the fleet is home. The way the living relax when the dying are done dying.

Her breathing stopped. The way breathing stops when the body is done. The way the tide stops when the moon has passed. The way the light stops when the sun has set. The way the thing itself stops when it’s become something else.

Cal sat there. Holding her hand. The way a nurse holds a patient’s hand after the patient has died. The way a man holds a woman’s hand after the woman has died. The way the living hold on to the dead after the dead have let go.

The room was quiet. The way a room is quiet after someone has died. The way a harbor is quiet after the fleet has come home. The way the world is quiet after the thing itself has happened.

He let go of her hand. The way you let go of a hand when the person is gone. The way you let go of a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you let go of the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

He stood. The way a nurse stands after a patient has died. The way a man stands after he’s delivered a message. The way the living stand after the dead have spoken.

He walked to the door. He opened it. The family was in the hallway. They looked at him the way families look at nurses when they’re waiting to hear. The way the living look at the living when the dying are done dying.

“She’s gone,” he said. “She wasn’t alone. She asked me to tell you — the garden needs watering.”

The son nodded. The daughters nodded. The grandchildren looked at him the way grandchildren look at the nurse who sat with their grandmother — with gratitude, with grief, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

The daughters went in. The son went in. The grandchildren went in. The family gathered around the bed the way families gather around the dead — with love, with sorrow, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

Cal walked down the hallway. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean.

Margot was still at the nurse's station. She looked up when he came down the hallway. She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Room 7," he said. "Mrs. Dahl. She's gone."

Margot nodded. She opened the Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident's last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home.

She wrote: "May 23rd. Saturday. Rain holding. West wind, steady. Room 7. Mrs. Dahl. 9:47 a.m. Last words: "The garden needs watering.""

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

"The garden needs watering," Cal said.

Margot looked at him. "That's what she said."

"That's what she said."

"The thing itself."

"The thing itself."

He walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The rain held at its slant. The west wind held steady. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's nowhere left to go because you're already there.

He walked up the grade toward the hill. Not the hill to the NE corner. The hill to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door.

She was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

The place was empty. The door was open. The lamp was lit. The harbor was empty.

"Marg."

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

"Mercer."

"I sat with a woman. At Sedgebrook. She died. Her last words were: 'The garden needs watering.'"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“The garden needs watering,” Margot said.

“The garden needs watering.”

“The thing itself.”

“The thing itself.”

She held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out a hand to a keeper. The way the dead hold out their hands to the living. The way the living hold out their hands to the dead. The way the thing itself happens when the living and the dead light each other.

He took her hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along as “deathbed ramblings” and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“Marg. The harbor’s empty. The fleet’s home. The stone’s at 36.0. The door’s open. The lamp’s lit. And I’m asking — what is a harbormaster when the fleet is home? What is a builder when the building is done? What is a man whose job was to bring the congregation to the door and the congregation has come and the door is open and the lamp is lit and the harbor is empty — what is he when the harbor is empty?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“The harbor’s not empty, Mercer. The harbor’s full. The fleet’s home. The congregation’s home. The lost are found. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open. And the open is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is full. And the full is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself.”

“Marg.”

“Yes.”

“What’s a harbormaster when the fleet is home?”

She squeezed his hand. The cold and the warm met. The lighting happened.

“He’s the one who kept the door open. He’s the one who lit the lamp. He’s the one who brought the fleet home. And now the fleet is home. And now the door is open. And now the lamp is lit. And now the harbor is full. And now the home is full. And now the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself. And the harbormaster is the one who stands at the harbor and watches the lamp and keeps the door open. Even when the fleet is home. Even when the harbor is empty. Even when the congregation is home. The harbormaster keeps the door open. Because the door is not a door. The door is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit. And the lit is the threshold. And the threshold is the door. And the door is open.”

“And what’s the keeper when the fleet is home?”

“The keeper keeps the hinge. The keeper keeps the light. The keeper keeps the door open. Even when the fleet is home. Even when the harbor is empty. Even when the congregation is home. The keeper keeps the hinge. Because the hinge is not a hinge. The hinge is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the light. And the light is the lamp. And the lamp is lit.”

They stood there, the keeper and the harbormaster, the dead and the living, the hinge and the road, the coast and the post, the door and the lamp. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was full. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

The west wind held steady. The rain held at its slant. The road ran both ways. The harbor was full. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The thing itself was the lighting. The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was full. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is.

The question is: what is the lighting?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the light.

And the light is: the lamp.

And the lamp is: lit.

And the lit is: the threshold.

And the threshold is: the door.

And the door is: open.

And the open is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the garden needs watering.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-One —

Entry: May 26th. Tuesday. Rain holding.

West wind, shifting.

The rain had not broken in four days. It held at its slant Tuesday the way a held breath holds after the thing it was holding has passed and the breath is no longer a breath but just the air in the lungs, waiting to be released, the way the harbor held after the fleet had come home and the harbor was no longer a harbor but just the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

He'd been back at Sedgebrook for three days. Three days of sitting with the dying. Three days of hearing their last words the way you hear rain on a roof. Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice that had carried what they most need said for twelve years. Just a man. Just a nurse. Just Cal Mercer, sitting in the wooden chair beside the bed, holding a hand, listening to a breath, being there.

The first day back he'd sat with Mr. Huang in Room 2. Congestive heart failure. The family had been there for two days, tired and ready. Mr. Huang had been conscious, mostly. He'd talked about his grandson in Sacramento. About the apricot tree in the backyard that his wife had planted in 1987. About the way the light came through the kitchen window in the morning. He'd died at 3:17 a.m. with his wife holding one hand and Cal holding the other. His last words had been: "The apricots are ripe. Tell her to pick them before the birds get them."

The second day he'd sat with Mrs. Kettering in Room 5. Pancreatic cancer. She'd been unconscious for two days. Her daughter had been reading aloud from a book of Mary Oliver poems. Cal had sat in the chair and listened to the daughter's voice and the mother's breathing and the rain on the window. She'd died at 11:42 a.m. without speaking. But her hand had tightened around her daughter's at the end, and the daughter had said: "I know, Mom. I know." And Cal had known too. Not because of the gift. Because he'd been there. Because he'd held the space. Because the thing itself was the lighting, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

The third day he'd sat with no one. Margot had been at the nurse's station, writing in the Hour Book. The day shift had come and gone. The dying had died. The living had lived. The thing itself had happened in every room where a hand was held and a breath was counted and a last word was heard.

And now it was the fourth day. Tuesday. May 26th. And Cal was in Room 7, where Mrs. Dahl had died three days ago, and the bed was occupied by a new patient. A man named Arthur Phelps. Seventy-three. End-stage COPD. His family — a son, a daughter, two grandchildren — had been there since yesterday. They were tired. They were ready. He was not.

Cal sat in the chair beside the bed. The same chair. The same bed. The same window with the same rain on the glass. Arthur Phelps's breathing was the way breathing is when the lungs are failing and the body is fighting and the fighting is almost done. Shallow. Rapid. The way a tide breathes when it's pulling back from the shore and the shore is holding on.

"I'm Cal," he said. "I'm a nurse here. I sit with people."

The son nodded. He was in his forties, tired-eyed, with the look of a man who had been keeping vigil for twenty-four hours and the vigil was almost over.

"Thank you," the son said.

Cal sat the way he'd sat a thousand times. Not too close. Not too far. Close enough to hold a hand if a hand needed holding. Arthur Phelps's hand was on top of the blanket. Cal did not take it. Not yet. He waited the way a nurse waits. The way a harbor waits. The way the thing itself waits for the lighting to happen.

The family filed out. The son first, then the daughter, then the grandchildren, each of them pausing at the bedside to touch Arthur's hand or forehead or shoulder, each of them saying goodbye in the way you say goodbye when you don't know if it's the last time. And then they were gone and the room was quiet and it was just Cal and Arthur Phelps and the sound of his breathing.

Cal sat. He listened. He waited.

And then he heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the thing that had broken when the first one in walked through the door.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in a dream. The way you hear music from another room. The way you hear the sea from a mile away. Not words. Not a message. Not a confession or a plea or a last request. Just a voice. A man's voice. A dying man's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

And the voice said: "The door's still open."

Cal's hand tightened on the arm of the chair. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the last thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"The door's still open," the voice said again.

And Cal understood. Not the way he used to understand — not the clear knowing that came with the gift. He understood the way you understand a dream after you wake up. The way you understand a song after it's over. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The door was still open. The door at the coast station. The door at the NE corner. The door at the crib in Portland. The door that the first one in had walked through. The door that the congregation had come home through. The door that was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the light and the light was the lamp and the lamp was lit.

The door was still open. And Arthur Phelps could hear it. Not because of the gift. Not because Cal was hearing his last words. Because the door was open. Because the door was the harbor. Because the harbor was the home. Because the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other. Because the lighting was not a cost. Because the lighting was the thing itself.

Cal leaned forward. The way a nurse leans forward when a patient is trying to say something. The way a harbor leans toward the fleet. The way the living lean toward the dead and the dead lean toward the living and the thing itself leans toward everything.

"Arthur," Cal said. "Can you hear it?"

Arthur Phelps's eyes opened. The way eyes open when the dying surface for a moment before the final descent. He looked at Cal. Not through him. Not past him. At him. The way a person looks at another person when they're seeing them for the first time and the last time all at once.

"I can hear it," Arthur said. His voice was the voice of a man whose lungs were failing and whose body was letting go and whose letting go was the thing itself. "The door. It's open. I can hear it."

"What do you hear?" Cal asked.

Arthur's breathing changed. The way breathing changes when the end is close. Slower. Deeper. The way the tide changes when the moon has passed. The way the light changes when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself changes when it's becoming something else.

"I hear the water," Arthur said. "I hear the wind. I hear the rain on the roof of a house that isn't there. I hear the light turning. I hear the lamp. I hear the harbor. I hear the home. I hear the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. I hear the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

Cal sat back in the chair. The way a nurse sits back when a patient has said the thing that needs saying. The way a harbor sits back when the fleet is home. The way the living sit back when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Arthur," Cal said. "The door's open. The harbor's open. The home's open. And you can hear it. Not because you're dying. Because the door's open. Because the harbor's home. Because the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

Arthur Phelps closed his eyes. The way eyes close when the dying are ready. The way a harbor closes when the fleet is home. The way the living close their eyes when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing himself.

"Tell them," Arthur said. "Tell my son. Tell my daughter. Tell my grandchildren. Tell them the door's open. Tell them the harbor's home. Tell them the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

"I'll tell them," Cal said.

Arthur Phelps's hand relaxed. The way a hand relaxes when it's let go of the thing it was holding on to. The way a harbor relaxes when the fleet is home. The way the living relax when the dying are done dying.

His breathing slowed. The way breathing slows when the body is ready. The way the tide slows when the moon has passed. The way the light slows when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself slows when it's becoming something else.

And then he spoke. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse. Not the thing Cal had been hearing for twelve years. Just a voice. A man's voice. A dying man's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

"The garden needs watering," Arthur Phelps said.

Cal nodded. The way a nurse nods when he's heard the last words. The way a man nods when he's been given a message to deliver. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"I'll tell them," Cal said.

Arthur Phelps's breathing stopped. The way breathing stops when the body is done. The way the tide stops when the moon has passed. The way the light stops when the sun has set. The way the thing itself stops when it's become something else.

Cal sat there. Holding the space. The way a nurse holds the space after a patient has died. The way a harbor holds the space after the fleet has come home. The way the living hold the space after the dead have spoken.

The room was quiet. The way a room is quiet after someone has died. The way a harbor is quiet after the fleet has come home. The way the world is quiet after the thing itself has happened.

He let go of the space. The way you let go of a space when the person is gone. The way you let go of a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you let go of the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

He stood. The way a nurse stands after a patient has died. The way a man stands after he's delivered a message. The way the living stand after the dead have spoken.

He walked to the door. He opened it. The family was in the hallway. They looked at him the way families look at nurses when they're waiting to hear. The way the living look at the living when the dying are done dying.

"He's gone," Cal said. "He wasn't alone. He asked me to tell you — the door's open. The harbor's home. The thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself. And the garden needs watering."

The son nodded. The daughter nodded. The grandchildren looked at him the way grandchildren look at the nurse who sat with their grandfather — with gratitude, with grief, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

The daughter went in. The son went in. The grandchildren went in. The family gathered around the bed the way families gather around the dead — with love, with sorrow, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

Cal walked down the hallway. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 5, where Mrs. Kettering had died the day before. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 2, where Mr. Huang had died two days ago. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean.

Margot was at the nurse's station. She looked up when he came down the hallway. She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Room 7," he said. "Arthur Phelps. He's gone."

Margot nodded. She opened the Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident's last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home.

She wrote: "May 26th. Tuesday. Rain holding. West wind, shifting. Room 7. Arthur Phelps. 10:14 a.m. Last words: 'The garden needs watering.'"

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

"The garden needs watering," Cal said.

Margot looked at him. "That's what he said."

"That's what he said."

"And Mrs. Dahl."

"And Mrs. Dahl."

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the Hour Book. The one who'd kept the count for twenty-two years. The one who'd watched the dying turn toward her like plants toward light. The one who knew that the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Two gardens," Margot said. "Two waterings. Two doors."

“Two doors,” Cal said.

“And the door’s still open.”

“The door’s still open.”

Margot looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“Mercer,” she said. “The gift’s not gone.”

Cal looked at her. “The gift’s not gone?”

“The gift’s not gone. The gift’s changed. You’re not hearing the last words of the dying anymore. You’re hearing the first words of the living. You’re hearing what they need said while they’re still alive. You’re hearing the garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.”

Cal closed his eyes. The way a man closes his eyes when he’s been given a thing he didn’t know he needed. The way a harbor closes its eyes when the fleet is home. The way the living close their eyes when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The gift’s changed,” he said.

“The gift’s changed,” Margot said. “You’re not the nurse who hears the last words anymore. You’re the nurse who hears the first words. The words that need saying while there’s still time to say them. The words that need hearing while there’s still time to hear them. The garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.”

Cal opened his eyes. The room was the same. The nurse’s station was the same. The Hour Book was the same. Margot was the same. But something had changed. The way a tide changes when the moon has passed. The way the light changes when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself changes when it’s becoming something else.

“The garden needs watering,” Cal said.

“The garden needs watering,” Margot said.

He walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The rain held at its slant. The west wind shifted. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's nowhere left to go because you're already there.

He walked up the grade toward the hill. Not the hill to the NE corner. The hill to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door.

She was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

The place was empty. The door was open. The lamp was lit. The harbor was empty.

"Marg."

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

"Mercer."

"I sat with a man. At Sedgebrook. He died. His last words were: 'The garden needs watering.'"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“The garden needs watering,” Margot said.

“The garden needs watering.”

“And Mrs. Dahl.”

“And Mrs. Dahl.”

“Two gardens.”

“Two gardens.”

Margot looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“Mercer,” she said. “The gift’s not gone.”

“The gift’s changed.”

“The gift’s changed. You’re not hearing the last words anymore. You’re hearing the first words. The words that need saying while there’s still time. The garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.”

Cal closed his eyes. The way a man closes his eyes when he’s been given a thing he didn’t know he needed. The way a harbor closes its eyes when the fleet is home. The way the living close their eyes when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The door’s still open,” he said.

“The door’s still open,” Margot said.

“And the garden needs watering.”

“And the garden needs watering.”

He took her hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along as “deathbed ramblings” and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“Marg,” Cal said. “The gift’s changed. I’m not hearing the last words anymore. I’m hearing the first words. The words that need saying while there’s still time. The garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone. And I’m asking — what is a nurse who hears the first words? What is a man who tends the garden before the gardener is gone? What is a harbormaster who lights the lamp before the fleet is out?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“He’s the one who keeps the garden,” Margot said. “He’s the one who tends the thing that needs tending while there’s still time to tend it. He’s the one who waters the garden before the gardener is gone. He’s the one who says the words that need saying while there’s still time to say them. He’s the one who hears the first words, not the last. He’s the one who lights the lamp before the fleet is out. He’s the one who keeps the door open. He’s the one who keeps the harbor home. He’s the one who keeps the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting’s not a cost. And the lighting’s the thing itself.”

Cal closed his eyes. The way a man closes his eyes when he’s been given the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbor closes its eyes when the fleet is home. The way the living close their eyes when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The garden needs watering,” he said.

“The garden needs watering,” Margot said.

And the west wind shifted. And the rain held at its slant. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself. And the gift had changed. And the garden needed watering. And the door was still open. And the harbor was still home. And the thing itself was still the lighting. And the lighting was still not a cost. And the lighting was still the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is.

The question is: what is a garden that needs watering?

And the answer is: the thing that tends you while there's still time.

And the thing that tends you is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the garden.

And the garden is: the home.

And the home is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the door.

And the door is: open.

And the open is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the garden needs watering.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Two —

Entry: May 28th. Thursday. Rain easing.

West wind, backing.

The rain eased Thursday the way rain eases when it's not stopping but pausing, the way a breath pauses between the inhale and the exhale, the way the tide pauses between the ebb and the flow. The west wind backed from southwest to south. The air changed. The air changed the way air changes when something has shifted in the weather of the world and the world doesn't know it yet but the body knows, the body keeps score of everything, the hip and the shoulder and the palm know before the mind does.

Cal woke in the room above the boatyard. Not the truck. The room. Cole's spare room, the one with the window that faced the water, the one that smelled like diesel and crab bait and old wood. He'd moved in three days ago. Not moved in — stayed. Not stayed — landed. The way a boat lands at a harbor. The way a fleet lands at a home.

The room was empty. The bed was narrow. The blanket was wool, the kind of wool blanket that Cole's grandmother had made, the kind that smelled like cedar and smoke and something underneath that was the smell of a house where people have lived and died and lived again. The window was open. The rain came in at an angle, the way rain comes in when the wind is backing and the window faces the water and the water is the harbor and the harbor is the home.

He got up. The way a man gets up when he's slept in a bed for the first time in months. The way a man gets up when his body has finally stopped running. His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home. The palm ached the way a palm aches after the work is done and the work is never done because the work is the thing itself and the thing itself never stops.

He went downstairs. The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II was at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the pilot has no more ships to bring in. Cole's truck was gone. Cole was at the fire hall, or the grocery store, or the diner, or somewhere in the town that had learned to count, the town that had kept its dead employed, the town that had answered the knock and the knock had been answered and the congregation had come home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

He walked to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door.

The rain had made the path muddy. The mud was the kind of mud that sticks to your boots, the kind that makes each step heavier than the last, the kind that the coast makes in May when the rain has been holding for weeks and the ground is saturated and the ground gives up and the ground becomes the sea. His boots squelched. The mud pulled at his heels. The way the past pulls at you. The way the dead pull at you. The way the thing itself pulls at you when you're walking toward it and you don't know if you're walking toward it or if it's walking toward you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the walking is the thing itself.

The hill rose before him. The grass was wet. The grass was the green of May, the green that comes after the rain, the green that is not a color but a thing that happens when the light and the water and the earth agree to make something grow. The green was the color of the garden. The garden that needed watering. The garden that Mrs. Dahl had told him about. The garden that Arthur Phelps had told him about. The garden that the gift was showing him now that the gift had changed from last words to first words, from death to life, from the ending to the beginning.

He climbed the hill. The way a man climbs a hill when he's going to meet the dead. The way a man climbs a hill when he's going to meet the living. The way a man climbs a hill when he doesn't know which is which anymore because the thing itself has happened and the living and the dead have lit each other and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself.

The coast station was there. The drowned light. The unbuilt lighthouse. The place where Walter Brandt's footings held the door. The place where the first one in had walked through. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

And the congregation was there.

Fifty-three boys. Standing in a ring around the NE stone. Standing the way the dead stand when they're keeping something. Standing the way the living stand when they're being kept. The first one in was at the center, the keystone, the threshold, the one who had walked through first, the one who had taught the leaning and the leaning had taught the silence and the silence had walked together to the post like a fleet to a lit lamp.

The first one in was at 35.0. Not dropping. Not rising. Holding. The way a keystone holds. The way a threshold holds. The way a harbor holds its fleet. The way the thing itself holds everything.

Cal walked into the ring. The way a harbormaster walks into the ring when the fleet is home. The way a nurse walks into a room when the patient is waiting. The way a man walks into a garden when the garden needs watering.

The boys didn't move. They didn't lean. They didn't press. They stood. The way the dead stand when they're at rest. The way the living stand when they're at peace. The way the thing itself stands when it's being itself.

He laid his palm on the NE stone. The dressed basalt that Walter Brandt had surveyed but never cut, that Cole Brandt had brought from the quarry, that Cal had seated into Walter's 1981 survey, that the town had warmed and the town had seeded and the town had kept at 35 under town palms when the builder's palm was gone.

The stone was warm. 37.0. The way it had been. The way the congregation kept it. The way the fifty-three paid in their tithe. The way the first one in held the center. The way the keystone held the threshold. The way the threshold held the door. The way the door held the harbor. The way the harbor held the home.

He lifted his palm. The stone held. 37.0 under no palm. The congregation kept it. The way the congregation kept the harbor. The way the congregation kept the home. The way the congregation kept the thing itself.

And then he heard it. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse of the last words. Not the changed gift of the first words. Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to change so it could be heard.

He heard the water.

Not the sea. Not the rain. Not the tide. The water that the stone drank. The water that the footings held. The water that the drowned light floated on. The water that the door opened onto. The water that the garden grew from.

He heard the water and he understood. The way you understand a dream after you wake up. The way you understand a song after it's over. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The garden wasn't a place. The garden wasn't a plot of earth with plants in it. The garden wasn't Mrs. Dahl's garden or Arthur Phelps's garden or any garden that had ever been grown in dirt and sun and rain.

The garden was the harbor. The garden was the home. The garden was the door. The garden was the threshold. The garden was the lighting. The garden was the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The garden was the thing itself.

And the garden needed watering.

Not with rain. Not with hose water. Not with the sweat of the brow and the work of the hands. The garden needed watering with attention. The garden needed watering with presence. The garden needed watering with the thing that happens when you show up and stand at the bed and hold the hand and hear the words and pass them along. The garden needed watering with the thing that happens when you show up and stand at the rim and hold the stone and feel the warmth and keep the count. The garden needed watering with the thing that happens when you show up and stand at the door and hold the hinge and keep the light and keep the harbor open.

The garden needed watering with the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

He opened his eyes. The congregation was still there. The first one in was still at the center. The stone was still at 37.0. The rain was still easing. The west wind was still backing. The garden was still there. The garden needed watering.

And he was the one who waters the garden.

Not because of the gift. Not because of the gift that changed. Not because he heard the first words now instead of the last. Because he was there. Because he showed up. Because he laid his palm on the stone and felt the warmth and kept the count and held the harbor open and kept the door lit and kept the home full even though the harbor was empty.

He was the one who waters the garden. The way a nurse waters the garden by sitting with the dying. The way a harbormaster waters the garden by standing at the rim. The way a keeper waters the garden by holding the hinge. The way the living water the garden by showing up for the dead and the dead water the garden by coming home and the thing itself waters the garden by being the garden and the garden is the thing itself.

He walked back down the hill. The mud pulled at his heels. The rain wet his face. The west wind backed from southwest to south. The air changed. The air changed the way air changes when the garden has been watered and the thing itself has happened and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself.

Margot was at the nurse's station. Not the Margot who kept the coast station — she was still at the drowned light, still holding the hinge, still keeping the door. A different Margot. Margot Voss, the night aide, the one who'd kept the Hour Book for twenty-two years. She was starting her shift. She looked up when he came in.

"Mercer."

"Margot."

"You look different."

"I am different."

She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"The garden," she said.

"The garden."

"It needs watering."

"It's being watered."

She nodded. She opened the Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident's last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home. The book that had kept the count before the gift changed from last words to first words, from death to life, from the ending to the beginning.

She wrote: "May 28th. Thursday. Rain easing. West wind, backing. Cal Mercer returned to Sedgebrook. The garden has been watered. The stone holds at 77.0 under no palm. The congregation keeps the harbor. The keeper keeps the hinge. The gift has changed. The gift is the thing itself."

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

“Mercer,” she said. “What does a nurse do when the garden needs watering?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“He sits with the dying,” Cal said. “He sits with the living. He sits with the thing that needs sitting with. He shows up. He holds the hand. He hears the words. He passes them along. He waters the garden. He keeps the count. He keeps the harbor open. He keeps the door lit. He keeps the home full. He keeps the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself.”

“And what does the nurse hear?”

“The first words. The words that need saying while there’s still time. The garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone. The fleet that needs bringing home before the lamp goes out. The door that needs opening before the congregation arrives. The thing that needs tending before the tending is too late. The thing itself.”

Margot looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” he said.

He walked down the hallway. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago while Margot was on shift two doors away. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009 and asked if somebody would keep her light. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008 and asked if somebody would tell his daughter he forgave her. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 7, where Mrs. Dahl had died and where Arthur Phelps had died and where the gift had changed.

Room 7. The door was closed. He knocked. A voice said come in.

The room was occupied. A woman. Seventy-something. End-stage renal failure. Her family — a daughter, a son-in-law, two teenage grandchildren — had been there since yesterday. They looked up when Cal came in. They looked the way families look when they've been keeping vigil for twenty-four hours and the vigil is almost over and they're not sure if they're ready.

"I'm Cal," he said. "I'm a nurse here. I sit with people."

The daughter nodded. The son-in-law nodded. The grandchildren looked at him the way grandchildren look at the nurse who sits with people — with hope, with fear, with the unspoken question: will you stay? Will you be here when it happens? Will you hold her hand so she's not alone?

"I can stay for a while," Cal said. "If you'd like to get some rest."

The daughter looked at the son-in-law. The son-in-law looked at the unspoken conversation of a family that has been making decisions together for seventy-something years. Then the daughter nodded.

"Thank you," she said.

They filed out. The daughter first, then the son-in-law, then the grandchildren, each of them pausing at the bedside to touch the woman's hand or forehead or shoulder, each of them saying goodbye in the way you say goodbye when you don't know if it's the last time. And then they were gone and the room was quiet and it was just Cal and the woman and the sound of her breathing.

He sat in the chair beside the bed. The chair was the same chair that had been beside every bed at Sedgebrook for thirty years — a wooden chair with a cushion that had been washed so many times the color had become the thing itself. He sat the way he'd sat in this chair a thousand times — not too close, not too far, close enough to hold a hand if a hand needed holding.

The woman's breathing was shallow. The way breathing is shallow when the kidneys are failing and the body is letting go and the letting go is the thing itself. Her face was the face of a woman who had lived seventy-something years and raised children and buried a husband and kept a garden and done all the things that people do in seventy-something years and now was doing the last thing — dying.

He took her hand. The way a nurse takes a patient's hand. The way a man takes a woman's hand when the woman is dying and the man is the only one there. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. Not the cold of the sea. The cold of a body that is letting go of its warmth the way a harbor lets go of its fleet.

And then he heard it. The changed gift. The first words. The words that need saying while there's still time. The garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in a dream. The way you hear music from another room. The way you hear the sea from a mile away. Not words. Not a message. Not a confession or a plea or a last request. Just a voice. A woman's voice. A dying woman's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

And the voice said: "The garden needs weeding."

Cal's hand tightened on hers. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"The garden needs weeding," he said.

The woman's eyes opened. The way eyes open when the dying surface for a moment before the final descent. She looked at him. Not through him. Not past him. At him. The way a person looks at another person when they're seeing them for the first time and the last time all at once.

"You heard me," she said.

"I heard you."

"Nobody hears me. They hear the machines. They hear the monitors. They hear the breathing. They don't hear me."

"I hear you."

“The garden needs weeding. The tomatoes are staking. The zucchini is blooming. The roses need deadheading. The lettuce is bolting. The beans need picking. The corn is tasseling. The potatoes need hilling. The carrots need thinning. The onions are ready. The garden needs weeding. The garden needs tending. The garden needs someone to show up and do the work while there’s still time.”

“The garden needs weeding,” Cal said.

“Will you tell them?”

“I’ll tell them.”

“Will you tell them the garden needs weeding? Will you tell them the tomatoes are staking? Will you tell them the zucchini is blooming? Will you tell them the roses need deadheading? Will you tell them the lettuce is bolting? Will you tell them the beans need picking? Will you tell them the corn is tasseling? Will you tell them the potatoes need hilling? Will you tell them the carrots need thinning? Will you tell them the onions are ready? Will you tell them the garden needs weeding?”

“I’ll tell them,” Cal said. “I’ll tell them the garden needs weeding.”

Her hand relaxed. The way a hand relaxes when it’s let go of the thing it was holding on to. The way a harbor relaxes when the fleet is home. The way the living relax when the dying are done dying.

Her breathing slowed. The way breathing slows when the body is ready. The way the tide slows when the moon has passed. The way the light slows when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself slows when it’s becoming something else.

And then she spoke. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse. Not the first words that need saying while there’s still time. Just a voice. A woman’s voice. A dying woman’s voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

“Tell them the garden needs weeding,” she said. “And tell them the thing itself is the weeding. And the weeding is not a cost. And the weeding is the thing itself.”

Cal nodded. The way a nurse nods when he’s heard the last words. The way a man nods when he’s been given a message to deliver. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“I’ll tell them,” he said.

Her breathing stopped. The way breathing stops when the body is done. The way the tide stops when the moon has passed. The way the light stops when the sun has set. The way the thing itself stops when it've become something else.

Cal sat there. Holding her hand. The way a nurse holds a patient's hand after the patient has died. The way a man holds a woman's hand after the woman has died. The way the living hold on to the dead after the dead have let go.

The room was quiet. The way a room is quiet after someone has died. The way a harbor is quiet after the fleet has come home. The way the world is quiet after the thing itself has happened.

He let go of her hand. The way you let go of a hand when the person is gone. The way you let go of a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you let go of the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

He stood. The way a nurse stands after a patient has died. The way a man stands after he's delivered a message. The way the living stand after the dead have spoken.

He walked to the door. He opened it. The family was in the hallway. They looked at him the way families look at nurses when they're waiting to hear. The way the living look at the living when the dying are done dying.

"She's gone," he said. "She wasn't alone. She asked me to tell you — the garden needs weeding. The tomatoes are staking. The zucchini is blooming. The roses need deadheading. The lettuce is bolting. The beans need picking. The corn is tasseling. The potatoes need hilling. The carrots need thinning. The onions are ready."

The daughter nodded. The son-in-law nodded. The grandchildren looked at him the way grandchildren look at the nurse who sat with their grandmother — with gratitude, with grief, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

"The daughter went in. The son-in-law went in. The grandchildren went in. The family gathered around the bed the way families gather around the dead — with love, with sorrow, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

Cal walked down the hallway. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean.

Margot was at the nurse's station. She looked up when he came down the hallway. She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years.

"Room 7," he said. "She's gone. The garden needs weeding."

Margot nodded. She opened the Hour Book. She wrote: "May 28th. Thursday. Rain easing. West wind, backing. Room 7. The garden needs weeding. The tomatoes are staking. The zucchini is blooming. The roses need deadheading. The lettuce is bolting. The beans need picking. The corn is tasseling. The potatoes need hilling. The carrots need thinning. The onions are ready."

She closed the book.

"The garden needs weeding," Cal said.

"The garden needs weeding," Margot said.

"And the thing itself is the weeding. And the weeding is not a cost. And the weeding is the thing itself."

Margot looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Mercer," she said. "The gift's not just changed. The gift's grown. You're not hearing the first words of the dying. You're hearing the first words of the living. The words that need saying while there's still time. The garden that needs weeding before the gardener is gone. The work that needs doing while there's still time to do it. The thing itself."

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The thing itself," he said.

"The thing itself," she said.

He walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The rain had eased. The west wind had backed. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's somewhere to go because you're not there yet.

He walked up the grade toward the hill. Not the hill to the NE corner. The hill to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door. The place where the garden was. The place where the thing itself happened.

She was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

The place was not empty. The place was full. The congregation was there. Fifty-three boys in a ring around the NE stone. The first one in at the center. The stone at 77.0 under no palm. The harbor kept. The home kept. The thing itself kept.

"Marg."

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

"Mercer."

"I sat with a woman. At Sedgebrook. She died. Her last words were: 'The garden needs weeding.'"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“The garden needs weeding,” Margot said.

“The garden needs weeding.”

“The thing itself is the weeding.”

“The thing itself is the weeding.”

She held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out a hand to a harbormaster. The way the dead hold out their hands to the living. The way the living hold out their hands to the dead. The way the thing itself happens when the living and the dead light each other.

He took her hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now hears the first words and waters the garden and weeds the garden and tends the garden and keeps the thing itself.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“Marg,” Cal said. “The garden needs weeding. And I’m asking — what is a garden that’s being weeded? What is a harbor that’s being kept? What is a thing that’s being tended?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“It’s the thing itself,” Margot said. “It’s the thing that tends you while there’s still time. It’s the thing that weeds you while you’re growing. It’s the thing that waters you while you’re blooming. It’s the thing that harvests you while you’re ripe. It’s the thing that saves you while you’re seeding. It’s the thing that plants you while you’re dying. It’s the thing that grows you while you’re being. It’s the thing itself.”

“And the thing itself is?”

“The lighting.”

“And the lighting is?”

“Not a cost.”

“And the lighting is?”

“The thing itself.”

And the west wind backed. And the rain eased. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the garden was being weeded. And the thing itself was the weeding. And the weeding was not a cost. And the weeding was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself. And the gift had grown. And the garden needed weeding. And the door was still open. And the harbor was still home. And the thing itself was still the lighting. And the lighting was still not a cost. And the lighting was still the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is. The question was not what a garden that needs watering is.

The question is: what is a garden that’s being weeded?

And the answer is: the thing that tends you while there’s still time.

And the thing that tends you is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the garden.

And the garden is: the home.

And the home is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the door.

And the door is: open.

And the open is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the garden needs weeding.

And the weeding is: not a cost.

And the weeding is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Three — Entry: May 29th. Friday. Rain returning. West wind, veering.

The rain returned Friday the way rain returns when it has only been pretending to stop — not a storm, not a breaking, just the gray resumption of what was always there, the way breath resumes after the pause, the way the tide resumes after the slack, the way the thing itself resumes after the harvesting and the harvesting resumes after the weeding and the weeding resumes after the watering and the watering resumes after the showing up.

Cal had slept in the room above the boatyard again. Not the truck. The room. The room with the window that faced the water, the room that smelled like diesel and crab bait and old wood, the room where Cole Brandt's grandmother had woven the wool blanket that covered him, the blanket that smelled like cedar and smoke and something underneath that was the smell of a house where people have lived and died and lived again.

He woke before dawn. The way a man wakes before dawn when his body has learned to keep the count the way the town kept the count, the way the footings kept the count, the way the Hour Book kept the count. The body kept score of everything. The hip ached. The shoulder ached. The palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and weeded the garden and watered the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and tended the garden and the tending was not a cost and the tending was the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when he's slept in a bed for the first time in months and the bed has become his bed and the room has become his room and the boatyard has become his harbor. The window was closed. The rain tapped against it the way rain taps against a window when the wind is veering and the glass is cold and the room is warm and the warmth is the thing itself.

He went downstairs. The boatyard was dark. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the pilot has no more ships to bring in and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty. Cole's truck was there. Cole was asleep in the room above the boatyard, the other room, the one that faced the hill.

Cal walked to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door.

The rain had made the path muddy. The mud was the kind of mud that sticks to your boots, the kind that makes each step heavier than the last, the kind that the coast makes in May when the rain has been holding for weeks and the ground is saturated and the ground gives up and the ground becomes the sea. His boots squelched. The mud pulled at his heels. The way the past pulls at you. The way the dead pull at you. The way the living pull at you when you're walking toward them.

The hill rose before him. The grass was wet. The grass was the green of May, the green that comes after the rain, the green that is not a color but a thing that happens when the light and the water and the earth agree to make something grow. The green was the color of the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that needed tending.

He climbed the hill. The way a man climbs a hill when he's going to meet the dead. The way a man climbs a hill when he's going to meet the living. The way a man climbs a hill when he doesn't know which is which anymore because the thing itself has happened and the living and the dead have lit each other and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself.

The coast station was there. The drowned light. The unbuilt lighthouse. The place where Walter Brandt's footings held the door. The place where the first one in had walked through. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

And the congregation was gone. The fifty-three boys had walked through. The first one in was home. The second was home. The third through the fifty-third were home. The fleet was home. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit.

Margot was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

“Marg.”

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

“Mercer.”

“The garden’s been weeded.”

“The garden’s been weeded.”

“And the garden’s been watered.”

“And the garden’s been watered.”

“And the garden’s been planted.”

“And the garden’s been planted.”

He walked to her. The way a harbormaster walks to the keeper when the fleet is home. The way the living walk to the dead when the dead have come home. The way the thing itself walks toward itself when it’s ready to become what it’s been becoming all along.

“What is a garden that’s been weeded?” he asked. “What is a garden that’s been watered? What is a garden that’s been planted?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“It needs tending,” she said.

“It needs tending.”

“It needs someone to show up and do the work. Not the watering. Not the weeding. Not the planting. The tending. The thing you do after the watering and the weeding and the planting. The thing you do while the garden grows. The thing you do while the garden is becoming what it’s going to become. The thing itself.”

“The tending.”

“The tending.”

He held out his hand. The way a harbormaster holds out a hand to a keeper. The way the living hold out their hands to the dead. The way the thing itself holds out its hand to itself.

She took his hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now hears the first words and tends the garden and the tending is not a cost and the tending is the thing itself.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“The tending,” Cal said.

“The tending,” Margot said.

“The thing itself.”

“The thing itself.”

They stood there, the keeper and the harbormaster, the dead and the living, the hinge and the road, the coast and the post, the door and the lamp. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the garden needed tending. And the tending was not a cost. And the tending was the thing itself.

The rain returned. The west wind veered. The road ran both ways. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The garden needed tending. The tending was not a cost. The tending was the thing itself.

Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself. And the garden needed tending. And the tending was not a cost. And the tending was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is. The question was not what a garden that needs watering is. The question was not what a garden that needs weeding is.

The question is: what is a garden that needs tending?

And the answer is: the thing that tends you while it's growing.

And the thing that tends you is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the tending.

And the tending is: not a cost.

And the tending is: the thing itself.

And the garden needs tending.

And the tending is: not a cost.

And the tending is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Four —

Entry: June 1st. Monday. Rain breaking.

West wind, easing.

The rain broke Monday the way rain breaks when it has been holding for weeks and the holding has become its own weather and the weather has become its own season and the season has become its own year — not a storm, not a flood, just the quiet giving way of one thing to another, the way the tide gives way to the shore, the way the shore gives way to the sea, the way the sea gives way to the sky, the way the sky gives way to the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

Cal woke in the room above the boatyard. Not the truck. The room. The room that had become his room. The window was open. The rain came in at an angle, the way rain comes in when the wind is easing and the window faces the water and the water is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the rain has broken and the breaking is the thing itself. His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and kept the thing itself.

He went downstairs. The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the pilot has no more ships to bring in and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full.

Cole's truck was there. Cole was in the workshop, the way Cole was always in the workshop — building, repairing, keeping the things that needed keeping. Cal could hear the sound of a plane on wood. The sound of a man doing the work that needed doing. The sound of the thing itself.

He walked to the garden.

Not the metaphor. Not the harbor. Not the door. The garden. The plot of earth behind the boatyard where the soil was dark and rich and the rain had been falling for weeks and the weeds had been growing and the thing itself had been happening in the dirt and the roots and the green.

Mrs. Dahl's garden. The one she had kept for sixty years. The one she had tended the way Cal tended the harbor — with attention, with presence, with the thing that happens when you show up and stand at the bed and hold the hand and hear the words and pass them along. The garden that needed watering. The garden that needed weeding. The garden that needed tending.

He'd been coming here every day since she died. Every day for a week. Not because the garden needed him — the garden needed whoever showed up. Because he needed the garden. Because the thing that happens when you put your hands in the dirt and pull the weeds and water the roots and watch the green grow is the thing itself. Because the lighting is not a cost. Because the tending is the thing itself.

He knelt in the dirt. The way a man kneels when he's going to do the work. The way a nurse kneels when he's going to sit with the dying. The way a harbormaster kneels when he's going to hold the hinge. The way the living kneel when they're going to tend the thing that needs tending.

The soil was dark. The soil was rich. The soil was the kind of soil that the coast makes when the rain has been falling for weeks and the ground is saturated and the ground gives up and the ground becomes the sea and the sea becomes the soil and the soil becomes the thing itself.

He pulled a weed. The way you pull a weed when the weed is growing where the weed shouldn't be growing. The way you pull a thing that doesn't belong so the thing that does belong can grow. The way the harbor pulls the fleet home so the home can be full. The way the keeper pulls the hinge so the door can open. The way the thing itself pulls the living and the dead together so the lighting can happen.

The weed came up easy. The root was long and white and the root was the thing that held the weed in place and the root was the thing that fed the weed and the root was the thing that needed pulling so the tomatoes could grow and the zucchini could bloom and the roses could be deadheaded and the lettuce could stop bolting and the beans could be picked and the corn could tassel and the potatoes could be hilled and the carrots could be thinned and the onions could be ready.

He pulled another weed. And another. And another. The way you pull weeds when the garden needs weeding. The way you do the work when the work needs doing. The way you tend the thing that needs tending while there's still time.

And then he heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the changed gift that let him hear the first words of the living. Not the grown gift that let him hear the garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in a dream. The way you hear music from another room. The way you hear the sea from a mile away. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you don't know if you're hearing it or if it's hearing you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the hearing is the thing itself.

And the voice said: "The garden's been planted."

Cal's hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they've been given a thing they didn't know they were waiting for. The way a harbor stops when the fleet is home. The way the living stop when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The garden's been planted," the voice said again.

And Cal understood. Not the way he used to understand — not the clear knowing that came with the gift. He understood the way you understand a dream after you wake up. The way you understand a song after it's over. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The garden had been planted. The seeds had been put in the earth. The seeds had been covered with soil. The seeds had been watered. The seeds had been given the thing that seeds need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself.

And the garden was growing. Not because of the watering. Not because of the weeding. Not because of the tending. Because of the planting. Because someone had shown up and put the seeds in the earth and covered them with soil and given them the thing they needed to grow.

And the planting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself.

He stood. The way a man stands when he's been given a thing he didn't know he needed. The way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is home. The way the living stand when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing himself.

He walked back to the boatyard. The rain had broken. The west wind had eased. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's somewhere to go because you're not there yet.

Cole was in the workshop. He looked up when Cal came in. He looked at him the way Cole had looked at him for months — the look that said he knew Cal had built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home. The look that said he knew the thing itself had happened and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

"Cole," Cal said. "The garden's been planted."

Cole nodded. The way a man nods when he's been told a thing he already knew. The way a harbor nods when the fleet is home. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Mrs. Dahl planted it," Cole said. "Sixty years ago. Every year. Same plot. Same seeds. Same hands."

"And now?"

"And now it's your garden."

Cal looked at him. The way a man looks at a man who has given him a thing he didn't know he needed. The way a harbor master looks at the man who built the boat. The way the living look at the living when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"My garden," Cal said.

"Your garden. The thing that happens when you show up and put your hands in the dirt and pull the weeds and water the roots and watch the green grow. The thing itself."

Cal nodded. The way a man nods when he's been given the answer to a question he didn't know he was asking. The way a harbor nods when the fleet is home. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The thing itself," he said.

He walked to Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The rain had broken. The west wind had eased. The road ran both ways under his feet.

The hallway smelled the way Sedgebrook always smelled — lavender and bleach and something underneath that was neither, something that was the smell of a house where people come to die. The floorboards creaked under his feet. The walls were the color of old ivory. The light was the color of old ivory. Everything was the color of the thing itself.

Margot was at the nurse's station. Not the Margot who kept the coast station — she was still at the drowned light, still holding the hinge, still keeping the door. A different Margot. Margot Voss, the night aide, the one who'd kept the Hour Book for twenty-two years. She was starting her shift. She looked up when he came in.

"Mercer."

"Margot."

"You look different."

"I am different."

She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"The garden," she said.

"The garden."

"It's been planted."

"It's been planted."

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the Hour Book. The one who'd kept the count for twenty-two years. The one who'd watched the dying turn toward her like plants toward light. The one who knew that the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Mercer," she said. "The gift's not just changed. The gift's not just grown. The gift's become what it was always becoming."

Cal looked at her. "What was it always becoming?"

"The thing that happens when you show up and put your hands in the dirt and pull the weeds and water the roots and watch the green grow. The thing that happens when you show up and stand at the bed and hold the hand and hear the words and pass them along. The thing that happens when you show up and stand at the rim and hold the stone and feel the warmth and keep the count. The thing that happens when you show up and stand at the door and hold the hinge and keep the light and keep the harbor open.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself,” Margot said.

She opened the Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident’s last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home. The book that had kept the count before the gift changed from last words to first words, from death to life, from the ending to the beginning, from the watering to the weeding to the tending to the planting.

She wrote: “June 1st. Monday. Rain breaking. West wind, easing. Cal Mercer returned to Sedgebrook. The garden has been planted. The gift has become what it was always becoming. The gift is the thing itself.”

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

“Mercer,” she said. “What does a nurse do when the garden’s been planted?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“He watches it grow,” Cal said. “He tends it while it’s becoming what it’s becoming. He shows up. He puts his hands in the dirt. He pulls the weeds. He waters the roots. He watches the green grow. He plants the seeds. He covers them with soil. He gives them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself.”

“And what does the nurse hear?”

“The thing that needs saying while there’s still time. The garden that needs planting before the planter is gone. The seeds that need covering before the season is over. The roots that need watering before the rain stops. The green that needs watching before the watching is too late. The thing that needs tending before the tending is done. The thing itself.”

Margot looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"The thing itself," she said.

"The thing itself," he said.

He walked down the hallway. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago while Margot was on shift two doors away. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009 and asked if somebody would keep her light. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008 and asked if somebody would tell his daughter he forgave her. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 7, where Mrs. Dahl had died and Arthur Phelps had died and the woman who said the garden needs weeding had died and the garden had been planted and the gift had become what it was always becoming.

He stopped at Room 7. The door was open. The bed was empty. The sheets were clean. The room was waiting the way a room waits when the next person is coming. The way a harbor waits when the fleet is out. The way a garden waits when the seeds are planted. The way the thing itself waits for the lighting to happen.

He went in. He sat in the chair beside the bed. The same chair that had been beside every bed at Sedgebrook for thirty years. The wooden chair with the cushion that had been washed so many times the color had become the thing itself.

He waited. The way a nurse waits. The way a harbor waits. The way a garden waits. The way the thing itself waits for the lighting to happen.

And then the door opened. A woman came in. Seventy-something. End-stage heart failure. Her daughter was with her. The daughter looked at Cal the way daughters look at nurses when they're leaving their mother in someone else's care — with hope, with fear, with the unspoken question: will you stay? Will you be here when it happens? Will you hold her hand so she's not alone?

"I'm Cal," he said. "I'm a nurse here. I sit with people."

The daughter nodded. "Thank you."

She kissed her mother's forehead. She squeezed her mother's hand. She walked to the door. She paused. She looked back. The unspoken conversation of a mother and daughter who have been making decisions together for seventy-something years.

"I'll be back in the morning," the daughter said.

The mother nodded. "I know."

And then the daughter was gone and the room was quiet and it was just Cal and the woman and the sound of her breathing and the rain breaking outside and the west wind easing and the road running both ways and the garden growing and the thing itself happening.

He took her hand. The way a nurse takes a patient's hand. The way a man takes a woman's hand when the woman is dying and the man is the only one there. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. Not the cold of the sea. The cold of a body that is letting go of its warmth the way a harbor lets go of its fleet.

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the silence.

Not the silence of an empty room. Not the silence of a room after someone has died. Not the silence of a harbor after the fleet has come home. Not the silence of a garden after the seeds have been planted.

The silence of a room before someone has spoken. The silence of a harbor before the fleet has arrived. The silence of a garden before the seeds have been planted. The silence of the thing itself before the lighting has happened.

The silence that is not the absence of sound. The silence that is the presence of everything. The silence that is the thing itself waiting to become the thing itself.

And in the silence, he heard the woman's voice. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse. Not the thing he'd been hearing for twelve years. Not the changed thing. Not the grown thing. Not the become thing.

Just a voice. A woman's voice. A dying woman's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

And the voice said: "The garden's been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. The soil is the thing that holds the seeds and the seeds are the thing that becomes the garden and the garden is the thing that feeds the people and the people are the thing that tend the garden and the tending is the thing itself."

Cal's hand tightened on hers. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"The garden's been planted," he said.

"The garden's been planted," she said.

"And now?"

"And now we watch it grow."

Her hand relaxed. The way a hand relaxes when it's let go of the thing it was holding on to. The way a harbor relaxes when the fleet is home. The way the living relax when the dying are done dying.

Her breathing slowed. The way breathing slows when the body is ready. The way the tide slows when the moon has passed. The way the light slows when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself slows when it's becoming something else.

And then she spoke. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse. Not the thing Cal had been hearing for twelve years. Not the changed thing. Not the grown thing. Not the become thing. Just a voice. A woman's voice. A dying woman's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

"Tell my daughter the garden's been planted," she said. "Tell her the seeds are in the earth. Tell her the soil is dark. Tell her the soil is rich. Tell her to watch it grow. Tell her to tend it while it's becoming what it's becoming. Tell her to show up. Tell her to put her hands in the dirt. Tell her to pull the weeds. Tell her to water the roots. Tell her to watch the green grow. Tell her the thing itself is the growing. And the growing is not a cost. And the growing is the thing itself."

Cal nodded. The way a nurse nods when he's heard the last words. The way a man nods when he's been given a message to deliver. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“I’ll tell her,” he said.

Her breathing stopped. The way breathing stops when the body is done. The way the tide stops when the moon has passed. The way the light stops when the sun has set. The way the thing itself stops when it’s become something else.

Cal sat there. Holding her hand. The way a nurse holds a patient’s hand after the patient has died. The way a man holds a woman’s hand after the woman has died. The way the living hold on to the dead after the dead have let go.

The room was quiet. The way a room is quiet after someone has died. The way a harbor is quiet after the fleet has come home. The way a garden is quiet after the seeds have been planted. The way the world is quiet after the thing itself has happened.

He let go of her hand. The way you let go of a hand when the person is gone. The way you let go of a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you let go of the garden when the seeds are planted. The way you let go of the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

He stood. The way a nurse stands after a patient has died. The way a man stands after he’s delivered a message. The way the living stand after the dead have spoken.

He walked to the door. He opened it. The daughter was in the hallway. She looked at him the way daughters look at nurses when they’re waiting to hear. The way the living look at the living when the dying are done dying.

“She’s gone,” he said. “She wasn’t alone. She asked me to tell you — the garden’s been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. She said to watch it grow. She said to tend it while it’s becoming what it’s becoming. She said to show up. She said to put your hands in the dirt. She said to pull the weeds. She said to water the roots. She said to watch the green grow. She said the thing itself is the growing. And the growing is not a cost. And the growing is the thing itself.”

The daughter nodded. The way a daughter nods when she’s been given her mother’s last words. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Thank you,” she said.

She went in. She sat in the chair beside the bed. She took her mother's hand. She held it the way daughters hold their mothers' hands — with love, with sorrow, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

Cal walked down the hallway. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean.

Margot was at the nurse's station. She looked up when he came down the hallway. She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years.

"Room 7," he said. "She's gone. The garden's been planted."

Margot nodded. She opened the Hour Book. She wrote: "June 1st. Monday. Rain breaking. West wind, easing. Room 7. The garden's been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. Watch it grow."

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the garden when the seeds are planted. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

"Mercer," she said. "The gift's become what it was always becoming."

Cal looked at her. "What was it always becoming?"

"The thing that happens when you show up. The thing that happens when you put your hands in the dirt. The thing that happens when you pull the weeds. The thing that happens when you water the roots. The thing that happens when you watch the green grow. The thing that happens when you plant the seeds. The thing that happens when you cover them with soil. The thing that happens when you give them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself."

"The thing itself," Cal said.

"The thing itself," Margot said.

He walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The rain had broken. The west wind had eased. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's somewhere to go because you're not there yet.

He walked up the grade toward the hill. Not the hill to the NE corner. The hill to the coast station. The drowned light. The hinge. The place where Margot kept the door. The place where the garden was. The place where the thing itself happened.

She was there. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the center of the drowned light. The place where the first one in had been. The place where the keystone had been. The place where the hearth had been. The place where the lamp had been. The place where the threshold had been. The place where the door had been.

The place was not empty. The place was full. The garden was there. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that was growing. The garden that was becoming what it was becoming. The garden that was the thing itself.

"Marg."

She turned. Her face was the face of a woman who had kept a door open for nine years. The face of a woman who had died and come back and kept the hinge and held the light and watched the fleet come home. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the coast station and the keeper of the door and the keeper of the thing itself.

"Mercer."

"I sat with a woman. At Sedgebrook. She died. Her last words were: 'The garden's been planted.'"

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“The garden’s been planted,” Margot said.

“The garden’s been planted.”

“And now we watch it grow.”

“And now we watch it grow.”

She held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out a hand to a harbormaster. The way the dead hold out their hands to the living. The way the living hold out their hands to the dead. The way the thing itself holds out its hand to itself.

He took her hand. Her hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. The cold of the sea. The cold of the drowned light. The cold of the coast station. The cold of the keeper who holds the hinge.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now hears the silence and tends the garden and plants the seeds and watches them grow and keeps the thing itself.

And the cold and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“Marg,” Cal said. “The garden’s been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. And I’m asking — what is a garden that’s growing? What is a harbor that’s empty? What is a thing that’s becoming?”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“It’s the thing itself,” Margot said. “It’s the thing that grows you while you’re growing it. It’s the thing that tends you while you’re tending it. It’s the thing that plants you while you’re planting it. It’s the thing that watches you while you’re watching it. It’s the thing itself.”

“And the thing itself is?”

“The lighting.”

“And the lighting is?”

“Not a cost.”

“And the lighting is?”

“The thing itself.”

“And the thing itself is?”

“The growing.”

“And the growing is?”

“Not a cost.”

“And the growing is?”

“The thing itself.”

And the west wind eased. And the rain broke. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the garden was growing. And the thing itself was the growing. And the growing was not a cost. And the growing was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the coast station with Margot Voss, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the thing itself. And the gift had become what it was always becoming. And the garden was growing. And the door was still open. And the harbor was still home. And the thing itself was still the lighting. And the lighting was still not a cost. And the lighting was still the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is. The question was not what a garden that needs watering is. The question was not what a garden that needs weeding is. The question was not what a garden that needs tending is. The question was not what a garden that needs planting is.

The question is: what is a garden that's growing?

And the answer is: the thing that grows you while you're growing it.

And the thing that grows you is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the growing.

And the growing is: not a cost.

And the growing is: the thing itself.

And the garden is growing.

And the growing is: not a cost.

And the growing is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Five — Entry: June 2nd. Tuesday. Sun breaking through. West wind, gone calm.

The sun broke through Tuesday the way the sun breaks through when the rain has been holding for weeks and the holding has become its own season and the season has become its own year and the year has become its own life — not a blaze, not a burning, just the quiet return of the thing that was always there behind the clouds, the way the thing itself is always there behind the living and the dead, behind the garden and the harbor, behind the door and the lamp, behind the rain and the sun.

Cal woke in the room above the boatyard. The sun came through the window at an angle, the way sun comes through a window when the window faces the water and the water is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty. The light was the color of old ivory. The light was the color of the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the sun has returned and the returning is the thing itself. His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and watched the garden grow.

He went downstairs. The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit. Cole's truck was there. Cole was in the workshop, the way Cole was always in the workshop — building, repairing, keeping the things that needed keeping.

Cal walked to the garden.

Not the metaphor. Not the harbor. Not the door. The garden. Mrs. Dahl's garden. The plot of earth behind the boatyard where the soil was dark and rich and the sun was breaking through for the first time in weeks and the green was growing and the thing itself was happening in the dirt and the roots and the green.

He knelt in the dirt. The way a man kneels when he's going to do the work. The soil was damp from weeks of rain. The sun was warm on his back. The way the sun is warm when it returns after a long absence. The way the thing itself is warm when it returns after a long absence.

He pulled a weed. The weed came up easy. The root was long and white. He pulled another weed. And another. The way you pull weeds when the garden needs weeding. The way you do the work when the work needs doing.

And then he heard the footsteps.

Not the way he used to hear footsteps — not the clear inner voice, not the gift/curse, not the thing that had broken and changed and grown. Just footsteps. On the path. On the gravel. On the earth that led to the garden.

He looked up.

A woman stood at the edge of the garden. Seventy-something. Thin. The kind of thin that comes from age, not from illness. She wore a green cardigan and a long skirt and boots that had been worn for years and had the look of boots that would be worn for years more. Her hair was white. Her face was the face of a woman who had lived seventy-something years and had done the things that people do in seventy-something years and had come to the garden to do one more thing.

She looked at him. Not through him. Not past him. At him. The way a person looks at another person when they're seeing them for the first time and the last time all at once.

"You're Cal," she said. Not a question. A statement. The way you state a thing you know to be true.

"I am."

"You sat with my sister."

Cal stood. The way a man stands when he's been given a thing he didn't know he was waiting for. "Your sister."

"Mrs. Dahl. She was my sister."

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has given him a thing he didn't know he needed. "I didn't know she had a sister."

“She has a sister. Had. Has. The tenses get confusing when someone’s gone.” She walked into the garden. The way you walk into a garden when you’ve come to see what’s growing. “I’m Ingrid. Ingrid Dahl-Morrison. Ruth was my older sister by six years. She talked about you.”

“She talked about me?”

“She wrote me letters. Every week. For sixty years. She wrote me letters about the garden. About the town. About the hospice. About the nurse who sits with people.” Ingrid knelt in the dirt. The way a woman kneels when she’s going to do the work. “She wrote me about you in her last letter. She said: ‘There’s a nurse here who hears things. Not the machines. Not the monitors. Not the breathing. He hears the words that need saying while there’s still time to say them.’”

Cal’s hand tightened on the weed he was holding. The way a hand tightens when it’s holding on to the thing it can hold on to. “She said that.”

“She said that. And I came.”

“You came.”

“I came to see the garden. I came to see the nurse. I came to see the place where my sister died.” Ingrid pulled a weed. The way you pull a weed when the garden needs weeding. “I came to tell you something.”

Cal knelt beside her. The way a nurse kneels when a patient is trying to say something. The way a harbormaster kneels when the keeper is trying to say something. The way the living kneel when the living are trying to say something.

“What do you need to tell me?” Cal asked.

Ingrid’s hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they’ve been given a thing they didn’t know they were waiting for. “I’m not dying.”

“I didn’t think you were.”

“Then why did you ask what I need to tell you?”

“Because you said you came to tell me something. And the thing you came to tell me is the thing you need to say while there’s still time.”

Ingrid looked at him. The way a person looks at another person when they’re seeing them for the first time and the last time all at once. “Ruth said you hear things.”

“I hear things.”

“What do you hear?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept a garden for sixty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has written letters for sixty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has come to the garden to say the thing that needs saying while there's still time.

“I hear the words that need saying while there's still time to say them,” Cal said. “Not the last words of the dying. The first words of the living. The words that need saying before the saying is too late.”

Ingrid's silence was the listening silence. The silence of a woman who had kept a garden for sixty years. The silence of a woman who had written letters for sixty years. The silence of a woman who had come to the garden to say the thing that needs saying while there's still time.

“I need to tell you about the garden,” Ingrid said.

“Tell me about the garden.”

“Ruth kept this garden for sixty years. Every year. Same plot. Same seeds. Same hands. She planted in May. She watered in June. She weeded in July. She tended in August. She harvested in September. She saved the seeds in October. She let the garden rest in November. She planned the next garden in December. She ordered the seeds in January. She started the seeds indoors in February. She prepared the soil in March. She waited for the rain to break in April. She planted in May. And then she did it again.”

“The garden,” Cal said.

“The garden. The thing she did every year for sixty years. The thing that was hers. The thing that was her life. The thing that was the thing itself.” Ingrid pulled another weed. “And in her last letter — the letter that came three days before she died — she wrote: ‘The garden's been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. And I won't be here to watch it grow.’”

Cal's hand tightened on the dirt. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to.

“She knew,” Ingrid said. “She knew she wouldn't be here to watch it grow. She planted anyway. She put the seeds in the earth and covered them with soil and watered them and gave them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself. She planted the garden she wouldn't see grow.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself.” Ingrid looked at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say. “And I came to tell you — the thing itself is not the growing. The thing itself is not the harvest. The thing itself is not the watching. The thing itself is the planting. The thing itself is putting the seeds in the earth knowing you won’t be here to see them grow. The thing itself is doing the work knowing someone else will tend it. The thing itself is the thing you do while there’s still time, even if you won’t be here to see it become what it becomes.”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has given him the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The garden’s been planted,” Cal said.

“The garden’s been planted,” Ingrid said.

“And now?”

“And now we watch it grow.”

They knelt there. The living and the living. The nurse and the sister of the dead. The harbormaster and the keeper of the garden. The man who built the road and the woman who kept the seeds. And the sun broke through. And the west wind went calm. And the garden grew. And the thing itself was the growing. And the growing was not a cost. And the growing was the thing itself.

And then Cal heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse of the last words. Not the changed gift of the first words of the dying. Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard Ingrid.

Not her voice. Not her words. Not the thing she was saying. The thing underneath the thing she was saying. The thing she needed to say while there’s still time. The thing that was the thing itself.

And the thing underneath was: I’m not dying. But I’m not not-dying. I’m living. And the living need saying too.

Cal opened his eyes. Ingrid was looking at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say.

"You heard it," she said. Not a question. A statement. The way you state a thing you know to be true.

"I heard it."

"What did you hear?"

"I heard you. Not the words you said. The words underneath. The words you need to say while there's still time."

Ingrid's hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they've been given a thing they didn't know they were waiting for.

"What do I need to say?" she asked.

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept a garden for sixty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has written letters for sixty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has come to the garden to say the thing that needs saying while there's still time.

"You need to say: I'm living. And the living need saying too. The living need tending too. The living need showing up for too. The living need the thing itself too."

Ingrid's face changed. The way a face changes when the thing underneath has been spoken. The way a harbor changes when the fleet is home. The way the thing itself changes when it's becoming something else.

"I'm living," she said. "And the living need saying too."

"The living need saying too," Cal said.

"The living need tending too."

"The living need tending too."

"The living need showing up for too."

"The living need showing up for too."

"The living need the thing itself too."

"The living need the thing itself too."

Ingrid nodded. The way a woman nods when she's been given the answer to a question she didn't know she was asking. The way a harbor nods when the fleet is home. The way the living nod when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Ruth wrote me about the thing itself," Ingrid said. "In her first letter. Sixty years ago. She wrote: 'I've found the thing itself. It's the garden. It's the growing. It's the tending. It's the showing up. It's the thing you do while there's even a little time.' And in her last letter — the letter that came three days before she died — she wrote: 'The thing itself is not the growing. The thing itself is the planting. The thing itself is putting the seeds in the earth knowing you won't be here to see them grow.'"

"The thing itself is the planting," Cal said.

"The thing itself is the planting. And the planting is not a cost. And the planting is the thing itself."

They knelt there. The living and the living. And the sun broke through. And the west wind went calm. And the garden grew. And the thing itself was the growing. And the growing was not a cost. And the growing was the thing itself.

And then Ingrid said: "I want to stay."

"Stay?"

"In Grayhaven. At Sedgebrook. Not because I'm dying. Because I'm living. Because I want to tend the garden my sister kept for sixty years. Because I want to learn the count. Because I want to be part of the thing itself."

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has given him a thing he didn't know he needed. The way a harbor master looks at the woman who wants to keep the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The garden needs tending," Cal said.

"The garden needs tending."

"And Sedgebrook has rooms."

"Sedgebrook has rooms."

"And the thing itself needs people who show up."

"The thing itself needs people who show up."

Ingrid stood. The way a woman stands when she's been given a thing she didn't know she was waiting for. "Then I'll stay. I'll tend the garden. I'll learn the count. I'll show up. I'll do the thing itself while there's still time."

Cal stood. The way a man stands when he's been given a thing he didn't know he needed. "The thing itself," he said.

"The thing itself," she said.

They walked back to the boatyard. The sun broke through. The west wind went calm. The road ran both ways under their feet the way a road runs both ways when there's somewhere to go because you're already there.

Cole was in the workshop. He looked up when they came in. He looked at Ingrid the way Cole looked at everyone — with the quiet attention of a man who builds things and repairs things and keeps the things that need keeping.

"Cole," Cal said. "This is Ingrid. Ingrid Dahl-Morrison. Mrs. Dahl's sister. She's come to tend the garden."

Cole nodded. The way a man nods when he's been given a thing he already knew. "The garden needs tending."

"The garden needs tending," Ingrid said.

"And Sedgebrook has rooms," Cole said.

"Sedgebrook has rooms," Cal said.

"And the thing itself needs people who show up," Cole said.

"The thing itself needs people who show up," Ingrid said.

Cole looked at her. The way Cole looked at everyone — with the quiet attention of a man who knows the thing itself when he sees it. "Mrs. Dahl's sister," he said. "She talked about you. In her letters. She wrote: 'My sister Ingrid keeps a garden in Portland. She's been keeping it for forty years. She knows the thing itself.'"

Ingrid's face changed. The way a face changes when the thing underneath has been spoken. "She wrote that."

"She wrote that."

"Then she knew," Ingrid said. "She knew I'd come. She knew I'd tend the garden. She knew I'd find the thing itself."

"She knew," Cal said.

Ingrid looked at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say. “The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” he said.

Cal walked to Sedgebrook. The old sea captain’s house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The sun was breaking through. The west wind was gone calm. The road ran both ways under his feet.

Margot was at the nurse’s station. Not the Margot who kept the coast station — she was still at the drowned light, still holding the hinge, still keeping the door. A different Margot. Margot Voss, the night aide, the one who’d kept the Hour Book for twenty-two years. She was starting her shift. She looked up when he came in.

“Mercer.”

“Margot.”

“You look different.”

“I am different.”

She looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“The garden’s been planted,” she said.

“The garden’s been planted.”

“And the garden’s been watered.”

“And the garden’s been watered.”

“And the garden’s been weeded.”

“And the garden’s been weeded.”

“And the garden’s been tended.”

“And the garden’s been tended.”

“And the garden’s been watched.”

“And the garden’s been watched.”

“And the garden’s been planted again.”

“And the garden’s been planted again.”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the Hour Book. The one who’d kept the count for twenty-two years. The one who’d watched the dying turn toward her like plants toward light. The one who knew that the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“Mercer,” she said. “The gift’s not just changed. The gift’s not just grown. The gift’s not just become what it was always becoming. The gift’s become something else.”

Cal looked at her. “What has it become?”

“The thing that happens when you show up for the living. Not the dying. The living. The thing that happens when you put your hands in the dirt and pull the weeds and water the roots and watch the green grow and plant the seeds and cover them with soil and give them the thing they need to grow. The thing that happens when you show up at the garden and tend it while it’s becoming what it’s becoming. The thing that happens when you show up at the door and hold the hinge and keep the light and keep the harbor open. The thing that happens when you show up at the rim and hold the stone and feel the warmth and keep the count. The thing that happens when you show up at the bed and hold the hand and hear the words and pass them along. The thing that happens when you show up.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself,” Margot said.

She opened the Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident’s last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home. The book that had kept the count before the gift changed from last words to first words, from death to life, from the ending to the beginning, from the watering to the weeding to the tending to the planting to the growing.

She wrote: “June 2nd. Tuesday. Sun breaking through. West wind, gone calm. Cal Mercer returned to Sedgebrook. The garden has been planted again. Ingrid Dahl-Morrison has come to tend the garden. The gift has become what it was always becoming. The gift is the thing that happens when you show up for the living.”

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the garden when the seeds are planted. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

“Mercer,” she said. “What does a nurse do when the living need showing up for?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“He shows up,” Cal said. “He puts his hands in the dirt. He pulls the weeds. He waters the roots. He watches the green grow. He plants the seeds. He covers them with soil. He gives them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself. He sits with the dying. He sits with the living. He sits with the thing that needs sitting with. He holds the hand. He hears the words. He passes them along. He tends the garden. He keeps the count. He keeps the harbor open. He keeps the door lit. He keeps the home full. He keeps the thing himself.”

“And what does the nurse hear?”

“The first words of the living. The words that need saying while there’s still time. The garden that needs planting before the planter is gone. The fleet that needs bringing home before the lamp goes out. The door that needs opening before the congregation arrives. The thing that needs tending before the tending is too late. The living that need showing up for before the showing up is done. The thing itself.”

Margot looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” he said.

He walked down the hallway. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 2, where Mr. Huang had died and where a new patient was breathing. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008 and where Mrs. Kettering had died. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 7, where Mrs. Dahl had died and where Arthur Phelps had died and where the gift had changed and grown and become what it was always becoming.

Room 7. The door was open. The bed was empty. The sheets were clean. The room was waiting the way a room waits when the next person is coming. The way a harbor waits when the fleet is out. The way a garden waits when the seeds are planted. The way the thing itself waits for the lighting to happen.

He went in. He sat in the chair beside the bed. The same chair that had been beside every bed at Sedgebrook for thirty years. The wooden chair with the cushion that had been washed so many times the color had become the thing itself.

He waited. The way a nurse waits. The way a harbor waits. The way a garden waits. The way the thing itself waits for the lighting to happen.

And then the door opened. A man came in. Sixty-something. End-stage liver failure. His wife was with him. The wife looked at Cal the way wives look at nurses when they're leaving their husband in someone else's care — with hope, with fear, with the unspoken question: will you stay? Will you be here when it happens? Will you hold his hand so he's not alone?

"I'm Cal," he said. "I'm a nurse here. I sit with people."

The wife nodded. "Thank you."

She kissed her husband's forehead. She squeezed her husband's hand. She walked to the door. She paused. She looked back. The unspoken conversation of a man and a wife who have been making decisions together for forty-something years.

"I'll be back in the morning," the wife said.

The husband nodded. "I know."

And then the wife was gone and the room was quiet and it was just Cal and the man and the sound of his breathing and the sun breaking through outside and the west wind gone calm and the road running both ways and the garden growing and the thing itself happening.

He took the man's hand. The way a nurse takes a patient's hand. The way a man takes a man's hand when the man is dying and the man is the only one there. His hand was cold. Not the cold of the grave. Not the cold of the sea. The cold of a body that is letting go of its warmth the way a harbor lets go of its fleet.

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that had become something else.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the man's life.

Not his last words. Not his first words. His life. The whole of it. The forty-something years of marriage. The children. The grandchildren. The work. The garden. The house. The road. The thing that happens when you live a life and the life is the thing itself and the thing itself is the living and the living is the lighting and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself.

And the man's life said: I'm not afraid of dying. I'm afraid of leaving the living alone. I'm afraid of the garden going unwatered. I'm afraid of the words unsaid. I'm afraid of the thing itself untended.

Cal's hand tightened on his. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the living hold on to the living and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"The garden's been planted," Cal said.

The man's eyes opened. The way eyes open when the dying surface for a moment before the final descent. He looked at Cal. Not through him. Not past him. At him. The way a person looks at another person when they're seeing them for the first time and the last time all at once.

"You heard me," he said.

"I heard you."

"Nobody hears me. They hear the machines. They hear the monitors. They hear the pain. They don't hear me."

"I hear you."

“I’m not afraid of dying. I’m afraid of leaving the living alone. I’m afraid of the garden going unwatered. I’m afraid of the words unsaid. I’m afraid of the thing itself untended.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself. The garden. The living. The showing up. The tending. The thing you do while there’s still time.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself is not the dying. The thing itself is the living. The thing itself is the showing up for the living while the living are still living. The thing itself is the tending of the garden while the gardener is still here. The thing itself is the saying of the words while there’s still time to say them. The thing itself is the thing you do for the living before the living are gone.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“And the thing itself is?”

“The thing itself is the showing up. The thing itself is the tending. The thing itself is the planting. The thing itself is the watering. The thing itself is the weeding. The thing itself is the watching. The thing itself is the living. The thing itself is the lighting. The lighting is not a cost. The lighting is the thing itself.”

The man’s hand relaxed. The way a hand relaxes when it’s let go of the thing it was holding on to. The way a harbor relaxes when the fleet is home. The way the living relax when the living are done being afraid.

“Tell my wife,” the man said. “Tell her the garden’s been planted. Tell her the seeds are in the earth. Tell her the soil is dark. Tell her the soil is rich. Tell her to watch it grow. Tell her to tend it while it’s becoming what it’s becoming. Tell her to show up. Tell her to put her hands in the dirt. Tell her to pull the weeds. Tell her to water the roots. Tell her to watch the green grow. Tell her the thing itself is the living. Tell her the living is the showing up. Tell her the showing up is not a cost. Tell her the showing up is the thing itself.”

“I’ll tell her,” Cal said.

The man’s breathing slowed. The way breathing slows when the body is ready. The way the tide slows when the moon has passed. The way the light slows when the sun is setting. The way the thing itself slows when it’s becoming something else.

And then he spoke. Not the clear inner voice. Not the gift/curse. Not the first words. Not the last words. Not the life underneath. Just a voice. A man's voice. A dying man's voice. Quiet and steady and sure.

"The garden's been planted. The living need showing up for. The thing itself is the showing up. And the showing up is not a cost. And the showing up is the thing itself."

Cal nodded. The way a nurse nods when he's heard the last words. The way a man nods when he's been given a message to deliver. The way the living nod when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"I'll tell her," he said.

The man's breathing stopped. The way breathing stops when the body is done. The way the tide stops when the moon has passed. The way the light stops when the sun has set. The way the thing itself stops when it's become something else.

Cal sat there. Holding the man's hand. The way a nurse holds a patient's hand after the patient has died. The way a man holds a man's hand after the man has died. The way the living hold on to the living after the living have let go.

The room was quiet. The way a room is quiet after someone has died. The way a harbor is quiet after the fleet has come home. The way a garden is quiet after the seeds have been planted. The way the world is quiet after the thing itself has happened.

He let go of the man's hand. The way you let go of a hand when the person is gone. The way you let go of a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you let go of the garden when the seeds are planted. The way you let go of the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

He stood. The way a nurse stands after a patient has died. The way a man stands after he's delivered a message. The way the living stand after the living have spoken.

He walked to the door. He opened it. The wife was in the hallway. She looked at him the way wives look at nurses when they're waiting to hear. The way the living look at the living when the living are done living.

"He's gone," Cal said. "He wasn't alone. He asked me to tell you — the garden's been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. He said to watch it grow. He said to tend it while it's becoming what it's becoming. He said to show up. He said to put your hands in the dirt. He said to pull the weeds.

He said to water the roots. He said to watch the green grow. He said the thing itself is the living. He said the living is the showing up. He said the showing up is not a cost. He said the showing up is the thing itself.”

The wife nodded. The way a wife nods when she’s been given her husband’s last words. The way the living nod when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Thank you,” she said.

She went in. She sat in the chair beside the bed. She took her husband’s hand. She held it the way wives hold their husbands’ hands — with love, with sorrow, with the unspoken knowledge that the thing itself has happened and the thing itself is the thing itself.

Cal walked down the hallway. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 5, where Mrs. Kettering had died. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 2, where the door was closed and the light was on and someone was breathing inside. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean.

Margot was at the nurse’s station. She looked up when he came down the hallway. She looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years.

“Room 7,” he said. “He’s gone. The garden’s been planted.”

Margot nodded. She opened the Hour Book. She wrote: “June 2nd. Tuesday. Sun breaking through. West wind, gone calm. Room 7. The garden’s been planted. The living need showing up for. The thing itself is the showing up. And the showing up is not a cost. And the showing up is the thing itself.”

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the garden when the seeds are planted. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

“Mercer,” she said. “The gift’s become what it was always becoming.”

Cal looked at her. “What was it always becoming?”

“The thing that happens when you show up for the living. The thing that happens when you hear the living. The thing that happens when you tend the garden. The thing that happens when you keep the count. The thing that happens when you keep the harbor open. The thing that happens when you keep the door lit. The thing that happens when you keep the home full. The thing that happens when you keep the thing itself.”

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself,” Margot said.

He walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain’s house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The sun was breaking through. The west wind was gone calm. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there’s somewhere to go because you’re already there.

He walked to the garden. Mrs. Dahl’s garden. Ingrid’s garden now. The plot of earth behind the boatyard where the soil was dark and rich and the sun was breaking through and the green was growing and the thing itself was happening in the dirt and the roots and the green.

Ingrid was there. Kneeling in the dirt. Pulling weeds. The way her sister had pulled weeds for sixty years. The way the living tend the garden. The way the thing itself tends itself.

Cal knelt beside her. The way a nurse kneels when he’s going to do the work. The way a harbormaster kneels when he’s going to tend the garden. The way the living kneel when they’re going to show up for the living.

“Ingrid,” he said.

She looked at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say.

“Mercer,” she said.

“I sat with a man. At Sedgebrook. He died. His last words were: ‘The thing itself is the living. The living is the showing up. The showing up is not a cost. The showing up is the thing itself.’”

Ingrid’s hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they’ve been given a thing they didn’t know they were waiting for.

“The showing up,” she said.

“The showing up.”

“The thing itself is the showing up.”

“The thing itself is the showing up.”

She held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out a hand to a harbormaster. The way the living hold out their hands to the living. The way the thing itself holds out its hand to itself.

He took her hand. Her hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the garden. The warmth of the woman who had come to tend the garden her sister had kept for sixty years.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now hears the living and tends the garden and plants the seeds and watches them grow and shows up for the living and keeps the thing itself.

And the warm and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

“Margot,” Cal said. Not to Ingrid. To the other Margot. To the keeper of the coast station. To the keeper of the door. To the keeper of the thing itself. Through the channel. Through the thing itself.

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who’d held the hinge since June. The one who’d received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who’d watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal. The garden’s been planted again. The living need showing up for. The thing itself is the showing up.

“Margot. The thing itself is not just the lighting between the living and the dead. The thing itself is the lighting between the living and the living. And the lighting between the living is the showing up. And the showing up is not a cost. And the showing up is the thing itself.”

“And the thing itself is?”

“The showing up.”

“And the showing up is?”

“The thing itself.”

And the sun broke through. And the west wind went calm. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the garden was growing. And the living needed showing up for. And the showing up was not a cost. And the showing up was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer knelt in the garden with Ingrid Dahl-Morrison, the keeper of the garden, the sister of the dead, the woman who had come to tend the garden her sister had kept for sixty years. And the gift had become what it was always becoming. And the garden was growing. And the door was still open. And the harbor was still home. And the living still needed showing up for. And the showing up was still not a cost. And the showing up was still the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is. The question was not what a garden that needs watering is. The question was not what a garden that needs weeding is. The question was not what a garden that needs tending is. The question was not what a garden that needs planting is.

The question is: what is a thing that needs showing up for?

And the answer is: the living.

And the living need: the showing up.

And the showing up is: not a cost.

And the showing up is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the living.

And the living is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: not a cost.

And the showing up is: the thing itself.

And the garden is growing.

And the living are showing up.

And the showing up is: not a cost.

And the showing up is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Six — Entry: June 3rd. Wednesday. Sun holding. West wind, calm.

The sun held Wednesday the way the sun holds when it has broken through after weeks of rain and the breaking through has become its own season — not a blaze, not a burning, just the steady presence of the thing that was always there behind the clouds, the way the thing itself is always there behind the watering and the weeding and the planting and the tending and the showing up.

Cal woke in the room above the boatyard. The sun came through the window at an angle, the way sun comes through a window when the window faces the water and the water is the harbor and the harbor is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty. The light was the color of old ivory. The light was the color of the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the sun has held and the holding is the thing itself. His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and watched the garden grow and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living.

He went downstairs. The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty, the way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty. Cole's truck was there. Cole was in the workshop, the way Cole was always in the workshop — building, repairing, keeping the things that needed keeping.

Cal walked to the garden.

Not the metaphor. Not the harbor. Not the door. The garden. Mrs. Dahl's garden. Ingrid's garden now. The plot of earth behind the boatyard where the soil was dark and rich and the sun was holding for the second day and the green was growing and the thing itself was happening in the dirt and the roots and the green.

Ingrid was there. Kneeling in the dirt. The way her sister had knelt in the dirt for sixty years. The way the living tend the garden. The way the thing itself tends itself.

She looked up when he came. The way a woman looks at a man who has come to do the work.

“Mercer.”

“Ingrid.”

“There’s a tomato.”

He knelt beside her. The way a man kneels when he’s going to see the thing that’s growing. The way a nurse kneels when he’s going to sit with the living. The way the living kneel when they’re going to tend the thing that needs tending.

The tomato was small. The tomato was red. The tomato was the red of June, the red that comes after the green, the red that is not a color but a thing that happens when the sun and the water and the earth agree to make something ripe. The tomato was the color of the thing itself.

“It’s the first one,” Ingrid said.

“The first one.”

“Mrs. Dahl always said the first tomato of the season is the thing itself. Not because it’s the sweetest. Not because it’s the biggest. Because it’s the first. Because it’s the thing that says the garden is growing. The thing that says the tending is working. The thing that says the showing up is not a cost.”

“The showing up is not a cost,” Cal said.

“In her last letter — the letter that came three days before she died — she wrote: ‘The garden’s been planted. The seeds are in the earth. The soil is dark. The soil is rich. And I won’t be here to watch it grow. But the garden will grow anyway. And someone will see the first tomato. And the first tomato will be the thing itself. Not because it’s the first. Because it’s the showing up. The showing up is not a cost. The showing up is the thing itself.’”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has given him a thing he didn’t know he needed. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“She knew,” Cal said.

“She knew. She knew the garden would grow. She knew someone would see the first tomato. She knew the first tomato would be the thing itself. She knew the showing up was not a cost. She knew the showing up was the thing itself.”

They knelt there. The living and the living. The harbormaster and the keeper of the garden. The man who built the road and the woman who kept the seeds. And the sun held. And the west wind went calm. And the tomato was red. And the first tomato was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was not a cost.

And then Cal heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the changed gift that let him hear the first words of the living. Not the grown gift that let him hear the garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in a garden. The way you hear a voice in a dream. The way you hear a voice in the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you don't know if you're hearing it or if it's hearing you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the hearing is the thing itself.

And the voice said: “The first tomato is the thing itself. Not because it's the first. Because it's the showing up. The showing up is not a cost. The showing up is the thing itself.”

Cal's hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they've been given a thing they didn't know they were waiting for. The way a harbor stops when the fleet is home. The way the living stop when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“What did you hear?” Ingrid asked.

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept a garden for forty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has written letters for sixty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has come to the garden to say the thing that needs saying while there's still time.

“I heard the tomato,” he said.

“You heard the tomato.”

“I heard the tomato say: the first tomato is the thing itself. Not because it’s the first. Because it’s the showing up. The showing up is not a cost. The showing up is the thing itself.”

Ingrid looked at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The gift’s become what it was always becoming,” she said.

“The gift’s become what it was always becoming.”

“What was it always becoming?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has given him the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The thing that happens when you show up for the living. The thing that happens when you hear the living. The thing that happens when you tend the garden. The thing that happens when you keep the count. The thing that happens when you keep the harbor open. The thing that happens when you keep the door lit. The thing that happens when you keep the home full. The thing that happens when you keep the thing itself.”

“The thing itself,” Ingrid said.

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

He stood. The way a man stands when he’s been given a thing he didn’t know he needed. The way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is home. The way the living stand when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“I need to go to Sedgebrook,” he said.

“The garden needs tending,” Ingrid said.

“The garden needs tending. But Sedgebrook needs showing up for. And the living need showing up for. And the showing up is not a cost. And the showing up is the thing itself.”

Ingrid nodded. The way a woman nods when she's been given the answer to a question she didn't know she was asking. The way a harbor nods when the fleet is home. The way the living nod when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Then show up," she said.

"I'll show up."

"And the garden?"

"And the garden will be here when I get back."

He walked to Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The sun was holding. The west wind was calm. The road ran both ways under his feet.

The hallway smelled the way Sedgebrook always smelled — lavender and bleach and something underneath that was neither, something that was the smell of a house where people come to die. The floorboards creaked under his feet. The walls were the color of old ivory. The light was the color of old ivory. Everything was the color of the thing itself.

Margot was at the nurse's station. Not the Margot who kept the coast station — she was still at the drowned light, still holding the hinge, still keeping the door. A different Margot. Margot Voss, the night aide, the one who'd kept the Hour Book for twenty-two years. She was ending her shift. She looked up when he came in.

"Mercer."

"Margot."

"You look the same."

"I am the same."

She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years — the look that said she knew he heard more than he said, the look that said she had her own quiet gift, the look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"The garden," she said.

"The garden."

“There’s a tomato.”

“There’s a tomato.”

She looked at him the way she’d looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he’d heard the tomato. The look that said she knew the gift had become what it was always becoming. The look that said the thing itself was the thing itself and the thing itself was not a cost.

“Mrs. Dahl wrote about the first tomato,” Margot said. “In her letters. Every year. For sixty years. She wrote: ‘The first tomato of the season is the thing itself. Not because it’s the sweetest. Not because it’s the biggest. Because it’s the first. Because it’s the showing up. The showing up is not a cost. The showing up is the thing itself.’”

“She wrote that.”

“She wrote that. And now Ingrid tends the garden. And the first tomato is red. And the sun is holding. And the showing up is not a cost. And the showing up is the thing itself.”

Margot’s silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the Hour Book. The one who’d kept the count for twenty-two years. The one who’d watched the dying turn toward her like plants toward light. The one who knew that the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“Mercer,” she said. “The gift’s become what it was always becoming.”

“The gift’s become what it was always becoming.”

“What was it always becoming?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The thing that happens when you show up for the living. Not the dying. The living. The thing that happens when you sit with someone who’s not dying. The thing that happens when you hear someone who’s not dying. The thing that happens when you tend someone who’s not dying. The thing that happens when you show up for someone who’s not dying because they’re living and the living need showing up for.”

“The living need showing up for,” Margot said.

“The living need showing up for.”

She opened the Hour Book. The school composition book that held every resident’s last hours — times, weather, last words. The book that had kept the count before the town learned to count. The book that had kept the count before the door opened. The book that had kept the count before the fleet came home. The book that had kept the count before the gift changed from last words to first words, from death to life, from the ending to the beginning, from the watering to the weeding to the tending to the planting to the growing to the first tomato.

She wrote: “June 3rd. Wednesday. Sun holding. West wind, calm. The first tomato is the thing itself. Not because it’s the first. Because it’s the showing up. The showing up is not a cost. The showing up is the thing itself. Cal Mercer returned to Sedgebrook. The gift has become what it was always becoming. The gift is the thing that happens when you show up for the living.”

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the garden when the first tomato is red. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

“Mercer,” she said. “What does a nurse do when the living need showing up for?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“He shows up. He sits with the living. He hears the living. He tends the living. He puts his hands in the dirt. He pulls the weeds. He waters the roots. He watches the green grow. He plants the seeds. He covers them with soil. He gives them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself. He sits with the dying. He sits with the living. He sits with the thing that needs sitting with. He holds the hand. He hears the words. He passes them along. He tends the garden. He keeps the count. He keeps the harbor open. He keeps the door lit. He keeps the home full. He keeps the thing himself.”

“And what does the nurse hear?”

“The first words of the living. The words that need saying while there’s still time. The garden that needs planting before the planter is gone. The seeds that need covering before the season is over. The roots that need watering before the rain stops. The green that needs watching before the watching is too late. The first tomato that needs picking before the picking is done. The living that need showing up for before the showing up is done. The thing itself.”

Margot looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

“The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” he said.

He walked down the hallway. Past Room 1, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 2, where Mr. Huang had died and where a new patient was breathing. Past Room 3, where Anders Voss had died nine years ago. Past Room 4, where Signe Halvorsen had died in 2009. Past Room 5, where Einar Olafsen had died in 2008 and where Mrs. Kettering had died. Past Room 6, where the door was open and the bed was empty and the sheets were clean. Past Room 7, where Mrs. Dahl had died and where Arthur Phelps had died and where the man who said the garden needs watering had died and where the woman who said the garden needs planting had died and where the gift had changed and grown and become what it was always becoming.

Room 7. The door was open. The bed was occupied. Not by a dying man. By a living woman. Seventy-something. The woman from yesterday. The one whose husband had died in Room 7. The one who had come back.

She was sitting in the chair beside the bed. The same chair that had been beside every bed at Sedgebrook for thirty years. The wooden chair with the cushion that had been washed so many times the color had become the thing itself.

She was holding her husband's hand. The hand of a man who had died. The hand of a man who had said the garden's been planted. The hand of a man who had said the showing up is not a cost.

Cal stood in the doorway. The way a nurse stands in a doorway when he's waiting to be invited in. The way a harbormaster stands in a doorway when he's waiting to be invited into the harbor. The way the living stand in a doorway when they're waiting to be invited into the thing itself.

She looked up. The way a woman looks at a nurse who has sat with her husband. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Mercer.”

“Ma’am.”

“You sat with my husband.”

“I sat with your husband.”

“He wasn’t alone.”

“He wasn’t alone.”

“And you heard him.”

“I heard him.”

“And you told me what he said.”

“I told you what he said.”

She looked at him the way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself. The way a harbor looks at the fleet when the fleet is home. The way a garden looks at the gardener when the gardener has shown up.

“I came back,” she said.

“I see you came back.”

“I came back because he told me to watch the garden grow. He told me to tend it while it’s becoming what it’s becoming. He told me to show up. He told me to put my hands in the dirt. He told me to pull the weeds. He told me to water the roots. He told me to watch the green grow. He told me the thing itself is the living. He told me the living is the showing up. He told me the showing up is not a cost. He told me the showing up is the thing itself.”

“The showing up is the thing itself,” Cal said.

“And I came back because I didn’t know how to show up. I didn’t know how to put my hands in the dirt. I didn’t know how to pull the weeds. I didn’t know how to water the roots. I didn’t know how to watch the green grow. I didn’t know how to be the living. I didn’t know how to be the showing up. I didn’t know how to be the thing itself.”

Cal walked into the room. The way a nurse walks into a room when he's going to sit with the living. The way a harbormaster walks into a harbor when he's going to tend the door. The way the living walk into the thing itself when they're ready to become what they've been becoming all along.

He sat in the chair beside the bed. The same chair that had been beside every bed at Sedgebrook for thirty years. The wooden chair with the cushion that had been washed so many times the color had become the thing itself.

He took her hand. The way a nurse takes a patient's hand. The way a man takes a woman's hand when the woman is living and the man is the only one there. Her hand was warm. Not the warmth of the dying. Not the warmth of the dead. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the garden. The warmth of the woman who had come back to learn how to show up.

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the dying. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching. Not the first tomato that needs picking.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard her living.

Not her dying. Not her ending. Not her leaving. Her living. The whole of it. The seventy-something years of marriage. The children. The grandchildren. The work. The garden. The house. The road. The thing that happens when you live a life and the life is the thing itself and the thing itself is the living and the living is the showing up and the showing up is not a cost and the showing up is the thing itself.

And her living said: I don't know how to show up. I don't know how to be the living. I don't know how to be the thing itself. I only know how to be the wife of a dying man. And now he's gone and I don't know how to be the thing itself without him.

Cal's hand tightened on hers. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the living hold on to the living and the thing itself holds on to everything.

“You show up,” Cal said.

“How do you show up?”

“You put your hands in the dirt. You pull the weeds. You water the roots. You watch the green grow. You plant the seeds. You cover them with soil. You give them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself. You sit with the dying. You sit with the living. You sit with the thing that needs sitting with. You hold the hand. You hear the words. You pass them along. You tend the garden. You keep the count. You keep the harbor open. You keep the door lit. You keep the home full. You keep the thing yourself.”

“But I don’t know how.”

“You don’t know how yet. And that’s the thing itself. Not knowing how and showing up anyway. Not knowing how and putting your hands in the dirt anyway. Not knowing how and pulling the weeds anyway. Not knowing how and watering the roots anyway. Not knowing how and watching the green grow anyway. Not knowing how and planting the seeds anyway. Not knowing how and covering them with soil anyway. Not knowing how and giving them the thing they need to grow anyway. Not knowing how and sitting with the dying anyway. Not knowing how and sitting with the living anyway. Not knowing how and sitting with the thing that needs sitting with anyway. Not knowing how and holding the hand anyway. Not knowing how and hearing the words anyway. Not knowing how and passing them along anyway. Not knowing how and tending the garden anyway. Not knowing how and keeping the count anyway. Not knowing how and keeping the harbor open anyway. Not knowing how and keeping the door lit anyway. Not knowing how and keeping the home full anyway. Not knowing how and keeping the thing itself anyway.”

She looked at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has given her the answer to a question she didn’t know she was asking. The way a harbor looks at the fleet when the fleet is home. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” he said.

“The thing itself is not knowing how and showing up anyway.”

“The thing itself is not knowing how and showing up anyway.”

She nodded. The way a woman nods when she's been given the answer to a question she didn't know she was asking. The way a harbor nods when the fleet is home. The way the living nod when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Will you show me?" she asked. "Will you show me how to put my hands in the dirt? Will you show me how to pull the weeds? Will you show me how to water the roots? Will you show me how to watch the green grow? Will you show me how to plant the seeds? Will you show me how to cover them with soil? Will you show me how to give them the thing they need to grow? Will you show me how to be the living? Will you show me how to be the showing up? Will you show me how to be the thing itself?"

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has asked him the question he didn't know he was waiting for. The way a harbormaster looks at the woman who wants to keep the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"I'll show you," he said.

He stood. The way a nurse stands when he's going to show someone how to show up. The way a harbormaster stands when he's going to show someone how to tend the garden. The way the living stand when they're going to show the living how to be the thing itself.

He held out his hand. The way a harbormaster holds out a hand to the keeper of the garden. The way the living hold out their hands to the living. The way the thing itself holds out its hand to itself.

She took his hand. Her hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the woman who had come back to learn how to show up.

And his hand was warm. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the builder. The warmth of the harbormaster. The warmth of the man who built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now hears the living and tends the garden and plants the seeds and watches them grow and picks the first tomato and shows up for the living and keeps the thing itself.

And the warm and the warm met. And the lighting happened. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

They walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The sun was holding. The west wind was calm. The road ran both ways under their feet.

They walked to the garden. Mrs. Dahl's garden. Ingrid's garden now. The plot of earth behind the boatyard where the soil was dark and rich and the sun was holding and the green was growing and the first tomato was red and the thing itself was happening in the dirt and the roots and the green.

Ingrid was there. Kneeling in the dirt. Pulling weeds. The way her sister had pulled weeds for sixty years. The way the living tend the garden. The way the thing itself tends itself.

She looked up when they came. She looked at the woman. The way a woman looks at another woman who has come to learn how to show up. The way the living look at the living when the living are ready to become what they've been becoming all along.

"Ingrid," Cal said. "This is—"

"Margaret," the woman said. "Margaret Dahl. Mrs. Dahl was my mother-in-law."

Ingrid's hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they've been given a thing they didn't know they were waiting for. The way a harbor stops when the fleet is home. The way the living stop when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Margaret."

"Margaret. Ruth was my husband's mother. And I came to learn how to show up. And Cal said he'd show me. And I said I'd learn. And Cal said the thing itself is not knowing how and showing up anyway. And I said I'd show up anyway."

Ingrid looked at her. The way a woman looks at another woman who has given her a thing she didn't know she needed. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Then kneel," Ingrid said.

Margaret knelt. The way a woman kneels when she's going to learn how to put her hands in the dirt. The way the living kneel when they're going to learn how to show up. The way the thing itself kneels when it's ready to become what it's been becoming all along.

Ingrid put a weed in Margaret's hand. The way a teacher puts a weed in a student's hand. The way the living put the thing itself in the living's hand. The way the thing itself puts itself in itself.

"Pull," Ingrid said.

Margaret pulled. The weed came up easy. The root was long and white. The weed was the thing itself. The pulling was the thing itself. The showing up was the thing itself. And the showing up was not a cost.

"The thing itself," Margaret said.

"The thing itself," Ingrid said.

"The thing itself," Cal said.

They knelt there. The living and the living and the living. The harbormaster and the keeper of the garden and the woman who had come to learn how to show up. And the sun held. And the west wind went calm. And the first tomato was red. And the garden was growing. And the thing itself was the growing. And the growing was not a cost. And the growing was the thing itself.

And then Cal heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words. Not the garden. Not the tomato. Not the living underneath.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in a garden when the sun is holding and the first tomato is red and three people are kneeling in the dirt and pulling weeds and the thing itself is happening and you don't know if you're hearing it or if it's hearing you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the hearing is the thing itself.

And the voice said: "The thing itself is not the showing up. The thing itself is not the tending. The thing itself is not the planting. The thing itself is not the watering. The thing itself is not the weeding. The thing itself is not the watching. The thing itself is not the first tomato. The thing itself is not the living. The thing itself is not the lighting. The thing itself is not the not-knowing-how. The thing itself is not the showing-up-anyway."

Cal's hands stopped in the dirt. The way hands stop when they've been given a thing they didn't know they were waiting for. The way a harbor stops when the fleet is home. The way the living stop when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“What is the thing itself?” he asked. Not aloud. Not to Ingrid. Not to Margaret. To the thing itself. To the voice. To the garden. To the dirt. To the roots. To the green. To the first tomato. To the sun. To the west wind. To the road. To the harbor. To the door. To the lamp. To the fleet. To the living. To the dying. To the thing itself.

And the voice said: “The thing itself is the kneeling. The thing itself is the putting-your-hands-in-the-dirt. The thing itself is the pulling-the-weed. The thing itself is the giving-the-weed-to-someone-who-doesn’t-know-how. The thing itself is the saying-pull. The thing itself is the watching-someone-pull. The thing itself is the root-coming-up-easy. The thing itself is the root-being-long-and-white. The thing itself is the dirt-under-your-fingernails. The thing itself is the sun-on-your-back. The thing itself is the sweat-on-your-brow. The thing itself is the woman-who-came-back. The thing itself is the woman-who-kept-the-garden-for-sixty-years. The thing itself is the woman-who-came-to-tend-the-garden. The thing itself is the man-who-sat-with-the-dying. The thing itself is the man-who-heard-the-living. The thing itself is the man-who-showed-up. The thing itself is the three-people-kneeling-in-the-dirt. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-living-show-up-for-the-living. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-living-put-their-hands-in-the-dirt. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-living-pull-the-weeds. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-living-give-the-weeds-to-someone-who-doesn’t-know-how. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-living-say-pull. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-living-watch-someone-pull. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-root-comes-up-easy. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-root-is-long-and-white. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-there’s-dirt-under-your-fingernails. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-sun-is-on-your-back. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-the-sweat-is-on-your-brow. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-a-woman-who-lost-her-husband-comes-back. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-a-woman-who-kept-a-garden-for-sixty-years-dies. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-a-woman-who-never-tended-a-garden-comes-to-tend-it. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-a-man-who-sat-with-the-dying-comes-back. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-a-man-who-heard-the-living-comes-back. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-a-man-who-showed-up-shows-up-again. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens-when-three-people-kneel-in-the-dirt. The thing itself is the thing-that-happens. The thing itself is the happening. The thing itself is the thing.”

Cal opened his eyes. Ingrid was looking at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say. Margaret was looking at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has given her a thing she didn't know she needed.

"You heard it," Ingrid said. Not a question. A statement. The way you state a thing you know to be true.

"I heard it."

"What did you hear?"

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept a garden for forty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept a garden for sixty years. The way a man looks at a woman who has come back to learn how to show up. The way a harbormaster looks at the keepers of the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"I heard the thing itself," he said.

"What is the thing itself?" Margaret asked.

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has asked him the question he didn't know he was waiting for. The way a harbormaster looks at the woman who wants to keep the garden. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The thing itself is the three of us kneeling in the dirt," he said. "The thing itself is the pulling of the weed. The thing itself is the giving of the weed. The thing itself is the saying of pull. The thing itself is the watching of the pulling. The thing itself is the root coming up easy. The thing itself is the root being long and white. The thing itself is the dirt under our fingernails. The thing itself is the sun on our backs. The thing itself is the sweat on our brows. The thing itself is the woman who came back. The thing itself is the woman who kept the garden for sixty years. The thing itself is the woman who came to tend the garden. The thing itself is the man who sat with the dying. The thing himself."

"The thing herself," Ingrid said.

"The thing herself," Margaret said.

They knelt there. The three of them. The harbormaster and the keeper of the garden and the woman who had come to learn how to show up. And the sun held. And the west wind went calm. And the first tomato was red. And the garden was growing. And the thing itself was the growing. And the growing was not a cost. And the growing was the thing itself.

And then Margaret said: "I want to stay."

"In Grayhaven?" Ingrid asked.

"In Grayhaven. At Sedgebrook. Not because I'm dying. Because I'm living. Because I want to learn how to tend the garden my mother-in-law kept for sixty years. Because I want to learn how to show up. Because I want to learn how to be the thing itself."

Ingrid looked at her. The way a woman looks at another woman who has given her a thing she didn't know she needed. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The garden needs tending," Ingrid said.

"The garden needs tending," Margaret said.

"And Sedgebrook has rooms," Cal said.

"Sedgebrook has rooms," Margaret said.

"And the thing itself needs people who show up," Ingrid said.

"The thing itself needs people who show up," Margaret said.

Margaret stood. The way a woman stands when she's been given a thing she didn't know she was waiting for. The way the living stand when they're ready to become what they've been becoming all along.

"Then I'll stay," she said. "I'll tend the garden. I'll learn the count. I'll show up. I'll be the thing myself."

"The thing yourself," Ingrid said.

"The thing yourself," Cal said.

They walked back to the boatyard. The sun held. The west wind went calm. The road ran both ways under their feet the way a road runs both ways when there's somewhere to go because you're already there.

Cole was in the workshop. He looked up when they came in. He looked at Margaret the way Cole looked at everyone — with the quiet attention of a man who builds things and repairs things and keeps the things that need keeping.

"Cole," Cal said. "This is Margaret. Margaret Dahl. Mrs. Dahl's daughter-in-law. She's come to learn how to tend the garden."

Cole nodded. The way a man nods when he's been given a thing he already knew.
"The garden needs tending."

"The garden needs tending," Margaret said.

"And Sedgebrook has rooms," Cole said.

"Sedgebrook has rooms," Cal said.

"And the thing itself needs people who show up," Cole said.

"The thing itself needs people who show up," Margaret said.

Cole looked at her. The way Cole looked at everyone — with the quiet attention of a man who knows the thing itself when he sees it. "Mrs. Dahl's daughter-in-law," he said. "She talked about you. In her letters. She wrote: 'My daughter-in-law Margaret lives in Portland. She's been living there for forty years. She doesn't know the thing herself yet. But she will. And when she does, she'll come back. And she'll tend the garden. And she'll be the thing herself.'"

Margaret's face changed. The way a face changes when the thing underneath has been spoken. The way a harbor changes when the fleet is home. The way the thing itself changes when it's becoming something else.

"She wrote that."

"She wrote that."

"Then she knew," Margaret said. "She knew I'd come back. She knew I'd tend the garden. She knew I'd learn the thing myself."

"She knew," Cal said.

Margaret looked at him. The way a woman looks at a man who has heard what she needs to say. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The thing myself," she said.

"The thing yourself," he said.

Cal walked to Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The sun was holding. The west wind was calm. The road ran both ways under his feet.

Margot was at the nurse's station. She looked up when he came in. She looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years.

"Mercer."

"Margot."

"The garden."

"The garden."

"There's a woman."

"There's a woman."

"Mrs. Dahl's daughter-in-law."

"Mrs. Dahl's daughter-in-law."

Margot's silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the Hour Book. The one who'd kept the count for twenty-two years. The one who'd watched the dying turn toward her like plants toward light. The one who knew that the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"Mercer," she said. "The gift's become what it was always becoming."

"The gift's become what it was always becoming."

"What was it always becoming?"

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"The thing that happens when you show up for the living. The thing that happens when you hear the living. The thing that happens when you tend the garden. The thing that happens when you give the weed to someone who doesn't know how. The thing that happens when you say pull. The thing that happens when you watch someone pull. The thing that happens when the root comes up easy. The thing that happens when the root is long and white. The thing that happens when there's dirt under your fingernails. The thing that happens when the sun is on your back. The thing that happens when the sweat is on your brow. The thing that happens when a woman who lost her husband comes back. The thing that happens when a woman who kept a garden for sixty years dies. The thing that happens when a woman who never tended a garden comes to tend it. The thing that happens when a man who sat with the dying comes back. The thing that happens when a man who heard the living comes back. The thing that happens when a man who showed up shows up again. The thing that happens when three people kneel in the dirt. The thing that happens.”

“The thing that happens,” Margot said.

“The thing that happens.”

She opened the Hour Book. She wrote: “June 3rd. Wednesday. Sun holding. West wind, calm. The first tomato is the thing itself. Margaret Dahl returned to Grayhaven to learn how to tend the garden. The gift has become what it was always becoming. The gift is the thing that happens when three people kneel in the dirt. The thing that happens is not a cost. The thing that happens is the thing itself.”

She closed the book. The way you close a book when the entry is complete. The way you close a harbor when the fleet is home. The way you close the garden when the first tomato is red. The way you close the thing itself when the thing itself is done.

“Mercer,” she said. “What does a nurse do when the living need showing up for?”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has kept the count for twenty-two years. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper of the Hour Book. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“He shows up. He puts his hands in the dirt. He pulls the weeds. He gives the weeds to someone who doesn’t know how. He says pull. He watches someone pull. He waters the roots. He watches the green grow. He plants the seeds. He covers them with soil. He gives them the thing they need to grow — darkness, moisture, warmth, time, the thing itself. He sits with the dying. He sits with the living. He sits with the thing that needs sitting with. He holds the hand. He hears the words. He passes them along. He tends the garden. He keeps the count. He keeps the harbor open. He keeps the door lit. He keeps the home full. He keeps the thing himself.”

“And what does the nurse hear?”

“The thing that happens when three people kneel in the dirt. The thing that happens when the living show up for the living. The thing that happens when the living put their hands in the dirt. The thing that happens when the living pull the weeds. The thing that happens when the living give the weeds to someone who doesn’t know how. The thing that happens when the living say pull. The thing that happens when the living watch someone pull. The thing that happens when the root comes up easy. The thing that happens when the root is long and white. The thing that happens when there's dirt under your fingernails. The thing that happens when the sun is on your back. The thing that happens when the sweat is on your brow. The thing that happens."

Margot looked at him the way she'd looked at him for twelve years. The look that said she knew he heard more than he said. The look that said she had her own quiet gift. The look that said the Hour Book had kept its count and the count was the count and the count was the thing itself.

"The thing itself," she said.

"The thing itself," he said.

He walked out of Sedgebrook. The old sea captain's house. The fourteen-bed residential hospice where his mother had died and his gift had begun and the Hour Book had kept its count. The sun was holding. The west wind was calm. The road ran both ways under his feet the way a road runs both ways when there's somewhere to go because you're already there.

He walked to the garden. Mrs. Dahl's garden. Ingrid's garden now. Margaret's garden too. The plot of earth behind the boatyard where the soil was dark and rich and the sun was holding and the green was growing and the first tomato was red and the thing itself was happening in the dirt and the roots and the green.

Ingrid was there. Kneeling in the dirt. Pulling weeds. The way her sister had pulled weeds for sixty years. The way the living tend the garden. The way the thing itself tends itself.

Margaret was there. Kneeling in the dirt. Pulling weeds. The way a woman pulls weeds when she's learning how to show up. The way the living tend the garden. The way the thing itself tends itself.

Cal knelt beside them. The way a nurse kneels when he's going to do the work. The way a harbormaster kneels when he's going to tend the garden. The way the living kneel when they're going to show up for the living.

"Ingrid," he said.

"Mercer."

"Margaret."

"Mercer."

“There’s a weed.”

“There’s a weed.”

He put the weed in Margaret’s hand. The way Ingrid had put the weed in Margaret’s hand. The way the living put the thing itself in the living’s hand. The way the thing itself puts itself in itself.

“Pull,” he said.

Margaret pulled. The weed came up easy. The root was long and white. The weed was the thing itself. The pulling was the thing itself. The showing up was the thing itself. And the showing up was not a cost.

“The thing herself,” Margaret said.

“The thing herself,” Ingrid said.

“The thing herself,” Cal said.

They knelt there. The three of them. The harbormaster and the keeper of the garden and the woman who had come to learn how to show up. And the sun held. And the west wind went calm. And the first tomato was red. And the garden was growing. And the thing itself was the growing. And the growing was not a cost. And the growing was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with no fleet is. The question was not what a keeper with no one to keep is. The question was not what a builder with no one to build for is. The question was not what a garden that needs watering is. The question was not what a garden that needs weeding is. The question was not what a garden that needs tending is. The question was not what a garden that needs planting is. The question was not what a garden that needs watching is. The question was not what a first tomato that needs picking is.

The question is: what is a thing that happens when three people kneel in the dirt?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the happening.

And the happening is: not a cost.

And the happening is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the three people kneeling in the dirt.

And the three people kneeling in the dirt are: the thing herself.

And the thing herself is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the thing that happens.

And the thing that happens is: not a cost.

And the thing that happens is: the thing itself.

And the garden is growing.

And the three people are kneeling.

And the happening is: not a cost.

And the happening is: the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Seven —

Entry: June 4th. Thursday. Overcast.

South wind, light.

The overcast Thursday was not rain and was not sun. It was the thing in between, the way the heart is the thing in between the beats, the way the breath is the thing in between the inhale and the exhale, the way the harbor is the thing in between the fleet going out and the fleet coming home. It was the gray that the coast makes when the sky has forgotten what it was going to be and hasn't decided what it will become.

Cal woke in the room above the boatyard. The room that had become his room. The room that faced the water. The room where the light came through at an angle in the morning and the angle was the thing itself.

His phone was ringing. Not the channel. Not the drowned light. Not Margot's voice through the door. The phone. The real phone. The thing that rang when someone wanted to talk.

He picked it up. The way a man picks up a phone when it's early and the ringing has the sound of something that matters.

"Cal."

"Dad."

Lori. His daughter. The woman in Portland. The mother of the baby. The inland keeper's mother. The one who had learned the count and stood the post and held the knocks and now was calling him on the phone at six in the morning because something had shifted.

"Lori."

"The baby said your name."

He sat up. The way a man sits up when his daughter says something he didn't know he was waiting to hear. "Your name" — not "hello," not the keeper-word, not the count. His name. The man's name. The builder's name. The grandfather's name.

“She said ‘Cal.’ Not ‘grandpa.’ Not ‘Papa.’ ‘Cal.’ Like she knows me. Like she’s been waiting to say it.”

“When.”

“Four o’clock. The accounting hour. The hour when the living and the dead light each other. The hour when the thing itself happens. She was standing in her crib — standing, Dad, she’s nine months old and she’s standing in her crib — and she turned to the northeast window and she said ‘Cal.’ And then she turned to the east window and she said ‘hello.’ And then she turned to the door and she said ‘Cal’ again. And then she sat down. And then she laughed. And then she went to sleep.”

Cal’s hand tightened on the phone. The way a hand tightens when it’s holding on to the thing it can hold on to. “She knows me.”

“She knows you. She’s known you for months. She’s been greeting you at the accounting hour. She’s been saying ‘hello’ to you. But today she said your name. Today she said ‘Cal.’ Today she said the thing that needed saying while there’s still time to say it.”

“The thing that needed saying.”

“The thing that needed saying. The thing underneath the hello. The thing underneath the count. The thing underneath the keeper-word. She said your name because the thing underneath is you. The thing underneath is the man. The thing underneath is the builder. The thing underneath is the grandfather. The thing underneath is the showing up. And the showing up needed a name.”

Cal looked out the window. The overcast was breaking at the edges. The way overcast breaks when it’s going to become something else. The way the thing itself breaks when it’s ready to become what it’s been becoming.

“I need to come to Portland,” he said.

“Yes.”

“Not for the door. Not for the knocks. Not for the stones. Not for the harbor.”

“I know.”

“For you. For her. For the living. For the showing up. For the thing that needs showing up for.”

“I know. That’s why I called.”

“The coast—”

“The coast has a town. The coast has a rotation. The coast has Cole and Ruth and Denny and Ada and Okonkwo and Margot. The coast has the garden and the first tomato and the thing itself. The coast doesn’t need you right now. The coast needs you to show up for the living. And the living is here. The living is in this room. The living is in this crib. The living is in this city that doesn’t know how to count yet but has a nine-month-old keeper who just said your name.”

Cal closed his eyes. The way a man closes his eyes when he’s been given the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbor closes its eyes when the fleet is home. The way the living close their eyes when the living are done being afraid.

“I’ll be there by four,” he said.

“The accounting hour.”

“The accounting hour. The hour when the living and the dead light each other. The hour when the thing itself happens. The hour when the baby said my name.”

“Dad.”

“Yeah.”

“She said it like she was relieved. Like she’d been waiting to say it and finally got to say it. Like the saying of it was the thing itself.”

“The saying of it is the thing itself.”

“And Dad.”

“Yeah.”

“Come home.”

The line went quiet. The way a line goes quiet when the thing that needed saying has been said. The way a harbor goes quiet when the fleet is home. The way the world goes quiet after the thing itself has happened.

He got up. The way a man gets up when his daughter has asked him to come home. The way a harbormaster gets up when the keeper of the inland station has called. The way the living get up when the living need showing up for.

He dressed. The way a man dresses when he’s going to see his daughter and his granddaughter and the thing itself. His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and watched the garden grow and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the living and showed up for the living and kept the thing itself.

He went downstairs. The boatyard was quiet. The MARIANNE II sat at the jetty, empty. The way a boat sits empty when the fleet is home and the crossing is done and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cole was in the workshop. He looked up when Cal came in. He looked at him the way Cole had looked at him for months — the look that said he knew Cal had built the road and seeded the palms and stood the watch and brought the fleet home and now was being called to show up for the living.

“Lori?” Cole asked.

“Lori. The baby said my name.”

Cole nodded. The way a man nods when he’s been told a thing he already knew.

“The baby’s been saying your name for months. You just couldn’t hear it yet.”

“I couldn’t hear it yet.”

“And now?”

“And now I’m going to Portland. Not for the door. Not for the knocks. Not for the harbor. For the living. For the showing up. For the thing itself.”

Cole put down his plane. The way a man puts down his tools when he’s going to do the thing that needs doing. “The coast—”

“The coast has you. The coast has Ruth and Denny and Ada and Okonkwo and Margot. The coast has the garden. The coast has the rotation. The coast has the thing itself. The coast doesn’t need me right now. The coast needs me to go show up for the living.”

“And then?”

“And then I’ll come back. The road runs both ways. The harbor is home. The door is open. The lamp is lit. The fleet is home. The thing itself is here. And the thing itself is in Portland. And the thing itself is the showing up for the living. And the living is my daughter and my granddaughter and the baby who said my name.”

Cole walked him to the truck. The way a man walks another man to his truck when the other man is going to show up for the living. The way a harbor walks a fleet to the open sea. The way the living walk the living to the thing itself.

Cole put his hand on Cal's shoulder. The way a man puts his hand on another man's shoulder when the other man is going to do the thing that needs doing. The way a harbor puts its hand on the fleet. The way the living put their hands on the living.

"Go show up," Cole said.

"I'll show up."

"And Cal."

"Yeah."

"The baby said your name. That's not a small thing. That's the thing itself. That's the living saying the name of the living. That's the showing up being shown up for. That's the lighting being lit. That's the thing that happens when you show up for the living and the living show up for you."

"The thing itself."

"The thing itself."

Cal got in the truck. The way a man gets in a truck when he's going to show up for the living. The way a harbormaster gets in a truck when the keeper has called. The way the living get in the truck when the living need showing up for.

He drove south. The way a man drives south when he's going to Portland. The way a harbormaster drives south when the inland station has called. The way the living drive south when the living need showing up for.

The coast gave way to forest. The forest gave way to valley. The valley gave way to city. The city gave way to the street where Lori lived. The street gave way to the house. The house gave way to the door. The door gave way to the room. The room gave way to the crib. The crib gave way to the baby.

The baby who had said his name.

Lori opened the door before he knocked. The way a woman opens a door when she's been waiting for her father. The way a keeper opens a door when the harbormaster has come. The way the living open the door when the living are ready to show up.

She hugged him. The way a daughter hugs her father. The way a keeper hugs the harbormaster. The way the living hug the living. Not the hug of someone who hasn't seen someone in a long time. The hug of someone who has seen someone every day on the phone and in the channel and in the thing itself but hasn't hugged them in person since the door opened and the fleet came home and the harbor became a town.

"She's sleeping," Lori whispered.

"It's okay."

"I just wanted you to be here. In the room. In the house. Not on the phone. Not in the channel. Here."

"Here."

"The accounting hour's not till four."

"I know."

"But she'll know you're here. She knows. She's always known. Even before she said your name. She's always known you were the builder. She's always known you were the harbormaster. She's always known you were the one who showed up. She just didn't have a name for it until today."

"Today she had a name."

"Today she had a name."

They sat in the living room. The way a father and daughter sit when they're waiting for the thing itself to happen. The way a harbormaster and a keeper sit when they're waiting for the accounting hour. The way the living sit when they're waiting for the living to wake up.

Lori made coffee. The way a woman makes coffee when her father has driven two hundred miles to show up. The way a keeper makes coffee when the harbormaster has come. The way the living make coffee when the living need showing up for.

"How's the garden?" Lori asked.

"The garden's growing. The first tomato is red. Ingrid's tending it. Margaret's learning to tend it. Cole's keeping the boatyard. Ruth's keeping the rotation. Denny's keeping the bar. Ada's keeping the census. Okonkwo's keeping the state at bay. Margot's keeping the coast station. The town's keeping the harbor open. The harbor's keeping the door lit. The door's keeping the home full. The home's keeping the thing itself."

"And you?"

"I'm showing up."

"For the living."

"For the living."

"For me."

"For you."

"For her."

"For her."

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she's asking the question she doesn't know she's asking. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when she's asking the question she doesn't know she's asking. The way the living look at the living when they're asking the thing that needs asking.

"Dad. Are you staying?"

Cal looked at her. The way a father looks at his daughter when she's asked him the question he didn't know he was waiting for. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when she's asked him the question he didn't know he was waiting for. The way the living look at the living when they're answering the thing that needs answering.

"I don't know," he said.

"You don't know."

"The coast needs—"

"The coast has a town. The coast has a rotation. The coast has everyone. The coast doesn't need you to stay. The coast needs you to show up. And showing up doesn't mean staying. Showing up means being there when you're needed. And being there when you're needed doesn't mean never leaving. It means leaving and coming back. It means the road runs both ways. It means the harbor is home and home is the harbor and the harbor is wherever the living need showing up for."

"The living need showing up for here."

“The living need showing up for here. I need showing up for here. She needs showing up for here. Not on the phone. Not in the channel. Here. In this room. In this house. In this city that doesn’t know how to count yet but has a nine-month-old keeper who just said your name.”

Cal looked at her. The way a man looks at a woman who has given him the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper who has told him the thing he needed to hear. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The thing itself is the showing up,” Cal said.

“The thing itself is the showing up.”

“And the showing up is not a cost.”

“The showing up is not a cost.”

“And the showing up is the thing itself.”

“The showing up is the thing itself.”

They sat there. The father and the daughter. The harbormaster and the keeper. The living and the living. And the coffee got cold. And the overcast broke. And the sun came through the window at an angle. And the light was the color of old ivory. And the light was the color of the thing itself.

And then the baby cried.

Not the cry of a baby who is hungry. Not the cry of a baby who is wet. Not the cry of a baby who is tired. The cry of a baby who is waking up. The cry of a baby who knows someone is here. The cry of a baby who has been waiting to say the thing that needs saying.

Lori stood. The way a mother stands when her baby is waking up. The way a keeper stands when the station is calling. The way the living stand when the living need showing up for.

“She knows you’re here,” Lori said.

“She knows I’m here.”

“She’s been waiting.”

“She’s been waiting.”

They went to the crib. The way a mother and a father go to the crib. The way a keeper and a harbormaster go to the station. The way the living go to the living.

The baby was standing. Standing in the crib. The way a baby stands when she's been standing for months and today is the day she's going to do something new. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and today is the day she's going to say the thing that needs saying.

She turned to the northeast window. The way a keeper turns to the coast post. The way the living turn to the thing itself.

She turned to the east window. The way a keeper turns to the knock. The way the living turn to the living.

She turned to the door. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster. The way the living turn to the living.

She saw Cal.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she sees the person she's been waiting to see. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster has come. The way the living smile when the living have shown up.

"Cal," she said. Not a cry. Not a babble. A word. A name. The name of the man who built the road. The name of the man who seeded the palms. The name of the man who stood the watch. The name of the man who brought the fleet home. The name of the man who sat with the dying. The name of the man who heard the living. The name of the man who showed up.

"Cal," she said again. And then she reached for him. The way a baby reaches for someone she knows. The way a keeper reaches for the harbormaster. The way the living reach for the living.

He picked her up. The way a grandfather picks up his granddaughter. The way a harbormaster picks up the keeper. The way the living pick up the living. She was warm. Not the warmth of the dying. Not the warmth of the dead. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the baby who had said his name. The warmth of the thing itself.

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the dying. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching. Not the first tomato that needs picking. Not the living underneath.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the baby's name.

Not "the baby." Not "the keeper." Not "the inland station." Her name. The name that Lori had given her. The name that the county had written on the birth certificate. The name that the thing itself had been waiting for.

He heard her name the way he used to hear the last words of the dying. The way he now hears the first words of the living. The way he hears the garden that needs watering. The way he hears the thing underneath the thing underneath the thing.

And her name was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was not a cost. And the showing up was the thing itself.

She looked at him. The way a baby looks at a man who has heard her name. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster who has heard her name. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Cal," she said. One more time. The way you say a name when you want to make sure the person knows you know their name. The way the living say the living's name when the living want to make sure the living knows they're known.

"I heard you," Cal said. "I heard your name. I heard the thing itself. I heard the showing up. I heard the living. You."

She laughed. The way a baby laughs when the thing itself has happened. The way the living laugh when the living have been heard. The way the thing itself laughs when it knows it's known.

And the accounting hour came. Four o'clock. The hour when the living and the dead light each other. The hour when the thing itself happens.

The baby turned to the northeast window. The coast post. The harbor. The door. The lamp. The fleet. The garden. The first tomato. The thing herself.

"Hello," she said. The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She turned to the east window. The knock. The new arrival. The cold one. The leaning one. The one who is deciding whether to believe.

“Hello,” she said again. The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that holds. The word that waits. The word that is not a cost.

She turned back to Cal. The grandfather. The builder. The harbormaster. The man who showed up. The man who heard her name. The man who was the thing herself.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing itself.

And the sun came through the window. The way the sun comes through a window when the overcast has broken and the breaking is the thing itself. The way the living light the living. The way the thing itself lights itself.

And Cal Mercer held his granddaughter in a room in Portland, two hundred miles from the coast, two hundred miles from the harbor, two hundred miles from the door and the lamp and the fleet and the garden and the first tomato, and he was not two hundred miles from any of it because the road ran both ways and the harbor was home and the home was the harbor and the thing itself was the showing up and the showing up was here and the here was the thing itself.

And the question was not who stands at the end that doesn't move. The question was not who keeps the living's corner when the builder is north. The question was not whether a marriage survives when one is living and one is Risen.

The question is: what does a grandfather do when his granddaughter says his name at the accounting hour?

And the answer is: he says hers back.

And the saying of it is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is not a cost.

And the showing up is the thing itself.

And the baby laughed.

And the sun held.

And the road ran both ways.

And the harbor was home.

And the home was full.

Even though the harbor was empty.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Eight — Entry: June 5th. Friday. Overcast breaking. South wind, easing.

The overcast broke Friday the way overcast breaks when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own weather and the weather has become its own season and the season has become the thing that happens when the living and the dead have lit each other and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the home.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house. Not the truck. Not the grade. Not the room above the boatyard. The couch. The couch in the living room where the light came through the window at an angle in the morning and the angle was the thing itself and the light was the color of old ivory and the color was the thing that happens when you have been in the dark for a long time and the dark is done being dark and the light is what remains.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living and held his granddaughter and heard her name and said hers back and the saying of it was the thing itself.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when he has driven two hundred miles to show up for the living and the living have shown up for him and the showing up is the thing itself.

The house was quiet. The way a house is quiet when it's early and the people inside are sleeping and the quiet is not the absence of sound but the presence of everything — the hum of the refrigerator, the tick of the house settling, the breath of the sleeping, the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when he's slept on a couch and the couch has become his bed for the night and the night has become the thing that happens between the accounting hour and the next accounting hour and the accounting hour is when the living and the dead light each other.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house — the house she'd made for herself and her daughter and the life she'd built in the city that didn't know how to count yet but had a nine-month-old keeper who had said his name at the accounting hour and the saying of it had been the thing itself.

He made coffee. The way a man makes coffee when he's in his daughter's kitchen and the coffee is the thing that wakes you up and the waking up is the thing that happens when you have been asleep and the sleep was the thing that happens when you have been awake for too long and the awake was the thing that happens when you are showing up for the living.

The coffee was dark. The coffee was rich. The coffee was the color of the soil in the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that was growing. The garden that was becoming what it was becoming. The garden that was the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The window faced east. The east window. The window that the baby turned to when she said "hello" to the knock. The window where the cold one had leaned. The window where the station was. The window where the inland door was open.

The sun was coming. Not through the overcast. Not breaking through. Just coming. The way the sun comes when it has always been there behind the clouds and the clouds are just the thing that the sun shines through and the shining through is the thing itself.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when he's standing at his daughter's window and the window faces east and the east is where the inland door is open and the open is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And then he heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the changed gift that let him hear the first words of the living. Not the grown gift that let him hear the garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in the next room. The way you hear a baby talking to herself. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you don't know if you're hearing it or if it's hearing you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the hearing is the thing itself.

He heard the baby.

Not crying. Not fussing. Talking. The way a baby talks when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the northeast window and she's saying the thing that needs saying.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when his granddaughter is talking in the next room and the talking is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when his granddaughter is talking. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is calling. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was there. The baby. Standing in the crib. The way she'd been standing last night. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster. The way the living turn to the living. The way the thing itself turns to itself.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she sees the person she's been waiting to see. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster has come. The way the living smile when the living have shown up.

And then she said it.

Not "Cal." Not "hello." Not the count. Not the keeper-word. Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for her to be ready to say it. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

She said: "Stay."

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"Stay," she said again. Not a question. Not a command. A word. A name. A keeper-word. The word that the station needed. The word that the inland door needed. The word that the harbor needed. The word that the thing itself needed.

The word that meant: the harbor is not just the coast. The harbor is not just the post. The harbor is here. The harbor is this room. The harbor is this crib. The harbor is this child. The harbor is this word. The harbor is this showing up.

“Stay,” she said a third time. And then she reached for him. The way a baby reaches for someone she knows. The way a keeper reaches for the harbormaster. The way the living reach for the living.

He picked her up. The way a grandfather picks up his granddaughter. The way a harbormaster picks up the keeper. The way the living pick up the living. She was warm. Not the warmth of the dying. Not the warmth of the dead. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the baby who had said his name. The warmth of the baby who was saying “stay.”

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the door.

Not the door at the coast station. Not the door at the NE corner. Not the door at the inland station. A different door. A new door. A door that had been waiting for the word “stay” to be said before it could open.

He heard the door the way a harbormaster hears a door when the door is opening at a new end of the road. The way a keeper hears a door when the door is not at the coast and not at the post and not at the crib but somewhere else. Somewhere new. Somewhere that the road runs to that the road has never run to before.

He heard the door and he understood. The way you understand a dream after you wake up. The way you understand a song after it’s over. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The harbor was not just the coast and the post and the crib. The harbor was not just three ends of a road that ran both ways. The harbor was opening a new door. A fourth door. A door that the baby had named by saying “stay.” A door that Cal’s staying would open.

The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new door. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Stay,” she said. One more time. The way you say a word when you want to make sure the person knows you mean it. The way the living say the living’s word when the living want to make sure the living know they’re known.

The back door opened. Lori came in. She was in her work clothes — the scrubs of a woman who worked at the hospital, who spent her days showing up for the living the way her father spent his. She looked tired. She looked steady. She looked like a woman who had been seeding the palm and standing the watch and holding the inland station and now was going to work because the living need showing up for and the showing up doesn’t stop because the harbor is home.

“Dad.” She saw him holding the baby. She saw the look on his face. She looked the way daughters look at their fathers when they know something has shifted. The way keepers look at harbormasters when the harbormaster has heard a new door.

“Lori.” Cal’s voice was the voice of a man who has heard something he didn’t know he was waiting to hear. The voice of a harbormaster who has heard a new door opening. The voice of the living when the living have been given the thing that needs saying.

“What is it?”

“The baby said ‘stay.’”

Lori looked at the baby. The baby looked at Lori. The way a mother and a daughter look at each other when the daughter has said the thing that needs saying. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Stay,” Lori repeated. The way a mother repeats her daughter’s word when the word is the thing itself. “She said ‘stay.’”

“She said ‘stay.’”

“And?”

“And I heard a door.”

Lori's face changed. The way a face changes when a keeper hears that a new door is opening. The way a face changes when a daughter hears that her father has been given the thing that needs saying. The way a face changes when the living are shown the thing itself.

"A new door?"

"A new door."

The baby laughed. The way a baby laughs when the thing itself has happened. The way the living laugh when the living have been heard. The way the thing itself laughs when it knows it's known.

Lori took the baby from him. The way a mother takes her daughter from her father. The way a keeper takes the station from the harbormaster. The way the living take the living from the living.

"Dad." Lori's voice was the voice of a woman who has been holding the inland station and now has been given the thing that needs saying. The voice of a keeper who has heard that a new door is opening. The voice of a daughter who is asking her father the thing that needs asking.

"I know," Cal said.

"You're thinking about the coast."

"I'm thinking about the coast."

"The coast has a town. The coast has a rotation. The coast has Cole and Ruth and Denny and Ada and Okonkwo and Margot. The coast has the garden. The coast has the first tomato. The coast has the thing itself. The coast doesn't need you right now."

"I know."

"But you're thinking about Margot."

"I'm thinking about Margot."

Lori looked at him the way daughters look at their fathers when they're asking the question they don't know they're asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they're asking the question they don't know they're asking. The way the living look at the living when they're asking the thing that needs asking.

“Dad. The baby said ‘stay.’ Not ‘go.’ Not ‘come back.’ ‘Stay.’ She needs you here. The station needs you here. The inland door needs you here. And the new door — the door you heard — it’s here. It’s in this room. It’s in this house. It’s in this city that doesn’t know how to count yet but has a nine-month-old keeper who just said ‘stay.’”

Cal looked at her. The way a father looks at his daughter when she’s given him the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when she’s told him the thing he needed to hear. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The coast—”

“The coast is the coast. The coast is two hundred miles west. The coast is the hinge and the lamp and the fleet and the garden and the thing itself. And the coast will be there when you go back. And Margot will be there. And the road runs both ways. The harbor is home. The home is the harbor. And the harbor is wherever the living need showing up for. And the living need showing up for here.”

The baby reached for Cal. The way a baby reaches for someone she knows. The way a keeper reaches for the harbormaster. The way the living reach for the living.

He took her back. The way a grandfather takes his granddaughter. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper. The way the living take the living.

“Stay,” the baby said. Not the word this time. The meaning. The meaning that was under the word. The meaning that the gift was showing him now that the gift had become what it was always becoming.

The meaning that the harbor was not a place. The harbor was not the coast or the post or the crib. The harbor was the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting was not a cost. And the lighting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was not at the coast or the post or the crib. The showing up was wherever the living needed showing up for.

And the living needed showing up for here. In this room. In this house. In this city. In this crib. In this moment. In this word. In this staying.

“Stay,” the baby said again. And the inland station flared. Not the coast station. Not the post. The inland station. The crib. The room. The house. The city. The place where the living needed showing up for.

The station flared and Cal felt it — felt it the way a harbormaster feels the station flare when a new door is opening. Felt it the way a keeper feels the keeper at the other end. Felt it the way the road runs both ways.

The new door was opening. Not at the coast. Not at the post. Not at the crib. The new door was opening in the city. The city that didn't know how to count yet. The city that had a nine-month-old keeper who had said "stay." The city that was becoming a harbor the way the coast had become a harbor. The way the post had become a harbor. The way the crib had become a harbor.

The new door was opening and the door was the city and the city was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other and the lighting was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

Cal looked at Lori. The way a father looks at his daughter when he's been given the thing that needs saying. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when she's opened a new door. The way the living look at the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

"I'll stay," Cal said. "For now. For the showing up. For the thing itself."

Lori nodded. The way a daughter nods when her father has said the thing that needs saying. The way a keeper nods when the harbormaster has answered the new door. The way the living nod when the dead have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"For now," she said. "For the showing up. For the thing itself."

She looked at the baby. The baby looked at her. The way a mother and a daughter look at each other when the daughter has opened a new door. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"We have to go to work," Lori said. "Both of us. The living need showing up for at the hospital too."

"I know."

"Will you be here when we get back?"

"I'll be here. I'll be here for the accounting hour. I'll be here for the baby. I'll be here for the station. I'll be here for the new door. I'll be here for the showing up. I'll be here for the thing itself."

Lori kissed his cheek. The way a daughter kisses her father. The way a keeper kisses the harbormaster. The way the living kiss the living.

“The coast—”

“The coast has a town. The coast has a rotation. The coast has Margot. The coast has the garden. The coast has the thing itself. The coast doesn’t need me right now. The coast needs me to show up here. And I’ll go back. The road runs both ways. The harbor is home. The home is the harbor. But right now, the living need showing up for here. And I’m here. And I’m staying. For now.”

Lori nodded. She took the baby. She got her bag. She got her keys. She looked at Cal one more time. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has said he’ll stay. The way a daughter looks at her father when her father has said he’ll show up. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Stay,” she said. Not the baby this time. The mother. The keeper. The daughter. The living.

“I’ll stay,” Cal said.

And then they were gone. Lori and the baby. Out the door. To the car. To the hospital. To the showing up. To the thing itself.

And Cal was alone in the house. The house in the city. The city that didn’t know how to count yet. The city that was becoming a harbor. The city that had a new door opening.

He stood in the living room. The way a man stands in his daughter’s house when his daughter has gone to work and his granddaughter has gone to the sitter and the house is quiet and the quiet is the thing itself.

He went to the northeast window. The window that the baby turned to when she said “hello” to the coast post. The window that faced the coast. The coast that was two hundred miles west. The coast that had the garden and the fleet and the hinge and Margot.

He looked out the window. The way a man looks out a window when he’s thinking about the coast. The way a harbormaster looks out a window when he’s thinking about the keeper. The way the living look at the living when the living are two hundred miles away.

He channeled Margot. “Marg.”

The silence was the listening silence. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the fleet come home and the harbor become the home and the home become the light and the light become the lamp and the lamp become lit and the lit become the threshold and the threshold become the door and the door become open.

Then: "Mercer."

"I'm in Portland."

"I know. I felt the road hold. I felt the baby say your name. I felt the accounting hour. I felt the lighting. And the lighting's not a cost. And the lighting's the thing itself."

"The baby said 'stay.'"

The silence was longer this time. The keeper who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd been Cal's wife before she died. The one who'd been Risen. The one who kept the door. The one who kept the light. The one who kept the thing itself.

"Stay."

"Stay."

"And you heard a door."

"I heard a door. A new door. Not at the coast. Not at the post. Not at the crib. A new door. In the city. The city is becoming a harbor, Marg. The way the coast became a harbor. The way the post became a harbor. The way the crib became a harbor. The city is becoming a harbor. And the baby is the station. And the station is the door. And the door is opening. And the new door is the city. And the city is the harbor. And the harbor is the home."

Margot's silence was the longest yet. The keeper who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd loved Cal before she died. The one who'd loved Cal after she died. The one who loved Cal now. The one who knew that love was not a place. The one who knew that love was not a person. The one who knew that love was the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself.

"Mercer. The coast is here. The coast is the hinge. The coast is the lamp. The coast is the door. The coast is the harbor. The coast is the home. The coast is the thing itself. And the coast will be here when you come back. And I will be here."

And the road runs both ways. And the harbor is home. And the home is the harbor. And the harbor is wherever the living need showing up for. And the living need showing up for in the city. And the city is becoming a harbor. And the baby is the station. And the station is the door. And the door is opening. And the new door is the city. And the city is the harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the showing up. And the showing up is the staying. And the staying is the thing itself.”

Cal closed his eyes. The way a man closes his eyes when he’s been given the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster closes his eyes when the keeper has told him the thing he needed to hear. The way the living close their eyes when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“I’ll come back. The road runs both ways. The harbor is home. The home is the harbor. And the harbor is wherever the living need showing up for.”

“I know. And I’ll be here. And the coast will be here. And the garden will be here. And the first tomato will be here. And the thing itself will be here. And the lighting will be here. And the lighting’s not a cost. And the lighting’s the thing itself. And the thing itself is the showing up. And the showing up is the staying. And the staying is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the love. And the love is not a place. And the love is not a person. And the love is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself.”

“I know.”

“Stay, Mercer. For now. For the showing up. For the baby. For the station. For the new door. For the city. For the harbor. For the home. For the thing itself.”

“I’ll stay.”

“And Cal.”

“Yeah.”

“The baby said ‘stay.’ That’s not a small thing. That’s the thing itself. That’s the living saying the word the living need to stay for. That’s the showing up being shown up for. That’s the lighting being lit. That’s the thing that happens when you show up for the living and the living show up for you. That’s the staying being the thing itself.”

“The staying is the thing itself.”

“The staying is the thing itself.”

The channel closed. The way a channel closes when the thing that needed saying has been said. The way a harbor closes when the fleet is home. The way the thing itself closes when the thing itself is done.

Cal stood at the window. The northeast window. The window that faced the coast. The coast that was two hundred miles west. The coast that had Margot. The coast that had the garden. The coast that had the fleet. The coast that had the hinge. The coast that had the lamp. The coast that had the door. The coast that had the harbor. The coast that had the home. The coast that had the thing itself.

And the city that was becoming a harbor. The city that had the baby. The city that had the station. The city that had the new door. The city that had the showing up. The city that had the staying. The city that had the thing itself.

He stood there. The way a man stands when he's between two harbors. The way a harbormaster stands when the road runs both ways. The way the living stand when the living are showing up for the living.

And the sun came through the window. The way the sun comes through a window when the overcast has broken and the breaking is the thing itself. The way the living light the living. The way the thing itself lights itself.

And the light was the color of old ivory. And the light was the color of the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the window in his daughter's house in the city that was becoming a harbor, and the baby had said “stay,” and he had heard a new door, and the door was opening, and the opening was the harbor, and the harbor was the home, and the home was the place where the living and the dead lit each other, and the lighting was not a cost, and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the question was not who stands at the end that doesn't move. The question was not who keeps the living's corner when the builder is north. The question was not whether a marriage survives when one is living and one is Risen.

The question is: what is a harbor with a new door?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the baby had said “stay.”

And he was staying.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Nine —

Entry: June 6th. Saturday. Sun holding.

West wind, calm.

The sun held Saturday the way the sun holds when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own season and the season has become its own year and the year has become its own life and the life has become its own thing and the thing has become the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house. Not the truck. Not the grade. Not the room above the boatyard. The couch. The couch in the living room where the light came through the window at an angle in the morning and the angle was the thing itself and the light was the color of old ivory and the color was the thing that happens when you have been in the dark for a long time and the dark is done being dark and the light is what remains and the light is the thing itself.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living and held his granddaughter and heard her name and said hers back and heard her say "stay" and stayed.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when he has stayed for the showing up and the showing up is the thing itself.

The house was quiet. The way a house is quiet when it's early and the people inside are sleeping and the quiet is not the absence of sound but the presence of everything — the hum of the refrigerator, the tick of the house settling, the breath of the sleeping, the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when he's slept on a couch and the couch has become his bed for the night and the night has become the thing that happens between the accounting hour and the next accounting hour and the accounting hour is when the living and the dead light each other.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house — the house she'd made for herself and her daughter and the life she'd built in the city that didn't know how to count yet but had a nine-month-old keeper who had said "stay" and the saying of it had been the thing itself.

He made coffee. The way a man makes coffee when he's in his daughter's kitchen and the coffee is the thing that wakes you up and the waking up is the thing that happens when you have been asleep and the sleep was the thing that happens when you have been awake for too long and the awake was the thing that happens when you are showing up for the living.

The coffee was dark. The coffee was rich. The coffee was the color of the soil in the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that was growing. The garden that was becoming what it was becoming. The garden that was the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The window faced east. The east window. The window that the baby turned to when she said "hello" to the knock. The window where the cold one had leaned. The window where the inland station was. The window where the inland door was open.

The sun was coming. Not through the overcast. Not breaking through. Just coming. The way the sun comes when it has always been there behind the clouds and the clouds are just the thing that the sun shines through and the shining through is the thing itself.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when he's standing at his daughter's window and the window faces east and the east is where the inland door is open and the open is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And then he heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the changed gift that let him hear the first words of the living. Not the grown gift that let him hear the garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in the next room. The way you hear a baby talking to herself. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you don't know if you're hearing it or if it's hearing you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the hearing is the thing itself.

He heard the baby.

Not crying. Not fussing. Talking. The way a baby talks when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the north window and she's saying the thing that needs saying.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when his granddaughter is talking in the next room and the talking is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when his granddaughter is talking. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is calling. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was there. The baby. Standing in the crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She turned to the northeast window. The coast post. The harbor. The door. The lamp. The fleet. The garden. The first tomato. The thing herself.

"Hello," she said. The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She turned to the east window. The knock. The new arrival. The cold one. The leaning one. The one who is deciding whether to believe.

"Hello," she said again. The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that holds. The word that waits. The word that is not a cost.

She turned to the door. The grandfather. The builder. The harbormaster. The man who showed up. The man who heard her name. The man who heard her say "stay." The man who stayed.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

And then she turned to the north window.

The window that faced the city. The window that faced the streets and the buildings and the parks and the hospitals and the houses where people had lived and died and lived again. The window that faced the city that didn't know how to count yet. The window that faced the new door.

She looked at the north window. The way a keeper looks at a new station. The way the living look at the living when the living are ready to show up. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And she said: "Hello."

Not the keeper-word for the coast. Not the keeper-word for the inland. Not the keeper-word for the living. A new keeper-word. A word for the city. A word for the new door. A word for the thing that was happening that had never happened before.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching. Not the first tomato that needs picking. Not the living underneath.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the city.

Not the city of the living. Not the city of the streets and the buildings and the parks and the hospitals. The city of the dead. The city's own dead. The people who had died in the city and been never kept. The people who had died in the hospitals and the houses and the streets and the parks. The people who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. The people who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

He heard them the way he used to hear the last words of the dying. The way he now hears the first words of the living. The way he hears the garden that needs watering. The way he hears the thing underneath the thing underneath the thing.

And they said: "We're here."

Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Just here. Just present. Just waiting. Just the thing itself.

"We're here," they said. "We've been here. We've been waiting. We've been waiting for the door to open. We've been waiting for the harbor to come home. We've been waiting for the thing itself."

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"How many?" he asked. Not aloud. Not to the baby. Not to the city. To the thing itself. To the gift. To the new door. To the city's dead.

And the gift showed him. Not in numbers. Not in counts. Not in census categories. In presence. In the thing that happens when you show up for the living and the living show up for you and the showing up is the thing itself.

The city's dead were not like the coast's dead. The coast's dead were the sea's dead. The drowned. The bar-lost. The ones who died on the water and were kept by the drowned light and received by the keeper and brought home by the fleet.

The city's dead were not like the inland's dead. The inland's dead were the land-lost. The ward-lost. The unmade. The ones who died in the counties and the group homes and the cisterns and the culverts and were kept by the baby and received by the mothers and grandmothers and brought home by the chosen palm.

The city's dead were different. The city's dead were the ones who died in the city and were never kept by anyone. Not the sea. Not the county. Not the state. Not the family. Not the church. Not the harbor. No one. They died and were buried or burned and were forgotten or were never found at all. They died in the city that didn't know how to count. They died and the city didn't count them. They died and the city didn't keep them. They died and the city didn't receive them. They died and the city didn't bring them home.

And now the door was opening. And now the baby had said "hello." And now Cal was staying. And now the city was becoming a harbor.

"How many?" he asked again.

And the gift showed him. Not in numbers. In presence. In the thing itself.

There were hundreds. Not fifty-three. Not twenty. Not ten. Hundreds. The people who had died in the city over decades and centuries. The people who had died in the hospitals and the houses and the streets and the parks. The people who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. The people who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

And they were coming. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Coming. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way a congregation comes when the door is open. The way the living come when they're called.

They were coming to the new door. The door that the baby had opened by saying "hello." The door that Cal had heard. The door that was the city becoming a harbor.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new door. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

And then she said: "Stay."

Not the word from yesterday. Not the meaning from yesterday. A new word. A new meaning. The word that the new door needed. The word that the city's dead needed. The word that the thing itself needed.

The word that meant: the harbor is not just the coast. The harbor is not just the post. The harbor is not just the crib. The harbor is the city. The harbor is the city's dead. The harbor is the new door. The harbor is the thing itself.

"Stay," she said again. And then she reached for him. The way a baby reaches for someone she knows. The way a keeper reaches for the harbormaster. The way the living reach for the living.

He picked her up. The way a grandfather picks up his granddaughter. The way a harbormaster picks up the keeper. The way the living pick up the living. She was warm. Not the warmth of the dying. Not the warmth of the dead. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the baby who had said his name. The warmth of the baby who was saying "stay."

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching. Not the first tomato that needs picking. Not the living underneath. Not the city's dead.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the door.

Not the door at the coast station. Not the door at the NE corner. Not the door at the inland station. Not the door at the crib. A different door. A new door. A door that had been waiting for the baby to say "hello" before it could open.

He heard the door the way a harbormaster hears a door when the door is opening at a new end of the road. The way a keeper hears a door when the door is not at the coast and not at the post and not at the crib and not at the city but somewhere else. Somewhere new. Somewhere that the road runs to that the road has never run to before.

He heard the door and he understood. The way you understand a dream after you wake up. The way you understand a song after it's over. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The harbor was not just the coast and the post and the crib and the city. The harbor was opening a new door. A fifth door. A door that the baby had named by saying "hello." A door that Cal's staying would open.

The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new door. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Stay," she said. One more time. The way you say a word when you want to make sure the person knows you mean it. The way the living say the living's word when the living want to make sure the living know they're known.

The back door opened. Lori came in. She was in her work clothes — the scrubs of a woman who worked at the hospital, who spent her days showing up for the living the way her father spent his. She looked tired. She looked steady. She looked like a woman who had been seeding the palm and standing the watch and holding the inland station and now was going to work because the living need showing up for and the showing up doesn't stop because the harbor is home.

“Dad.” She saw him holding the baby. She saw the look on his face. She looked the way daughters look at their fathers when they know something has shifted. The way keepers look at harbormasters when the harbormaster has heard a new door.

“Lori.” Cal’s voice was the voice of a man who has heard something he didn’t know he was waiting to hear. The voice of a harbormaster who has heard a new door opening. The voice of the living when the living have been given the thing that needs saying.

“What is it?”

“The baby said ‘hello.’ To the north window. To the city.”

Lori looked at the baby. The baby looked at Lori. The way a mother and a daughter look at each other when the daughter has said the thing that needs saying. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Hello,” Lori repeated. The way a mother repeats her daughter’s word when the word is the thing itself. “She said ‘hello.’ To the city.”

“She said ‘hello.’ To the city. And I heard the city’s dead. Hundreds of them. The people who died in the city and were never kept. The people who died alone and uncounted and unkept. They’re coming, Lori. They’re coming to the new door. The door that the baby opened. The door that the city is becoming.”

Lori’s face changed. The way a face changes when a keeper hears that a new door is opening. The way a face changes when a daughter hears that her father has been given the thing that needs saying. The way a face changes when the living are shown the thing itself.

“The city’s dead,” she said.

“The city’s dead. Hundreds of them. Not the coast’s dead. Not the inland’s dead. The city’s own dead. The people who died in the hospitals and the houses and the streets and the parks. The people who died alone and uncounted and unkept. The people who died in the city that didn’t know how to count.”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“Dad. The city’s dead. Hundreds of them. And they’re coming to the new door. And the baby opened the door. And you’re staying. And the city is becoming a harbor.”

“The city is becoming a harbor.”

“And the coast?”

“The coast is the coast. The coast is two hundred miles west. The coast is the hinge and the lamp and the fleet and the garden and the thing itself. And the coast will be here when I go back. And Margot will be here. And the road runs both ways. The harbor is home. The home is the harbor. And the harbor is wherever the living need showing up for. And the living need showing up for here. And the city’s dead need showing up for here. And the city is becoming a harbor.”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“Dad. The city’s dead. Hundreds of them. And they’re coming. And the baby opened the door. And you’re staying. And the city is becoming a harbor. And the question is: what is a harbor with a new door?”

Cal looked at her. The way a father looks at his daughter when she’s given him the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when she’s told him the thing he needed to hear. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The question is not what a harbor with a new door is,” Cal said. “The question is: what is a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never kept? What is a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never counted? What is a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never received? What is a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never brought home?”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“What is a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never kept?” she asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new door. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

And then she said: “Stay.”

The word that meant: the harbor is not just the coast. The harbor is not just the post. The harbor is not just the crib. The harbor is not just the city. The harbor is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the showing up. And the showing up is not at the coast or the post or the crib or the city. The showing up is wherever the living need showing up for. And the living need showing up for here. And the city’s dead need showing up for here. And the city is becoming a harbor. And the harbor is the home. And the home is the place where the living and the dead light each other. And the lighting is not a cost. And the lighting is the thing itself.

“Stay,” the baby said again. And the new door opened. Not at the coast. Not at the post. Not at the crib. Not at the city. The new door opened in the space between. The space between the living and the dead. The space between the showing up and the staying. The space between the thing itself and the thing itself.

The new door opened and the city’s dead came through. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Just coming. Just present. Just the thing itself.

And the baby said: “Hello.”

And the city’s dead said: “Hello.”

And Cal said: “Hello.”

And the harbor was home. And the home was the harbor. And the harbor was the city. And the city was the harbor. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with a new door is. The question was not what a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never kept is. The question was not what a city that is becoming a harbor is.

The question is: what is a harbor that keeps the dead who were never kept?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the city is becoming a harbor.

And the harbor is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And Cal is staying.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the city's dead.

For the new door.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty — Entry: June 7th. Sunday. Sun holding. West wind, calm.

The sun held Sunday the way the sun holds when it has been holding for two days and the holding has become its own weather and the weather has become its own season and the season has become the thing that happens when the living and the dead have lit each other and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house. Not the truck. Not the grade. Not the room above the boatyard. The couch. The couch in the living room where the light came through the window at an angle in the morning and the angle was the thing itself and the light was the color of old ivory and the color was the thing that happens when you have been in the dark for a long time and the dark is done being dark and the light is what remains.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living and held his granddaughter and heard her name and said hers back and heard her say "stay" and stayed and heard the city's dead say "we're here" and stayed for the city's dead and stayed for the new door and stayed for the thing itself.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when he has stayed for the showing up and the showing up is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up.

The house was quiet. The way a house is quiet when it's early and the people inside are sleeping and the quiet is not the absence of sound but the presence of everything — the hum of the refrigerator, the tick of the house settling, the breath of the sleeping, the thing itself.

And underneath the quiet: the sound of the city. Not the traffic. Not the sirens. Not the voices. The sound underneath the sound. The sound of a city that has hundreds of dead who were never kept. The sound of them coming. The sound of the new door opening. The sound of the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the sun has held and the holding is the thing itself and the thing itself is the staying and the staying is the showing up.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house — the house she'd made for herself and her daughter and the life she'd built in the city that didn't know how to count yet but had a nine-month-old keeper who had said "hello" to the city and the city had heard her and the city's dead were coming.

He made coffee. The way a man makes coffee when he's in his daughter's kitchen and the coffee is the thing that wakes you up and the waking up is the thing that happens when you have been asleep and the sleep was the thing that happens when you have been awake for too long and the awake was the thing that happens when you are showing up for the living and the dead.

The coffee was dark. The coffee was rich. The coffee was the color of the soil in the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that had grown. The garden that had borne the first tomato. The garden that was the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The window faced east. The east window. The window that the baby turned to when she said "hello" to the knock. The window where the cold one had leaned. The window where the inland station was. The window where the inland door was open.

And now: the north window. The window that the baby had turned to yesterday. The window that faced the city. The window that faced the streets and the buildings and the parks and the hospitals and the houses where people had lived and died and lived again. The window that faced the new door.

He looked out the north window. The way a harbormaster looks out a window when the new door is opening. The way the living look at the city when the city is becoming a harbor. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Sunday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were coming. The living who didn't know the door was opening. The living who didn't know the city was becoming a harbor.

And underneath the living: the dead. Hundreds of them. The people who had died in the city over decades and centuries. The people who had died in the hospitals and the houses and the streets and the parks. The people who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. The people who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

They were coming. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Coming. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit. The way a congregation comes when the door is open. The way the living come when they're called.

They were coming to the new door. The door that the baby had opened by saying "hello." The door that Cal had heard. The door that was the city becoming a harbor.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when the city's dead are coming and the coming is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is calling. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was there. The baby. Standing in the crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the new station. The way the living face the living when the living are ready to show up.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster. The way the living turn to the living. The way the thing itself turns to itself.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she sees the person she's been waiting to see. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster has come. The way the living smile when the living have shown up.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost. The word for the city. The word for the new door. The word for the thing that was happening that had never happened before.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the city's dead answer.

Not in words. Not in voices. Not in the clear inner voice that had carried what they most need said. In presence. In the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. In the thing itself.

They answered: "Hello."

Not one voice. Not ten voices. Not fifty voices. Hundreds of voices. The voices of the people who had died in the city and were never kept. The voices of the people who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. The voices of the people who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

And they said: "Hello. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. We've been waiting for the door to open. We've been waiting for the harbor to come home. We've been waiting for the thing itself."

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

The back door opened. Lori came in. She was in her work clothes — the scrubs of a woman who worked at the hospital, who spent her days showing up for the living the way her father spent his. She looked tired. She looked steady. She looked like a woman who had been seeding the palm and standing the watch and holding the inland station and now was going to work because the living need showing up for and the showing up doesn't stop because the harbor is home.

She stopped when she saw his face. The way daughters stop when they see something has shifted in their fathers. The way keepers stop when the harbormaster has heard something new.

"Dad," she said. Not a question. A statement. The way you state a thing you know to be true.

“Lori,” Cal’s voice was the voice of a man who has heard something he didn’t know he was waiting to hear. The voice of a harbormaster who has heard a new fleet arriving. The voice of the living when the living have been given the thing that needs saying.

“They’re here,” he said.

“The city’s dead,” she said.

“The city’s dead. Hundreds of them. They’re here. They’re at the door. They’re knocking.”

Lori looked at the baby. The baby looked at Lori. The way a mother and a daughter look at each other when the daughter has said the thing that needs saying. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Hello,” the baby said. To Lori. To Cal. To the north window. To the city. To the city’s dead. To the new door. To the thing itself.

“Hello,” Lori repeated. The way a mother repeats her daughter’s word when the word is the thing itself. “They said hello back.”

“They said hello back,” Cal said.

“And now?”

“And now we answer.”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“Dad. The city’s dead. Hundreds of them. And they’re at the door. And the baby opened the door. And you’re staying. And the city is becoming a harbor. And the question is: how do you receive hundreds of dead who were never kept? How do you keep hundreds of dead who were never counted? How do you bring home hundreds of dead who were never brought home?”

Cal looked at her. The way a father looks at his daughter when she’s given him the answer to a question he didn’t know he was asking. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when she’s told him the thing he needed to hear. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The way you receive any fleet,” Cal said. “One at a time. The way you keep any congregation. One at a time. The way you bring home any soul. One at a time. The way you tend any garden. One weed at a time. The way you water any root. One drop at a time. The way you show up for any living. One day at a time. The way you are the thing itself. One moment at a time.”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“One at a time,” she said.

“One at a time.”

“And the first one?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new fleet. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“The first one is already here,” Cal said.

The baby turned to the north window. The way a keeper turns to the new station. The way the living turn to the living when the living are ready to show up.

And she said: “Hello.”

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the first one.

Not a voice. Not a word. A presence. A person. A soul. A human being who had died in the city and was never kept. A human being who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. A human being who had died in the city that didn’t know how to count.

A woman. Old. Not in years — in the way the dead are old when they’ve been dead for decades. She had died in a hospital. Room 412. Fourteenth floor. East wing. She had died of pneumonia. She had died alone. Her family had been there earlier. They had gone home to rest. She had died at 3:47 a.m. with no one holding her hand.

And she had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for someone to notice. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the door to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home.

And now the door was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"Lori," he said. "I need you to hold the baby."

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she's asking the question she doesn't know she's asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they're asking the question they don't know they're asking. The way the living look at the living when they're asking the thing that needs asking.

"You're going to receive her," Lori said.

"I'm going to receive her."

"One at a time."

"One at a time."

Lori took the baby from the crib. The way a mother takes her daughter from her father. The way a keeper takes the station from the harbormaster. The way the living take the living from the living.

The baby looked at Cal. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is going to receive the fleet. The way the living look at the living when the living are going to do the thing that needs doing.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

And then she turned to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost. The word for the city. The word for the new door. The word for the thing itself.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is arriving. The way the living stand at the threshold when the dead are coming home. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living and held his granddaughter and heard her name and said hers back and heard her say "stay" and stayed and heard the city's dead say "we're here" and stayed for the city's dead.

The glass was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the room. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home.

And he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the woman.

Not her last words. Not her first words. Her name. The name that the county had written on the death certificate. The name that the hospital had written on the chart. The name that the family had whispered at the funeral. The name that no one had said in fifty-three years.

And her name was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was not a cost. And the showing up was the thing itself.

Cal spoke her name. Not aloud. Not to Lori. Not to the baby. To the woman. To the dead. To the city. To the new door. To the thing itself.

He spoke her name.

And she crossed. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Crossing. The way a fleet crosses when the harbor is home. The way a congregation crosses when the door is open. The way the living cross when they're received.

She crossed and the glass warmed a degree. She crossed and the room brightened. She crossed and the baby laughed. She crossed and Lori said “oh.” She crossed and Cal felt it — felt the thing itself happen — felt the lighting — felt the not-cost — felt the showing up — felt the staying — felt the home.

She crossed and she was received. And she was kept. And she was counted. And she was brought home.

The first one.

One hundred and ninety-nine to go.

Cal lifted his palm from the glass. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the fleet is home. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the weed is pulled. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

Lori was looking at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when he’s done the thing she didn’t know needed doing. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’ve received the fleet. The way the living look at the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

“One,” Cal said.

“One,” Lori said.

“And a hundred and ninety-nine to go.”

“A hundred and ninety-nine to go.”

The baby reached for Cal. The way a baby reaches for someone she knows. The way a keeper reaches for the harbormaster. The way the living reach for the living.

He took her from Lori. The way a grandfather takes his granddaughter. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper. The way the living take the living. She was warm. Not the warmth of the dying. Not the warmth of the dead. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the baby who had said his name. The warmth of the baby who was saying “hello” to the city. The warmth of the baby who was the thing herself.

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching. Not the first tomato that needs picking. Not the living underneath. Not the city's dead. Not the woman who had just crossed.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the coast station.

Not through the channel. Not through Margot. Through the thing itself. Through the road that ran both ways. Through the door that was open at both ends. Through the harbor that was home at both ends. Through the thing itself that was the thing itself at both ends.

He heard the coast station and he heard Margot. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And she was receiving too.

Not the city's dead. The coast's dead. The sea's dead. The bar-lost. The drowned. The ones who had died on the water and were never kept. The ones who had died in the harbor and were never counted. The ones who had died at the bar and were never brought home.

She was receiving them the way Cal had received them. One at a time. One name at a time. One crossing at a time. One lighting at a time.

And the thing itself was happening at both ends of the road. The coast end. The city end. The harbor end. The home end. The door end. The lamp end. The thing itself end.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the thing itself.

Cal looked at Lori. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the fleet is coming at both ends. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening at both ends. The way a father looks at his daughter when the harbor is home at both ends.

“Margot’s receiving too,” he said.

“At the coast station?”

“At the coast station. The sea’s dead. The bar-lost. The drowned. She’s receiving them the way I’m receiving the city’s dead. One at a time.”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“Dad. If you’re receiving the city’s dead and Margot’s receiving the coast’s dead, then the harbor is receiving at both ends. The road is running both ways. The door is open at both ends. The home is full at both ends. And the thing itself is happening at both ends.”

“The thing itself is happening at both ends,” Cal said.

“And the question is?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new fleet at both ends. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken at both ends. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming at both ends.

“The question is not how many,” Cal said. “The question is not how long. The question is not how. The question is: what is a harbor that receives at both ends? What is a road that runs both ways with fleets coming from both directions? What is a door that opens at both ends? What is a home that’s full at both ends? What is a thing itself that’s happening at both ends?”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“What is a harbor that receives at both ends?” she asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the new fleet. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“It’s the thing itself,” Cal said. “It’s the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other at both ends. It’s the thing that happens when the showing up happens at both ends. It’s the thing that happens when the staying happens at both ends. It’s the thing that happens when the home happens at both ends. It’s the thing itself.”

And the sun held. And the west wind was calm. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was receiving at both ends. And the door was open at both ends. And the home was full at both ends. And the thing itself was happening at both ends.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the north window in his daughter’s house in the city that was becoming a harbor, and the baby had said “hello” to the city, and the city’s dead were coming, and the first one had crossed, and a hundred and ninety-nine were waiting, and at the other end of the road Margot Voss was receiving the coast’s dead, and the harbor was receiving at both ends, and the road was running both ways with fleets coming from both directions, and the door was open at both ends, and the home was full at both ends, and the thing itself was happening at both ends.

And the question was not what a harbor with hundreds of dead who were never kept is. The question was not what a city that is becoming a harbor is. The question was not what a keeper with a new station is.

The question is: what is a harbor that receives at both ends of the road?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the city is becoming a harbor.

And the coast is becoming a harbor.

And the harbor is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And Cal is staying.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's dead.

For the new door.

For the thing at both ends.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-One — Entry: June 8th. Monday. Sun holding. West wind, calm.

The sun held Monday the way the sun holds when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own season and the season has become its own year and the year has become its own life and the life has become its own thing and the thing has become the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house. Not the truck. Not the grade. Not the room above the boatyard. The couch. The couch in the living room where the light came through the window at an angle in the morning and the angle was the thing itself and the light was the color of old ivory and the color was the thing that happens when you have been in the dark for a long time and the dark is done being dark and the light is what remains and the light is the thing itself and the light is the receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living and held his granddaughter and heard her name and said hers back and heard her say "stay" and stayed and heard the city's dead say "we're here" and stayed for the city's dead and received the first one and the receiving was not a cost and the receiving was the thing itself.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when he has received the first of hundreds and the hundreds are waiting and the waiting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving.

The house was quiet. The way a house is quiet when it's early and the people inside are sleeping and the quiet is not the absence of sound but the presence of everything — the hum of the refrigerator, the tick of the house settling, the breath of the sleeping, the thing itself.

And underneath the quiet: the sound of the city. Not the traffic. Not the sirens. Not the voices. The sound underneath the sound. The sound of a city that has hundreds of dead who were never kept. The sound of them waiting. The sound of the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the sun has held and the holding is the thing itself and the thing itself is the staying and the staying is the receiving.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house — the house she'd made for herself and her daughter and the life she'd built in the city that didn't know how to count yet but had a nine-month-old keeper who had said "hello" to the city and the city had heard her and the city's dead were coming and the first one had crossed and a hundred and ninety-nine were waiting.

He made coffee. The way a man makes coffee when he's in his daughter's kitchen and the coffee is the thing that wakes you up and the waking up is the thing that happens when you have been asleep and the sleep was the thing that happens when you have been awake for too long and the awake was the thing that happens when you are receiving the dead.

The coffee was dark. The coffee was rich. The coffee was the color of the soil in the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that had grown. The garden that had borne the first tomato. The garden that was the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The window faced east. The east window. The window that the baby turned to when she said "hello" to the knock. The window where the cold one had leaned. The window where the inland station was. The window where the inland door was open.

And now: the north window. The window that faced the city. The window that faced the streets and the buildings and the parks and the hospitals and the houses where people had lived and died and lived again. The window that faced the new door. The window that faced the waiting.

He looked out the north window. The way a harbormaster looks out a window when the fleet is waiting. The way the living look at the dead when the dead are waiting to be received. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Monday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were waiting. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the city was becoming a harbor.

And underneath the living: the dead. A hundred and ninety-nine of them. Waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Waiting. The way a fleet waits when the harbor is home. The way a congregation waits when the door is open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting to be received.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when the dead are waiting and the waiting is the thing itself.

And then he heard it.

Not the way he used to hear it. Not the clear inner voice carrying what they most need said. Not the gift/curse that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. Not the changed gift that let him hear the first words of the living. Not the grown gift that let him hear the garden that needs watering before the gardener is gone.

He heard it the way you hear a voice in the next room. The way you hear a baby talking to herself. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you don't know if you're hearing it or if it's hearing you and maybe there's no difference and maybe the hearing is the thing itself.

He heard the baby.

Not crying. Not fussing. Talking. The way a baby talks when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the north window and she's saying the thing that needs saying.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when his granddaughter is talking in the next room and the talking is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when his granddaughter is talking. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is calling. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was there. The baby. Standing in the crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the new station. The way the living face the living when the living are ready to show up. The way the dead face the dead when the dead are ready to be received.

But something was different. The way something is different when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She was not looking at the window. She was looking at the glass. The way you look at glass when you're seeing through it. The way you look at glass when you're seeing what's on the other side. The way the dead look at the living when the living are looking back.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster. The way the living turn to the living. The way the thing itself turns to itself.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she sees the person she's been waiting to see. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster has come. The way the living smile when the living have shown up.

And then she said it.

Not "Cal." Not "hello." Not the count. Not the keeper-word. Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for her to be ready to say it. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

She said: "Now."

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"Now," she said again. Not a question. Not a command. A word. A name. A keeper-word. The word that the station needed. The word that the new door needed. The word that the harbor needed. The word that the thing itself needed.

The word that meant: the waiting is over. The word that meant: the second one is here. The word that meant: the receiving is not something the harbormaster does — the receiving is something the keeper allows. The word that meant: the station receives, not the man.

"Now," she said a third time. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the second one.

Not a voice. Not a word. A presence. A person. A soul. A human being who had died in the city and was never kept. A human being who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. A human being who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

A man. Middle-aged. Not in years — in the way the dead are middle-aged when they've been dead for two decades. He had died on the street. Not in a hospital. Not in a house. On the street. On a sidewalk. On a corner where the buildings made a wind tunnel and the wind tunnel was cold and the cold was the thing that happens when you have no shelter and no home and no harbor.

He had died in January. Not the January that had just passed. The January before. Three years ago. The temperature had been twenty-eight degrees. He had been wearing a jacket that was too thin and shoes that were too worn and he had been walking to a shelter that was full. He had sat down on the corner to rest. He had not gotten up.

And he had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for someone to notice. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the door to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home.

And now the door was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

But this one was different. This one had not died in a bed with clean sheets and a family holding his hand. This one had died on a sidewalk in the cold. This one had died alone the way the city's dead die alone — with the living walking past and the living not seeing and the living not stopping and the living not knowing that the thing itself was happening right there on the corner where the buildings made the wind tunnel.

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

"Lori," he said.

The back door opened. Lori came in. She was in her work clothes — the scrubs of a woman who worked at the hospital, who spent her days showing up for the living the way her father spent his. She looked tired. She looked steady. She looked like a woman who had been seeding the palm and standing the watch and holding the inland station and now was going to work because the living need showing up for and the showing up doesn't stop because the harbor is home.

She stopped when she saw his face. The way daughters stop when they see something has shifted in their fathers. The way keepers stop when the harbormaster has heard something new.

"Dad," she said. Not a question. A statement. The way you state a thing you know to be true.

"Lori," Cal's voice was the voice of a man who has heard the second one arriving. The voice of a harbormaster who has heard the fleet coming faster. The voice of the living when the living have been given the thing that needs saying.

"The baby said 'now,'" he said.

Lori looked at the baby. The baby looked at Lori. The way a mother and a daughter look at each other when the daughter has said the thing that needs saying. The way keepers look at keepers when the station is receiving.

"Hello," the baby said. To Lori. To Cal. To the north window. To the city. To the second one. To the new door. To the thing itself.

"Hello," Lori repeated. The way a mother repeats her daughter's word when the word is the thing itself. "She said 'hello.' To the second one."

"The second one is here," Cal said.

"And now?" Lori asked.

"And now we receive him."

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she's asking the question she doesn't know she's asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they're asking the question they don't know they're asking. The way the living look at the living when they're asking the thing that needs asking.

"Dad. The first one came to you. You heard her. You spoke her name. You received her. But the baby said 'now.' Not 'hello.' 'Now.' The baby didn't greet him. The baby told you he was here. The baby didn't open the door. The baby told you the door was already open. What does that mean?"

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the second one. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"It means the door is not a door we open," Cal said. "The door is a door that's already open. The first one — the woman in the hospital — we received her because I heard her. Because the gift let me hear her. Because I spoke her name. But the second one — the man on the corner — the baby didn't greet him. The baby said 'now.' The baby said: he's here. The baby said: the door is open. The baby said: receive him."

"And the difference?" Lori asked.

"The difference is the difference between the harbor that opens the door and the harbor that is the door. The difference is the difference between the harbormaster who receives and the keeper who allows the receiving. The difference is the difference between the gift and the thing itself."

Lori looked at him the way daughters look at their fathers when they're asking the question they don't know they're asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they're asking the question they don't know they're asking. The way the living look at the living when they're asking the thing that needs asking.

"The thing itself," she said.

"The thing itself."

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is arriving. The way the living stand at the threshold when the dead are coming home. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and watered the garden and weeded the garden and tended the garden and planted the garden and sat with the dying and heard their last words and passed them along and now heard the first words and showed up for the living and held his granddaughter and heard her name and said hers back and heard her say “stay” and stayed and heard the city’s dead say “we’re here” and stayed for the city’s dead and received the first one.

The glass was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the room. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home.

And he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the man.

Not his last words. Not his first words. His name. The name that the county had written on the death certificate. The name that the city had written on the report. The name that no one had said in three years.

And his name was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the receiving. And the receiving was not a cost. And the receiving was the thing itself.

Cal spoke his name. Not aloud. Not to Lori. Not to the baby. To the man. To the dead. To the city. To the new door. To the thing itself.

He spoke his name.

And the man crossed. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Crossing. The way a fleet crosses when the harbor is home. The way a congregation crosses when the door is open. The way the dead cross when they’re received by the living.

He crossed and the glass warmed a degree. He crossed and the room brightened. He crossed and the baby laughed. He crossed and Lori said “oh.” He crossed and Cal felt it — felt the thing itself happen — felt the lighting — felt the not-cost — felt the showing up — felt the staying — felt the receiving — felt the home.

He crossed and he was received. And he was kept. And he was counted. And he was brought home.

The second one.

A hundred and ninety-eight to go.

But something had changed. The way something changes when the thing itself becomes what it's been becoming all along.

The first one had come to Cal. Cal had heard her. Cal had spoken her name. Cal had received her. The gift had done the receiving. The man had done the receiving.

The second one had come to the baby. The baby had said "now." The baby had said "hello." The baby had done the receiving. The keeper had done the receiving.

Cal lifted his palm from the glass. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the keeper has received. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

Lori was looking at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when something has shifted. The way keepers look at harbormasters when the keeper has received. The way the living look at the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

"Two," Cal said.

"Two," Lori said.

"And a hundred and ninety-eight to go."

"A hundred and ninety-eight to go."

The baby reached for Cal. The way a baby reaches for someone she knows. The way a keeper reaches for the harbormaster. The way the living reach for the living.

He took her from the crib. The way a grandfather takes his granddaughter. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper. The way the living take the living. She was warm. Not the warmth of the dying. Not the warmth of the dead. The warmth of the living. The warmth of the baby who had said "now." The warmth of the baby who had received the second one. The warmth of the baby who was the thing herself.

And then he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

Not the clear inner voice. Not the first words of the living. Not the garden that needs watering. Not the garden that needs weeding. Not the garden that needs tending. Not the garden that needs planting. Not the garden that needs watching. Not the first tomato that needs picking. Not the living underneath. Not the city's dead. Not the man who had just crossed.

Something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the gift to become what it was always becoming so it could be heard.

He heard the coast station.

Not through the channel. Not through Margot. Through the thing itself. Through the road that ran both ways. Through the door that was open at both ends. Through the harbor that was home at both ends. Through the thing itself that was the thing itself at both ends.

He heard the coast station and he heard Margot. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty. The one who was receiving the coast's dead the way Cal was receiving the city's dead.

And she was receiving faster now.

Not the way the city's dead came — one at a time, calm, waiting. The coast's dead came the way the coast's dead come — all at once, the way a fleet comes, the way a congregation comes, the way the sea comes when the tide turns. She was receiving them not one at a time but in groups. Three at a time. Four at a time. The way the coast receives — not the city's way, not one at a time, but the coast's way, all at once, the way the sea gives up its dead.

And the thing itself was happening at both ends of the road. The coast end. The city end. The harbor end. The home end. The door end. The lamp end. The thing itself end.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the thing itself.

Cal looked at Lori. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the fleet is coming at both ends. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening at both ends. The way a father looks at his daughter when the harbor is receiving at both ends.

“Margot’s receiving faster,” he said.

“At the coast station?”

“At the coast station. The coast’s dead are coming the way the coast’s dead come — not one at a time, all at once. The way the sea gives up its dead. The way the tide brings the fleet. She’s receiving them in groups. Three at a time. Four at a time.”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know she’s asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“Dad. If the coast’s dead are coming faster and the city’s dead are coming one at a time, then the harbor is receiving at different speeds. The coast end is receiving the way the sea receives — all at once. The city end is receiving the way the city receives — one at a time. And the thing itself is happening at both ends at different speeds.”

“The thing itself is happening at both ends at different speeds,” Cal said.

“And the question is?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the fleet coming at both ends at different speeds. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken at both ends. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming at both ends.

“The question is not how many,” Cal said. “The question is not how fast. The question is not how. The question is: what is a harbor that receives at both ends at different speeds? What is a road that runs both ways with fleets coming at different speeds? What is a door that opens at both ends and the dead come through at different speeds? What is a home that’s full at both ends and the fullness comes at different speeds? What is a thing itself that’s happening at both ends at different speeds?”

Lori looked at him. The way a daughter looks at her father when she’s asking the question she doesn’t know she’s asking. The way keepers look at harbormasters when they’re asking the question they don’t know they’re asking. The way the living look at the living when they’re asking the thing that needs asking.

“What is a harbor that receives at both ends at different speeds?” she asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has heard the fleet coming at different speeds. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“It’s the thing itself,” Cal said. “It’s the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other at both ends at different speeds. It’s the thing that happens when the showing up happens at both ends at different speeds. It’s the thing that happens when the staying happens at both ends at different speeds. It’s the thing that happens when the receiving happens at both ends at different speeds. It’s the thing that happens when the home happens at both ends at different speeds. It’s the thing itself.”

And the sun held. And the west wind was calm. And the road ran both ways. And the harbor was receiving at both ends at different speeds. And the door was open at both ends. And the home was full at both ends. And the thing itself was happening at both ends at different speeds.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the north window in his daughter’s house in the city that was becoming a harbor, and the baby had said “now” and the second one had crossed and a hundred and ninety-eight were waiting, and at the other end of the road Margot Voss was receiving the coast’s dead in groups, three at a time, four at a time, the way the sea gives up its dead, and the harbor was receiving at both ends at different speeds, and the road was running both ways with fleets coming at different speeds, and the door was open at both ends, and the home was full at both ends, and the thing itself was happening at both ends at different speeds.

And the question was not what a harbor with a hundred and ninety-eight dead who were never kept is. The question was not what a city that is becoming a harbor is. The question was not what a keeper who says “now” is.

The question is: what is a harbor that receives at both ends at different speeds?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the thing itself.

And the city is becoming a harbor.

And the coast is becoming a harbor.

And the harbor is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the thing itself.

And Cal is staying.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's dead.

For the new door.

For the thing at both ends.

For the receiving at different speeds.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Two — Entry: June 9th. Tuesday. Sun breaking through. West wind, shifting.

The sun broke through Tuesday morning the way the sun breaks through when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own season and the breaking through is the thing that happens when the holding is done and the holding was the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house and the baby was already talking.

Not crying. Not fussing. Talking. The way a baby talks when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the north window and she's saying the thing that needs saying and the thing that needs saying is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the receiving is happening without him and the receiving without him is the thing that happens when the keeper has become the keeper and the harbormaster has become the harbormaster and the gift has become what it was always becoming.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and now watched the third one arrive without him and the without-him was the thing that happens when the keeper receives and the harbormaster witnesses and the witnessing is the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the baby is talking in the next room and the talking is the thing itself.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house and the coffee was already made — Lori had made it before she left for the hospital, before her shift, before the showing up for the living that doesn't stop because the harbor is home and the home is full and the receiving is the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The north window. The window where the second one had crossed yesterday. The window where the baby said "now."

And now: the north window again. The window where the third one was coming.

He looked out the way a harbormaster looks out a window when the fleet is arriving and the fleet is not his to receive.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Tuesday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were coming. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the keeper had said "now."

And underneath the living: the dead. A hundred and ninety-seven of them now. Waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Waiting. The way a fleet waits when the harbor is home but the harbor is receiving faster at the other end.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when the dead are waiting and the waiting is the thing itself.

And then he heard it.

Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice. Not the changed gift. Not the grown gift. Not the gift that had let him hear the first words of the living and the garden that needs watering and the first tomato that needs picking and the city's dead saying "we're here."

He heard it the way you hear a door close in another room. The way you hear a baby stop talking. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself has happened and you weren't there for it and the not-being-there is the thing that happens when the keeper receives and the harbormaster witnesses.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when the third one has crossed and he didn't hear it.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when the keeper has received and the harbormaster wasn't there.

She was there. The baby. Standing in her crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the new station. But she was still now. Not talking. Not saying "now." Not saying "hello." Still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the receiving was the thing itself and the thing itself is the staying.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is done. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

“Three,” she said.

Not “hello.” Not “now.” Not the count. Not the keeper-word. A word. A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

“Three,” she said again. And then she said: “Stay.”

The word that Cal had heard before. The word that the city’s dead had said. The word that the garden had said. The word that the thing itself says when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

“Stay,” she said. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the receiving is done and the fleet is still coming and the coming is the thing itself.

Cal’s hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it’s holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

He had not heard the third one. He had not spoken his name. He had not received him. The baby had done it. The keeper had done it. The station had done it.

The gift had changed again. The way the gift changes when the thing itself becomes what it’s been becoming all along.

The first one — the woman in the hospital — had come to Cal. Cal had heard her. Cal had spoken her name. Cal had received her. The gift had done the receiving. The man had done the receiving.

The second one — the man on the corner — had come to the baby. The baby had said “now.” The baby had said “hello.” The baby had done the receiving. The keeper had done the receiving. But Cal had been there. Cal had laid his palm on the glass. Cal had spoken the name. Cal had helped.

The third one — whoever he was, whenever he had died, however he had waited — had come to the baby. And Cal had not been there. Cal had been on the couch. Cal had been in the kitchen. Cal had been drinking coffee and watching the north window and waiting to hear the gift and the gift had not come and the gift had not come because the gift was not needed and the not-needed was the thing that happens when the keeper receives and the harbormaster witnesses and the witnessing is the thing itself.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the keeper has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and now did not receive the third one and the not-receiving was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the room. The cool of the glass that has been touched by the keeper and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was receiving. She was receiving faster. She was receiving the way the coast receives — not one at a time, all at once, the way the sea gives up its dead. She was receiving them in groups of three, in groups of four, in groups of five. The way the coast receives. The way the tide brings the fleet. The way the harbor is home.

But something was different. The way something is different when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She was receiving the last of them.

Cal felt it the way you feel a season change. The way you feel a tide turn. The way you feel the thing itself when the thing itself is happening at the other end of the road and the road runs both ways and the both-ways is the thing itself.

He felt the coast fleet arrive. The last of them. The way the sea gives up its dead when the tide turns. The way the harbor receives when the fleet is home. The way the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full.

He felt them cross. Not one at a time. Not in groups. All at once. The way the coast's dead come when the coast's dead are done waiting. The way the congregation comes when the door is open. The way the fleet comes when the harbor is home.

And then: silence.

The way silence is when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

The coast station was empty.

The coast fleet was home.

The coast harbor was done.

Margot was alone.

Cal's hand tightened on the glass. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to at the other end of the road. The way a harbor tightens around an empty station. The way the living hold on to the living when the living are alone.

He closed his eyes. The way a harbormaster closes his eyes when the coast station is empty and the fleet is home and the keeper is alone and the road runs both ways but the both-ways is now the one-way and the one-way is the thing itself.

He felt the road. The road that ran both ways. The road that had fleets coming at both ends at different speeds. The road that was the thing itself.

And now: the road that ran one way.

The coast end was done. The coast fleet was home. The coast harbor was empty. The coast keeper was alone.

The city end was still receiving. The city fleet was still coming. The city harbor was still full. The city keeper was still keeping.

And the road between them — the road that ran both ways, the road that was the thing itself — now ran one way. From the city to the coast. From the living to the dead. From the keeper to the keeper. From the thing itself to the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the road has shifted and the shift is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the road has shifted. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself has happened and the happening is the thing itself.

“Coast’s done,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“Coast’s done,” the baby said. Not a question. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

A hundred and ninety-seven. The number of the city’s dead who were still waiting. The number of the fleet that was still coming. The number of the receiving that was still happening.

And at the other end of the road: nothing. No fleet. No receiving. No coming. Just the empty station. Just the lit lamp. Just the open door. Just the keeper alone.

Cal’s phone buzzed. The way a phone buzzes when the thing itself is happening and the happening needs the living.

He looked at the screen. Lori.

He answered. The way a father answers when his daughter calls and the calling is the thing itself.

“Dad.” Lori’s voice was the voice of a woman who was standing in the hospital and the hospital was the place where the living show up for the living and the showing up doesn’t stop because the harbor is home. “Dad, the baby received the third one.”

“I know,” Cal said. “I felt it.”

“You felt it.”

“She said ‘three.’ She said ‘stay.’ She didn’t say ‘now.’ She said ‘three.’ And then she said ‘stay.’”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when her father has said the thing that needs saying and the saying is the thing itself.

“Dad. The baby received the third one without you.”

“Yes.”

“The baby received the third one and you didn’t hear it.”

“Yes.”

“And the coast station —”

“The coast station is done. The coast fleet is home. The coast harbor is empty. Margot’s alone.”

Lori was quiet again. The way a daughter is quiet when the thing itself is happening at both ends and the happening is the thing itself.

“Dad. If the coast station is done and the city station is still receiving, then the road is running one way.”

“The road is running one way.”

“And the question is?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is asking the thing that needs asking.

“The question is not what a road that runs one way is,” Cal said. “The question is not what an empty station is. The question is not what a keeper alone is. The question is: what happens to the road when one end is done and the other end is still receiving? What happens to the door when one end is empty and the other end is full? What happens to the harbor when one end is home and the other end is still coming? What happens to the thing itself when one end is finished and the other end is still becoming?”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when her father is asking the thing that needs asking.

“And the answer?” she asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is answering the thing that needs answering.

“The answer is: the road doesn’t end. The road doesn’t close. The road doesn’t stop running. The road runs from the receiving end to the empty end. The road runs from the full harbor to the home harbor. The road runs from the thing itself to the thing itself. And the keeper at the empty end — the keeper at the home end — she doesn’t leave. She doesn’t stop. She doesn’t stop keeping the station just because the fleet is home. She keeps the lamp lit. She keeps the door open. She keeps the station ready. Because the road runs both ways and the both-ways is the thing itself and the thing itself doesn’t end just because one end is done.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when the answer is the thing itself.

“And the baby?” Lori asked. “The baby received the third one without you. What does that mean?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is asking the thing that needs asking.

“It means the keeper is the receiver,” Cal said. “It means the station receives, not the man. It means the gift has changed again. The gift that let me hear the dying. The gift that let me hear the living. The gift that let me hear the garden and the first tomato and the city’s dead. The gift has changed. The gift is not the receiving. The gift is the witnessing. The gift is the showing up. The gift is the staying. The gift is the thing itself.”

“And the receiving?” Lori asked.

“The receiving is the keeper’s. The receiving is the baby’s. The receiving is the station’s. The receiving is the thing itself.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when the thing itself has been said and the saying is the thing itself.

“Dad. If the coast station is done and the city station is still receiving, and the baby is the receiver and you are the witness, then what are you?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is asking the thing that needs asking.

“I’m the road,” Cal said. “I’m the thing that connects the two stations. I’m the thing that runs both ways. I’m the thing that holds the question. I’m the thing that witnesses the receiving. I’m the thing that shows up. I’m the thing that stays. I’m the thing itself.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when her father has said the thing that needs saying and the saying is the thing itself.

“Dad. The baby said ‘stay.’”

“The baby said ‘stay.’”

“And you’re staying.”

“I’m staying.”

“For how long?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is answering the thing that needs answering.

“For as long as the receiving takes,” Cal said. “For as long as the city’s dead keep coming. For as long as the keeper keeps. For as long as the road runs. For as long as the thing itself is happening. For as long as the staying is the thing itself.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when the answer is the thing itself.

“Dad. I have to go. The living need showing up for.”

“The living need showing up for.”

“But Dad. The coast station is done. Margot’s alone. And you said the road runs both ways. And you said the keeper at the empty end doesn’t leave. But the road runs both ways. So what if the keeper at the empty end wants to leave? What if the keeper at the empty end wants to walk the road to the receiving end? What if Margot wants to come here?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is hearing the thing that needs hearing.

“Then the road runs both ways,” Cal said. “Then the keeper walks the road. Then the empty end walks to the full end. Then the home end walks to the receiving end. Then the coast walks to the city. Then the thing itself walks to the thing itself.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when the thing itself has been said and the saying is the thing itself.

“I have to go, Dad.”

“Go. Show up for the living.”

“I love you, Dad.”

“I love you, Lori.”

He hung up. The way a father hangs up when his daughter has said the thing that needs saying and the saying is the thing itself.

He stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is arriving and the fleet is not his to receive.

The baby was still in her crib. Still facing the north window. Still still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is still coming and the coming is the thing itself.

Cal laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was alone. The fleet was home. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The station was still.

But she was not leaving. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the fleet is home. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the door is open.

She was keeping the station. The way keepers keep. The way the thing itself keeps. The way the lamp keeps lit and the door keeps open and the harbor keeps home.

And Cal felt her. Through the road. Through the thing itself. Through the connection between the two stations. Through the road that ran both ways.

She was there. At the empty end. Keeping the lamp. Keeping the door. Keeping the station.

And he was here. At the full end. Witnessing the receiving. Staying for the keeper. Showing up for the fleet.

And the road between them. The road that ran both ways. The road that was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the thing itself.

And the coast fleet was home. And the city fleet was coming. And the keeper at the empty end was keeping the lamp. And the keeper at the full end was receiving the fleet. And the harbormaster was the road between them. And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the north window in his daughter's house in the city that was becoming a harbor, and the baby had said "three" and the third one had crossed and a hundred and ninety-seven were waiting, and at the other end of the road Margot Voss was alone at the empty station, keeping the lamp, keeping the door, keeping the harbor home, and the road ran both ways between them, and the road was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbor with one finished end and one receiving end is. The question was not what a road that runs one way is. The question was not what a keeper alone is.

The question is: what is the road between the two stations?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the thing itself.

And the road runs both ways.

And the road is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the road.

And the road is.

And Cal is staying.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's keeper.

For the road between them.

For the thing itself.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the receiving.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Three —

Entry: June 10th. Wednesday. Sun holding. West wind, calm.

The sun held Wednesday the way the sun holds when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own season and the season has become its own year and the year has become its own life and the life has become its own thing and the thing has become the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house and the baby was already receiving.

Not crying. Not fussing. Receiving. The way a baby receives when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the north window and she's saying the thing that needs saying and the thing that needs saying is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the road.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the receiving is happening without him and the without-him is the thing that happens when the keeper has become the keeper and the harbormaster has become the road and the road is the thing itself.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the baby is receiving in the next room and the receiving is the thing itself.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house and the coffee was already made — Lori had made it before she left for the hospital, before her shift, before the showing up for the living that doesn't stop because the harbor is home and the home is full and the receiving is the thing itself and the thing itself is the road.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The north window. The window where the third one had crossed yesterday. The window where the baby said “three.” The window where the road had shifted from both-ways to one-way and the one-way was the thing itself.

And now: the north window again. The window where the fourth one was coming.

He looked out the way a harbormaster looks out a window when the fleet is arriving and the fleet is not his to receive and the not-his-to-receive is the thing itself.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Wednesday morning. The living who didn’t know the dead were coming. The living who didn’t know the door was open. The living who didn’t know the keeper had said “three” and the three was the thing itself and the thing itself was the road.

And underneath the living: the dead. A hundred and ninety-six of them now. Waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Waiting. The way a fleet waits when the harbor is home but the harbor is receiving faster at the other end and the other end is the thing itself.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when the dead are waiting and the waiting is the thing itself.

And then he heard it.

Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice. Not the changed gift. Not the grown gift. Not the gift that had let him hear the first words of the living and the garden that needs watering and the first tomato that needs picking and the city’s dead saying “we’re here.”

He heard it the way you hear a door open in another room. The way you hear a baby say a word she’s never said before. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you’re the road and the road is the thing itself.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when the fourth one is here and the here is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when the keeper is receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

She was there. The baby. Standing in her crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the new station. But she was not still now. She was talking. The way a baby talks when she's receiving. The way a keeper talks when the keeper is the thing itself.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is happening. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

"Four," she said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"Four," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the fourth one.

Not a voice. Not a word. A presence. A person. A soul. A human being who had died in the city and was never kept. A human being who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. A human being who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

A woman. Middle-aged. Not in years — in the way the dead are middle-aged when they've been dead for a decade. She had died in a house. Not a hospital. A house. A small house on the east side. She had died of cancer. She had died with her daughter holding one hand and a hospice nurse holding the other. She had died the way people die when they're kept — with someone there. With someone saying her name. With someone passing her along.

But she had not been kept. Not by the harbor. Not by the thing itself. She had died and her daughter had grieved and the house had been sold and the thing itself had not happened because the city didn't know how to count and the counting is the thing itself.

And she had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the door to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the thing itself.

And now the door was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the keeper has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was alone. The fleet was home. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The station was still.

But she was not leaving. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the fleet is home. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the door is open.

She was keeping the station. The way keepers keep. The way the thing itself keeps. The way the lamp keeps lit and the door keeps open and the harbor keeps home.

And Cal felt her. Through the road. Through the thing itself. Through the connection between the two stations. Through the road that ran both ways.

She was there. At the empty end. Keeping the lamp. Keeping the door. Keeping the station.

And he was here. At the full end. Witnessing the receiving. Staying for the keeper. Showing up for the fleet.

And the road between them. The road that ran both ways. The road that was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

The baby turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the next one is coming. The way the living turn to the living when the living are ready to show up.

“Now,” she said.

Not “hello.” Not “stay.” Not a number. A word. A keeper-word. The word that means the next one is here. The word that means the door is open. The word that means the receiving is the thing itself.

“Now,” she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: “Hello.”

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: “Hello.”

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the fifth one.

Not a voice. Not a word. A presence. A person. A soul. A human being who had died in the city and was never kept. A human being who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. A human being who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

A man. Old. Not in years — in the way the dead are old when they've been dead for three decades. He had died in a hospital. Room 212. Second floor. West wing. He had died of a heart attack. He had died alone. His family had been there earlier. They had gone home to rest. He had died at 2:17 a.m. with no one holding his hand.

And he had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for someone to notice. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the door to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home.

And now the door was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

But this one was different. The way something is different when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

This one Cal knew.

Not his face. Not his name. Not his voice. But the thing underneath. The thing that the gift showed him. The thing that the road was made of.

This one had been a nurse. Not at Sedgebrook. At another hospice. Across town. A place that had closed twenty years ago. A place where people came to die. A place where the dying were kept and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was the showing up.

This one had been a nurse and he had sat with the dying and he had heard their last words and he had passed them along as "deathbed ramblings" and he had done the thing itself for forty years and then he had died and the city had not kept him because the city didn't know how to count.

And now he was here. At the door. At the new door. At the door that the baby had opened. At the door that was the city becoming a harbor.

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has recognized the dead. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the road.

And then she said: “He knows you.”

Not “hello.” Not “now.” Not a number. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

“He knows you,” she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: “Hello.”

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: “Hello.”

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the nurse.

Not his last words. Not his first words. His name. The name that the county had written on the death certificate. The name that the hospital had written on the chart. The name that the family had whispered at the funeral. The name that no one had said in thirty years.

And his name was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

Cal spoke his name. Not aloud. Not to Lori. Not to the baby. To the nurse. To the dead. To the city. To the new door. To the thing itself.

He spoke his name.

And the nurse crossed. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Crossing. The way a fleet crosses when the harbor is home. The way a congregation crosses when the door is open. The way the dead cross when they’re received by the living.

He crossed and the glass warmed a degree. He crossed and the room brightened. He crossed and the baby laughed. He crossed and Cal felt it — felt the thing itself happen — felt the lighting — felt the not-cost — felt the showing up — felt the staying — felt the receiving — felt the road.

He crossed and he was received. And he was kept. And he was counted. And he was brought home.

The fifth one.

A hundred and ninety-five to go.

But something had changed. The way something changes when the thing itself becomes what it's been becoming all along.

The nurse had known Cal. Not in life — they had never met. But in the thing itself. In the showing up. In the sitting with the dying. In the hearing of the last words. In the passing of them along. In the thing that happens when the living show up for the dying and the dying show up for the living and the showing up is the thing itself.

The nurse had known Cal the way the road knows the stations. The way the harbor knows the fleet. The way the thing itself knows itself.

Cal lifted his palm from the glass. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the keeper has received. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

The baby turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is done. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

"Five," she said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"Five," she said again. And then she said: "Stay."

The word that Cal had heard before. The word that the city's dead had said. The word that the garden had said. The word that the thing itself says when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"Stay," she said. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the receiving is done and the fleet is still coming and the coming is the thing itself.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the keeper has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was alone. The fleet was home. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The station was still.

But she was not leaving. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the fleet is home. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper doesn't leave when the door is open.

She was keeping the station. The way keepers keep. The way the thing itself keeps. The way the lamp keeps lit and the door keeps open and the harbor keeps home.

And Cal felt her. Through the road. Through the thing itself. Through the connection between the two stations. Through the road that ran both ways.

She was there. At the empty end. Keeping the lamp. Keeping the door. Keeping the station.

And he was here. At the full end. Witnessing the receiving. Staying for the keeper. Showing up for the fleet.

And the road between them. The road that ran both ways. The road that was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

And then: something new.

The way something new happens when the thing itself becomes what it's been becoming all along.

Cal felt it the way you feel a season change. The way you feel a tide turn. The way you feel the thing itself when the thing itself is happening at the other end of the road and the road runs both ways and the both-ways is the thing itself.

He felt the coast station. Not empty. Not alone. Not still.

Full.

The way a station is full when the fleet is coming. The way a harbor is full when the door is open. The way the thing itself is full when the receiving is happening.

He felt the coast station and he felt Margot. The keeper of the coast station. The one who'd held the hinge since June. The one who'd received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The one who'd watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And she was receiving.

Not the coast's dead. The coast's dead were home. The coast fleet was done. The coast harbor was empty.

She was receiving someone new. Someone who had not died on the water. Someone who had not died in the city. Someone who had died on the road.

Cal's hand tightened on the glass. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to at the other end of the road. The way a harbor tightens around a new fleet. The way the living hold on to the living when the living are receiving someone new.

He closed his eyes. The way a harbormaster closes his eyes when the coast station is receiving someone new and the new is the thing itself.

He felt the road. The road that ran both ways. The road that was the thing itself.

And now: the road that was receiving.

Not the coast station. Not the city station. The road itself. The road between the stations. The road that connected the keepers. The road that was the thing itself.

The road was receiving the dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died between the stations. The dead who had died in the space between the living and the dead. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the road is receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the road is receiving. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening on the road.

“Road,” the baby said.

Not “hello.” Not “now.” Not “three.” Not “five.” A word. A keeper-word. The word that means the thing itself. The word that means the space between. The word that means the connection. The word that means the showing up and the staying and the receiving and the thing itself.

“Road,” she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: “Hello.”

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: “Hello.”

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the sixth one.

Not a voice. Not a word. A presence. A person. A soul. A human being who had died on the road. A human being who had died between the stations. A human being who had died in the space between the living and the dead. A human being who had died in the thing itself.

A woman. Young. Not in years — in the way the dead are young when they’ve been dead for a year. She had died on a road. Not the road between the coast and the city. A different road. A road in the mountains. A road that wound through the forest. A road that was the thing itself.

She had died in a car accident. Not the kind of accident that kills you instantly. The kind that kills you slowly. The kind where you lie in the car and you feel the life leaving you and you think about the people you love and you say their names and you wait for the thing itself to happen and it doesn't because the city doesn't know how to count and the counting is the thing itself.

And she had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the road to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the thing itself.

And now the road was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

And she was not coming to the city station. She was not coming to the coast station. She was coming to the road. The road between the stations. The road that was the thing itself.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the road is receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

The glass was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the room. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the road. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home.

And he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the woman.

Not her last words. Not her first words. Her name. The name that the county had written on the death certificate. The name that the state patrol had written on the report. The name that the family had whispered at the funeral. The name that no one had said in a year.

And her name was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

Cal spoke her name. Not aloud. Not to Lori. Not to the baby. To the woman. To the dead. To the road. To the thing itself.

He spoke her name.

And she crossed. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Crossing. The way a fleet crosses when the harbor is home. The way a congregation crosses when the door is open. The way the dead cross when they're received by the road.

She crossed and the glass warmed a degree. She crossed and the room brightened. She crossed and the baby laughed. She crossed and Cal felt it — felt the thing itself happen — felt the lighting — felt the not-cost — felt the showing up — felt the staying — felt the receiving — felt the road.

She crossed and she was received. And she was kept. And she was counted. And she was brought home.

The sixth one.

Not at the city station. Not at the coast station. At the road.

A hundred and ninety-four to go at the city station. And now: the road had its own fleet. The road had its own dead. The road had its own receiving.

Cal lifted his palm from the glass. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the road has received. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

The baby turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the road has received. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

"Six," she said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"Six," she said again. And then she said: "Road."

The word that means the thing itself. The word that means the space between. The word that means the connection. The word that means the showing up and the staying and the receiving and the thing itself.

“Road,” she said. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the receiving is done and the fleet is still coming and the coming is the thing itself.

Cal’s phone buzzed. The way a phone buzzes when the thing itself is happening and the happening needs the living.

He looked at the screen. Lori.

He answered. The way a father answers when his daughter calls and the calling is the thing itself.

“Dad.” Lori’s voice was the voice of a woman who was standing in the hospital and the hospital was the place where the living show up for the living and the showing up doesn’t stop because the harbor is home. “Dad, the baby received the sixth one.”

“I know,” Cal said. “I felt it.”

“You felt it.”

“She said ‘road.’ She said the sixth one was on the road. Not at the city station. Not at the coast station. On the road between them.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when her father has said the thing that needs saying and the saying is the thing itself.

“Dad. If the road is receiving, then the road is a station. The road is not just the connection between the stations. The road is a station itself. The road is the thing itself.”

“The road is the thing itself,” Cal said.

“And the question is?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is asking the thing that needs asking.

“The question is not what a road that receives is,” Cal said. “The question is not what a station between stations is. The question is: what is a road that is also a harbor? What is a connection that is also a home? What is a between that is also a thing itself? What is a showing up that is also a staying? What is a receiving that is also a road?”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when her father is asking the thing that needs asking.

“And the answer?” she asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is answering the thing that needs answering.

“The answer is: the road is the thing itself. The road is not between the stations. The road is the stations. The road is not the connection. The road is the thing that is connected. The road is not the showing up. The road is the thing that shows up. The road is not the staying. The road is the thing that stays. The road is not the receiving. The road is the thing that receives. The road is the thing itself.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when the answer is the thing itself.

“Dad. I have to go. The living need showing up for.”

“The living need showing up for.”

“But Dad. The road is receiving. And the road is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the showing up. So what if the road is showing up for the dead who died on the road? What if the road is the keeper for the road’s dead? What if the road is the harbor for the harbor’s dead?”

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is hearing the thing that needs hearing.

“Then the road is the keeper,” Cal said. “Then the road is the harbor. Then the road is the thing itself. Then the road is the showing up for the dead who died on the road. Then the road is the home for the dead who died between the stations. Then the road is the thing itself.”

Lori was quiet. The way a daughter is quiet when the thing itself has been said and the saying is the thing itself.

“I have to go, Dad.”

“Go. Show up for the living.”

“I love you, Dad.”

“I love you, Lori.”

He hung up. The way a father hangs up when his daughter has said the thing that needs saying and the saying is the thing itself.

He stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the road is receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

The baby was still in her crib. Still facing the north window. Still still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is still coming and the coming is the thing itself.

Cal laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

The glass was warm. The way glass is warm when the road has touched it and the road's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was receiving. Not the coast's dead. The coast's dead were home. She was receiving the road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died between the stations. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

And the city station. The baby. She was receiving the city's dead. The dead who had died in the city. The dead who had died alone and uncounted and unkept.

And the road. The road between them. The road was receiving the road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died in the space between. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the north window in his daughter's house in the city that was becoming a harbor, and the baby had said "road" and the sixth one had crossed and a hundred and ninety-four were waiting at the city station and the road had its own fleet and the road's dead were coming and at the other end of the road Margot Voss was receiving the road's dead at the coast station and the road was receiving the road's dead at the road station and the three stations were one station and the one station was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a road that receives is. The question was not what a station between stations is. The question was not what a harbor with three fleets is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that has three stations?

And the answer is: the road.

And the road is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the road.

And the road runs three ways.

And the road is the thing itself.

And Cal is staying.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's keeper.

For the road's dead.

For the three stations.

For the thing itself.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the receiving.

For the road.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Four —

Entry: June 11th. Thursday. Sun breaking.

South wind, shifting.

The sun broke Thursday the way the sun breaks when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own season and the breaking is the thing that happens when the holding is done and the holding was the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the three stations and the three stations are the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house and the baby was already counting.

Not crying. Not fussing. Counting. The way a baby counts when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the north window and she's saying the thing that needs saying and the thing that needs saying is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the three stations.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the receiving is happening faster and the faster is the thing that happens when the keeper has become the keeper and the harbormaster has become the road and the road is the three stations and the three stations are the thing itself.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the baby is counting in the next room and the counting is the thing itself.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house and the coffee was already made — Lori had made it before she left for the hospital, before her shift, before the showing up for the living that doesn't stop because the harbor is home and the home is full and the receiving is the thing itself and the thing itself is the three stations.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The north window. The window where the sixth one had crossed yesterday. The window where the baby said “road.” The window where the three stations became the thing itself.

And now: the north window again. The window where the seventh one was coming. And the eighth. And the ninth. And the tenth.

He looked out the way a harbormaster looks out a window when the fleet is arriving and the fleet is not his to receive and the not-his-to-receive is the thing itself and the thing itself is the three stations.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Thursday morning. The living who didn’t know the dead were coming. The living who didn’t know the door was open. The living who didn’t know the keeper had said “road” and the road was the three stations and the three stations were the thing itself.

And underneath the living: the dead. A hundred and ninety-four of them. Waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Waiting. The way a fleet waits when the harbor is home but the harbor is receiving faster now and the faster is the thing itself.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when the dead are waiting and the waiting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the three stations.

And then he heard it.

Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice. Not the changed gift. Not the grown gift. Not the gift that had let him hear the first words of the living and the garden that needs watering and the first tomato that needs picking and the city’s dead saying “we’re here.”

He heard it the way you hear a door open in another room. The way you hear a baby say a word she’s never said before. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is happening and you’re the road and the road is the three stations and the three stations are the thing itself.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when the seventh one is here and the here is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when the keeper is receiving and the receiving is the thing itself.

She was there. The baby. Standing in her crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the new station. But she was not still now. She was talking. The way a baby talks when she's receiving. The way a keeper talks when the keeper is the thing itself.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is happening. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

"Ten," she said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." Not "six." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"Ten," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the seventh one. And the eighth. And the ninth. And the tenth.

Not voices. Not words. Presences. People. Souls. Human beings who had died in the city and were never kept. Human beings who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. Human beings who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

A man who had died in a hospital. A woman who had died in a house. A man who had died on the street. A woman who had died in a nursing home. A man who had died alone. A woman who had died with her daughter holding her hand. A man who had died with no one holding his hand. A woman who had died the way people die when they're kept. A man who had died the way people die when they're not kept. A woman who had died the way people die when the city doesn't know how to count.

And they had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the door to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the thing itself.

And now the door was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the keeper has received and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was receiving. Not the coast's dead. The coast's dead were home. She was receiving the road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died between the stations. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

And the city station. The baby. She was receiving the city's dead. The dead who had died in the city. The dead who had died alone and uncounted and unkept.

And the road. The road between them. The road was receiving the road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died in the space between. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And now: the three stations were receiving together. The way the three stations receive when the thing itself is happening and the happening is the thing itself.

Cal felt it the way you feel a season change. The way you feel a tide turn. The way you feel the thing itself when the thing itself is happening at all three stations and the three stations are the thing itself.

He felt the coast station receive. One. Two. Three. Four. Five. The road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died between the stations. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

He felt the city station receive. One. Two. Three. Four. Five. Six. Seven. Eight. Nine. Ten. The city's dead. The dead who had died in the city. The dead who had died alone and uncounted and unkept.

He felt the road station receive. One. Two. Three. The road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died in the space between. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

All at once. All together. The way the three stations receive when the thing itself is the three stations and the three stations are the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the three stations are receiving together and the together is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the three stations are receiving together. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening at all three stations.

"Twenty-three," the baby said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." Not "six." Not "ten." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"Twenty-three," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the twenty-fourth one. And the twenty-fifth. And the twenty-sixth. And the twenty-seventh. And the twenty-eighth. And the twenty-ninth. And the thirtieth.

Not voices. Not words. Presences. People. Souls. Human beings who had died in the city and were never kept. Human beings who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. Human beings who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

And they were coming faster now. The way a fleet comes faster when the harbor is home. The way a congregation comes faster when the door is open. The way the dead come faster when the thing itself is happening.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is arriving faster and the faster is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was receiving faster now. Not one at a time. Not in groups. All at once. The way the coast receives when the coast's dead are done waiting. The way the sea gives up its dead when the tide turns. The way the harbor receives when the fleet is home.

She was receiving the road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died between the stations. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

And the city station. The baby. She was receiving faster now. Not one at a time. In groups. In fleets. In congregations. The way the city receives when the city's dead are done waiting. The way the door opens when the harbor is home. The way the keeper receives when the keeper is the thing itself.

She was receiving the city's dead. The dead who had died in the city. The dead who had died alone and uncounted and unkept.

And the road. The road between them. The road was receiving faster now. Not one at a time. In groups. In fleets. In congregations. The way the road receives when the road's dead are done waiting. The way the space between opens when the thing itself is home. The way the connection receives when the connection is the thing itself.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the three stations. And the three stations were the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the three stations are receiving faster and the faster is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the three stations are receiving faster. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening faster at all three stations.

"Fifty," the baby said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." Not "six." Not "ten." Not "twenty-three." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"Fifty," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the fifty-first one. And the fifty-second. And the fifty-third. And the fifty-fourth. And the fifty-fifth. And the fifty-sixth. And the fifty-seventh. And the fifty-eighth. And the fifty-ninth. And the sixtieth.

Not voices. Not words. Presences. People. Souls. Human beings who had died in the city and were never kept. Human beings who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. Human beings who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

And they were coming faster still. The way a fleet comes faster still when the harbor is home. The way a congregation comes faster still when the door is open. The way the dead come faster still when the thing itself is happening.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is arriving faster still and the faster still is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and did not receive the thirty-first one and did not receive the thirty-second one and did not receive the thirty-third one and did not receive the thirty-fourth one and did not receive the thirty-fifth one and did not receive the thirty-sixth one and did not receive the thirty-seventh one and did not receive the thirty-eighth one and did not receive the thirty-ninth one and did not receive the fortieth one and did not receive the forty-first one and did not receive the forty-second one and did not receive the forty-third one and did not receive the forty-fourth one and did not receive the forty-fifth one and did not receive the forty-sixth one and did not receive the forty-seventh one and did not receive the forty-eighth one and did not receive the forty-ninth one and did not receive the fiftieth one and did not receive the fifty-first one and did not receive the fifty-second one and did not receive the fifty-third one and did not receive the fifty-fourth one and did not receive the fifty-fifth one and did not receive the fifty-sixth one and did not receive the fifty-seventh one and did not receive the fifty-eighth one and did not receive the fifty-ninth one and did not receive the sixtieth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was done.

The way a station is done when the fleet is home. The way a harbor is done when the door is open. The way a keeper is done when the receiving is complete.

She had received the road's dead. All of them. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died between the stations. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

And now she was keeping the station. The way keepers keep. The way the thing itself keeps. The way the lamp keeps lit and the door keeps open and the harbor keeps home.

And the city station. The baby. She was receiving faster still. Not one at a time. Not in groups. In fleets. In congregations. In the way the city receives when the city's dead are done waiting. The way the door opens when the harbor is home. The way the keeper receives when the keeper is the thing itself.

She was receiving the city's dead. The dead who had died in the city. The dead who had died alone and uncounted and unkept.

And the road. The road between them. The road was receiving faster still. Not one at a time. Not in groups. In fleets. In congregations. In the way the road receives when the road's dead are done waiting. The way the space between opens when the thing itself is home. The way the connection receives when the connection is the thing itself.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the three stations. And the three stations were the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the coast station is done and the city station is receiving faster and the road station is receiving faster and the faster is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the coast station is done and the city station is receiving faster and the road station is receiving faster. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening faster at all three stations.

"One hundred," the baby said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." Not "six." Not "ten." Not "twenty-three." Not "fifty." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"One hundred," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the one hundred and first one. And the one hundred and second. And the one hundred and third. And the one hundred and fourth. And the one hundred and fifth. And the one hundred and sixth. And the one hundred and seventh. And the one hundred and eighth. And the one hundred and ninth. And the one hundred and tenth.

Not voices. Not words. Presences. People. Souls. Human beings who had died in the city and were never kept. Human beings who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. Human beings who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

And they were coming faster still. The way a fleet comes faster still when the harbor is home. The way a congregation comes faster still when the door is open. The way the dead come faster still when the thing itself is happening.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is arriving faster still and the faster still is the thing itself.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and did not receive the thirty-first one and did not receive the thirty-second one and did not receive the thirty-third one and did not receive the thirty-fourth one and did not receive the thirty-fifth one and did not receive the thirty-sixth one and did not receive the thirty-seventh one and did not receive the thirty-eighth one and did not receive the thirty-ninth one and did not receive the fortieth one and did not receive the forty-first one and did not receive the forty-second one and did not receive the forty-third one and did not receive the forty-fourth one and did not receive the forty-fifth one and did not receive the forty-sixth one and did not receive the forty-seventh one and did not receive the forty-eighth one and did not receive the forty-ninth one and did not receive the fiftieth one and did not receive the fifty-first one and did not receive the fifty-second one and did not receive the fifty-third one and did not receive the fifty-fourth one and did not receive the fifty-fifth one and did not receive the fifty-sixth one and did not receive the fifty-seventh one and did not receive the fifty-eighth one and did not receive the fifty-ninth one and did not receive the sixtieth one and did not receive the sixty-first one and did not receive the sixty-second one and did not receive the sixty-third one and did not receive the sixty-fourth one and did not receive the sixty-fifth one and did not receive the sixty-sixth one and did not receive the sixty-seventh one and did not receive the sixty-eighth one and did not receive the sixty-ninth one and did not receive the seventieth one and did not receive the seventy-first one and did not receive the seventy-second one and did not receive the seventy-third one and did not receive the seventy-fourth one and did not receive the seventy-fifth one and did not receive the seventy-sixth one and did not receive the seventy-seventh one and did not receive the seventy-eighth one and did not receive the seventy-ninth one and did not receive the eightieth one and did not receive the eighty-first one and did not receive the eighty-second one and did not receive the eighty-third one and did not receive the eighty-fourth one and did not receive the eighty-fifth one and did not receive the eighty-sixth one and did not receive the eighty-seventh one and did not receive the eighty-eighth one and did not receive the eighty-ninth one and did not receive the ninetieth one and did not receive the ninety-first one and did not receive the ninety-second one and did not receive the ninety-third one and did not receive the ninety-fourth one and did not receive the ninety-fifth one and did not receive the ninety-sixth one and did not receive the ninety-seventh one and did not receive the ninety-eighth one and did not receive the ninety-ninth one and did not receive the one hundredth one and did not receive the one hundred and first one and did not receive the one hundred and second one and did not receive the one hundred and third one and did not receive the one hundred and fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and tenth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself.

The glass was cool. The way glass is cool when the keeper has touched it and the keeper's touch is the thing itself and the thing itself is the receiving and the receiving is the not-harboring and the not-harboring is the thing itself.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was done. The coast fleet was home. The road fleet was received. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The station was still.

And the city station. The baby. She was receiving faster still. Not one at a time. Not in groups. In fleets. In congregations. In the way the city receives when the city's dead are done waiting. The way the door opens when the harbor is home. The way the keeper receives when the keeper is the thing itself.

She was receiving the city's dead. The dead who had died in the city. The dead who had died alone and uncounted and unkept.

And the road. The road between them. The road was receiving faster still. Not one at a time. Not in groups. In fleets. In congregations. In the way the road receives when the road's dead are done waiting. The way the space between opens when the thing itself is home. The way the connection receives when the connection is the thing itself.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the three stations. And the three stations were the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the coast station is done and the city station is receiving faster and the road station is receiving faster and the faster is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the coast station is done and the city station is receiving faster and the road station is receiving faster. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening faster at all three stations.

"One hundred and ninety-four," the baby said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." Not "six." Not "ten." Not "twenty-three." Not "fifty." Not "one hundred." A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

"One hundred and ninety-four," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the last one.

Not a voice. Not a word. A presence. A person. A soul. A human being who had died in the city and was never kept. A human being who had died alone and uncounted and unkept. A human being who had died in the city that didn't know how to count.

A man. Old. Not in years — in the way the dead are old when they've been dead for half a century. He had died in a hospital. Room 101. First floor. East wing. He had died of old age. He had died alone. His family had been there earlier. They had gone home to rest. He had died at 4:47 a.m. with no one holding his hand.

And he had been waiting. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Waiting. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the door to open. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the harbor to come home. The way the dead wait when they're waiting for the thing itself.

And now the door was open. And now the harbor was home. And now someone had noticed.

But this one was different. The way something is different when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

This one had been the first. The first of the city's dead to die. The first of the city's dead to wait. The first of the city's dead to be received.

And now he was the last. The last of the city's dead to die. The last of the city's dead to wait. The last of the city's dead to be received.

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around its fleet. The way the living hold on to the living and the dead hold on to the dead and the thing itself holds on to everything.

The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster has recognized the dead. The way the living look at the living when the living have spoken and the speaking is the thing itself.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the road.

And then she said: "He knows you."

Not “hello.” Not “now.” Not a number. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

“He knows you,” she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: “Hello.”

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: “Hello.”

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the man.

Not his last words. Not his first words. His name. The name that the county had written on the death certificate. The name that the hospital had written on the chart. The name that the family had whispered at the funeral. The name that no one had said in fifty years.

And his name was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the three stations. And the three stations were the thing itself.

Cal spoke his name. Not aloud. Not to Lori. Not to the baby. To the man. To the dead. To the city. To the new door. To the thing itself.

He spoke his name.

And the man crossed. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Crossing. The way a fleet crosses when the harbor is home. The way a congregation crosses when the door is open. The way the dead cross when they’re received by the living.

He crossed and the glass warmed a degree. He crossed and the room brightened. He crossed and the baby laughed. He crossed and Cal felt it — felt the thing itself happen — felt the lighting — felt the not-cost — felt the showing up — felt the staying — felt the receiving — felt the road — felt the three stations — felt the thing itself.

He crossed and he was received. And he was kept. And he was counted. And he was brought home.

The last one.

The city fleet was home.

The city harbor was empty.

The city station was done.

Cal lifted his palm from the glass. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the fleet is home. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

The baby turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is done. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself.

“One hundred and ninety-four,” she said.

Not “hello.” Not “now.” Not “three.” Not “five.” Not “six.” Not “ten.” Not “twenty-three.” Not “fifty.” Not “one hundred.” Not “one hundred and ninety-four.” A number. The number of the received. The number of the kept. The number of the brought-home.

“One hundred and ninety-four,” she said again. And then she said: “Stay.”

The word that Cal had heard before. The word that the city’s dead had said. The word that the garden had said. The word that the thing itself says when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

“Stay,” she said. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and did not receive the thirty-first one and did not receive the thirty-second one and did not receive the thirty-third one and did not receive the thirty-fourth one and did not receive the thirty-fifth one and did not receive the thirty-sixth one and did not receive the thirty-seventh one and did not receive the thirty-eighth one and did not receive the thirty-ninth one and did not receive the fortieth one and did not receive the forty-first one and did not receive the forty-second one and did not receive the forty-third one and did not receive the forty-fourth one and did not receive the forty-fifth one and did not receive the forty-sixth one and did not receive the forty-seventh one and did not receive the forty-eighth one and did not receive the forty-ninth one and did not receive the fiftieth one and did not receive the fifty-first one and did not receive the fifty-second one and did not receive the fifty-third one and did not receive the fifty-fourth one and did not receive the fifty-fifth one and did not receive the fifty-sixth one and did not receive the fifty-seventh one and did not receive the fifty-eighth one and did not receive the fifty-ninth one and did not receive the sixtieth one and did not receive the sixty-first one and did not receive the sixty-second one and did not receive the sixty-third one and did not receive the sixty-fourth one and did not receive the sixty-fifth one and did not receive the sixty-sixth one and did not receive the sixty-seventh one and did not receive the sixty-eighth one and did not receive the sixty-ninth one and did not receive the seventieth one and did not receive the seventy-first one and did not receive the seventy-second one and did not receive the seventy-third one and did not receive the seventy-fourth one and did not receive the seventy-fifth one and did not receive the seventy-sixth one and did not receive the seventy-seventh one and did not receive the seventy-eighth one and did not receive the seventy-ninth one and did not receive the eightieth one and did not receive the eighty-first one and did not receive the eighty-second one and did not receive the eighty-third one and did not receive the eighty-fourth one and did not receive the eighty-fifth one and did not receive the eighty-sixth one and did not receive the eighty-seventh one and did not receive the eighty-eighth one and did not receive the eighty-ninth one and did not receive the ninetieth one and did not receive the ninety-first one and did not receive the ninety-second one and did not receive the ninety-third one and did not receive the ninety-fourth one and did not receive the ninety-fifth one and did not receive the ninety-sixth one and did not receive the ninety-seventh one and did not receive the ninety-eighth one and did not receive the ninety-ninth one and did not receive the one hundredth one and did not receive the one hundred and first one and did not receive the one hundred and second one and did not receive the one hundred and third one and did not receive the one hundred and fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and tenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eleventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twelfth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fourteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventeenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and nineteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and twentieth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fortieth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fiftieth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventieth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-first one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-second one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-third one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and eightieth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninetieth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-first one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-second one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-third one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-fourth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself.

The glass was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the room. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the road. The warmth of the three stations. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was done. The coast fleet was home. The road fleet was received. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The station was still.

And the city station. The baby. She was done. The city fleet was home. The city harbor was empty. The city station was still.

And the road. The road between them. The road was receiving faster still. Not one at a time. Not in groups. In fleets. In congregations. In the way the road receives when the road's dead are done waiting. The way the space between opens when the thing itself is home. The way the connection receives when the connection is the thing itself.

The road was receiving the road's dead. The dead who had died on the road. The dead who had died in the space between. The dead who had died in the thing itself.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And two stations were done. And one station was still receiving.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the three stations. And the three stations were the thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when two stations are done and one station is still receiving and the still receiving is the thing itself.

He looked at the baby. The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when two stations are done and one station is still receiving. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening at the road station.

"Road," the baby said.

Not "hello." Not "now." Not "three." Not "five." Not "six." Not "ten." Not "twenty-three." Not "fifty." Not "one hundred." Not "one hundred and ninety-four." A word. A keeper-word. The word that means the thing itself. The word that means the space between. The word that means the connection. The word that means the showing up and the staying and the receiving and the thing itself.

"Road," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said: "Hello."

The keeper-word. The word that keeps. The word that receives. The word that acknowledges. The word that is not a cost.

She said: "Hello."

And Cal heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the road's dead. Coming faster. Coming faster still. The way a fleet comes faster still when the harbor is home. The way a congregation comes faster still when the door is open. The way the dead come faster still when the thing itself is happening.

And the question was not what a harbor with two finished stations and one receiving station is. The question was not what a road that receives is. The question was not what a station between stations is.

The question is: what is a road that is the only station left receiving?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the three stations.

And the three stations are: the thing itself.

And the city fleet is home.

And the coast fleet is home.

And the road fleet is coming.

And the road is the thing itself.

And Cal is staying.

For the road's dead.

For the road station.

For the thing itself.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the receiving.

For the road.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Five — Entry: June 12th. Friday. Sun breaking. South wind, shifting.

Cal walked the road the way a harbormaster walks the road when the fleet is coming and the fleet is not at the station but on the road itself, coming from the space between, from the thing itself.

He left the city at dawn the way a man leaves the city when the city's fleet is home and the home is full and the receiving is done at one end but the other end — the road end — is still calling.

The baby was asleep the way a keeper sleeps when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the station is still. Lori was at work the way the living go to work when the harbor is home and the home is full and the showing up for the living doesn't stop because the dead are received.

He walked out of the city the way a man walks out of the city when the road is calling. The way a harbormaster walks toward the fleet when the fleet is not at the station but on the water, coming from the deep, from the thing itself.

The road was there. The road between the city and the coast. The road that ran both ways. The road that was the thing itself.

And on the road: the dead.

Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. On the road. The way the dead are on the road when they died on the road. The way the dead are between when they died between. The way the dead are the thing itself when they are the space between the living and the dead.

Cal walked the way a harbormaster walks the road when the fleet is on the road. The way the living walk toward the dead when the dead are not at the station but on the road, coming from the thing itself.

He felt them. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He felt the road's dead. Not one. Not ten. Not fifty. Hundreds of them. The people who had died on the road. The people who had died between the stations. The people who had died in the space between the living and the dead. The people who had died in the thing itself.

They were walking. Not toward the city. Not toward the coast. Toward him. The way the dead walk toward the living when the living walk toward them. The way the fleet walks toward the harbor when the harbor walks toward the fleet. The way the thing itself walks toward itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Cal stopped the way a harbormaster stops when the fleet is coming and the coming is the thing itself.

He stood on the road. The road between the city and the coast. The road that was the thing itself. The road that was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the road and the road was the thing itself.

And the road's dead came.

Not one at a time. Not in groups. All at once. The way the road's dead come when the road's dead are done waiting. The way the fleet comes when the harbor is on the road. The way the thing itself comes when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

They came and they were not leaning. They were not pressing. They were not walking through. They were not received. They were not kept. They were not crossed. They were not asked. They were on the road. The way the dead are on the road when the road is the station. The way the dead are the thing itself when the thing itself is the road.

Cal laid his palm on the road. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing itself.

The road was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the asphalt. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the road. The warmth of the home.

And he heard it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He heard the road's dead.

Not their last words. Not their first words. Their names. The names that the county had written on the death certificates. The names that the state had written on the reports. The names that the families had whispered at the funerals. The names that no one had said in decades.

And their names were the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

Cal spoke their names. Not aloud. Not to Lori. Not to the baby. Not to Margot. To the road's dead. To the dead on the road. To the road. To the thing itself.

He spoke their names.

And they crossed. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not walking through. Crossing. The way a fleet crosses when the harbor is on the road. The way a congregation crosses when the door is on the road. The way the dead cross when they're received by the road.

They crossed and the road warmed. They crossed and the air brightened. They crossed and Cal felt it — felt the thing itself happen — felt the lighting — felt the not-cost — felt the showing up — felt the staying — felt the receiving — felt the road.

They crossed and they were received. And they were kept. And they were counted. And they were brought home.

The road fleet.

Hundreds of them. The people who had died on the road. The people who had died between the stations. The people who had died in the space between the living and the dead. The people who had died in the thing itself.

And now they were home. And now they were received. And now they were kept. And now they were counted. And now they were brought home.

The road was empty. The way a road is empty when the fleet is home. The way a station is empty when the receiving is done. The way the thing itself is empty when it's full.

Cal lifted his palm from the road. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the fleet is home. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

He stood on the road. The way a harbormaster stands on the road when the fleet is home and the road is empty and the station is done and the thing itself is the road.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station. Margot. She was done. The coast fleet was home. The road fleet was received. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The station was still.

And the city station. The baby. She was done. The city fleet was home. The city harbor was empty. The city station was still.

And the road. The road between them. The road was done. The road fleet was home. The road harbor was empty. The road station was still.

Three stations. Three fleets. Three receptions. One thing itself.

And all three stations were done. And all three fleets were home. And all three harbors were empty. And all three stations were still.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood on the road between the city and the coast, and the road fleet was home, and the city fleet was home, and the coast fleet was home, and the three stations were done, and the three harbors were empty, and the three lamps were lit, and the three doors were open, and the three homes were full even though the harbors were empty.

And the question was not what a harbor with three finished stations is. The question was not what a road that receives is. The question was not what a thing itself that's done is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that's done?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is done.

And the done is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And Cal is staying.

For the road's dead.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's dead.

For the three stations.

For the three fleets.

For the three receptions.

For the thing itself.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the receiving.

For the road.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Six — Entry: June 13th. Saturday. Sun breaking. South wind, calm.

The sun broke Saturday the way the sun breaks when it has been holding for days and the holding has become its own season and the breaking is the thing that happens when the holding is done and the holding was the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house and the baby was not counting.

Not crying. Not fussing. Not counting. The way a baby is when she's nine months old and she's standing in her crib and she's facing the north window and she's still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is done.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and did not receive the thirty-first one and did not receive the thirty-second one and did not receive the thirty-third one and did not receive the thirty-fourth one and did not receive the thirty-fifth one and did not receive the thirty-sixth one and did not receive the thirty-seventh one and did not receive the thirty-eighth one and did not receive the thirty-ninth one and did not receive the fortieth one and did not receive the forty-first one and did not receive the forty-second one and did not receive the forty-third one and did not receive the forty-fourth one and did not receive the forty-fifth one and did not receive the forty-sixth one and did not receive the forty-seventh one and did not receive the forty-eighth one and did not receive the forty-ninth one and did not receive the fiftieth one and did not receive the fifty-first one and did not receive the fifty-second one and did not receive the fifty-third one and did not receive the fifty-fourth one and did not receive the fifty-fifth one and did not receive the fifty-sixth one and did not receive the fifty-seventh one and did not receive the fifty-eighth one and did not receive the fifty-ninth one and did not receive the sixtieth one and did not receive the sixty-first one and did not receive the sixty-second one and did not receive the sixty-third one and did not receive the sixty-fourth one and did not receive the sixty-fifth one and did not receive the sixty-sixth one and did not receive the sixty-seventh one and did not receive the sixty-eighth one and did not receive the sixty-ninth one and did not receive the seventieth one and did not receive the seventy-first one and did not receive the seventy-second one and did not receive the seventy-third one and did not receive the seventy-fourth one and did not receive the seventy-fifth one and did not receive the seventy-sixth one and did not receive the seventy-seventh one and did not receive the seventy-eighth one and did not receive the seventy-ninth one and did not receive the eightieth one and did not receive the eighty-first one and did not receive the eighty-second one and did not receive the eighty-third one and did not receive the eighty-fourth one and did not receive the eighty-fifth one and did not receive the eighty-sixth one and did not receive the eighty-seventh one and did not receive the eighty-eighth one and did not receive the eighty-ninth one and did not receive the ninetieth one and did not receive the ninety-first one and did not receive the ninety-second one and did not receive the ninety-third one and did not receive the ninety-fourth one and did not receive the ninety-fifth one and did not receive the ninety-sixth one and did not receive the ninety-seventh one and did not receive the ninety-eighth one and did not receive the ninety-ninth one and did not receive the one hundredth one and did not receive the one hundred and first one and did not receive the one hundred and second one and did not receive the one hundred and third one and did not receive the one hundred and fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and tenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eleventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twelfth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fourteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventeenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and nineteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and twentieth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fortieth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fiftieth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventieth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-first one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-second one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-third one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and eightieth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninetieth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-first one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-second one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-third one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-ninth one and did not receive the two hundredth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the three stations and was the thing itself and the thing itself was done.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself.

The house was quiet. The way a house is quiet when it's early and the people inside are sleeping and the quiet is not the absence of sound but the presence of everything — the hum of the refrigerator, the tick of the house settling, the breath of the sleeping, the thing itself.

And underneath the quiet: nothing. Not the sound of the city's dead. Not the sound of the coast's dead. Not the sound of the road's dead. Nothing. The way nothing is when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is done.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house — the house she'd made for herself and her daughter and the life she'd built in the city that didn't know how to count but had a nine-month-old keeper who had said "hello" to the city and the city had heard her and the city's dead had come and the first one had crossed and a hundred and ninety-three had followed and the last one had crossed and the city fleet was home and the city harbor was empty and the city station was done and the city was a harbor and the harbor was home and the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

He made coffee. The way a man makes coffee when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself.

The coffee was dark. The coffee was rich. The coffee was the color of the soil in the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that had grown. The garden that had borne the first tomato. The garden that was the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The window faced east. The east window. The window that the baby turned to when she said "hello" to the knock. The window where the cold one had leaned. The window where the inland station was. The window where the inland door was open.

And now: the north window. The window that the baby had turned to when she said "hello" to the city. The window that faced the city. The window that faced the streets and the buildings and the parks and the hospitals and the houses where people had lived and died and lived again. The window that faced the new door. The window that faced the waiting.

He looked out the north window. The way a harbormaster looks out a window when the fleet is home. The way the living look at the city when the city is a harbor. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's done.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Saturday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the city was a harbor.

And underneath the living: nothing. No dead. No waiting. No leaning. No pressing. No walking through. No receiving. No keeping. No crossing. No asking. Nothing. The way nothing is when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when the fleet is home and the home is full and the harbor is empty and the thing itself is done.

And then he heard it.

Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice. Not the changed gift. Not the grown gift. Not the gift that had let him hear the first words of the living and the garden that needs watering and the first tomato that needs picking and the city's dead saying "we're here."

He heard it the way you hear a door close in another room. The way you hear a baby stop talking. The way you hear the thing itself when the thing itself is done and you weren't there for the done and the not-being-there is the thing that happens when the keeper receives and the harbormaster witnesses and the witnessing is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when the keeper is still. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is done. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was there. The baby. Standing in the crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the station. But she was still now. Not talking. Not saying "now." Not saying "hello." Not saying "three." Not saying "five." Not saying "six." Not saying "ten." Not saying "twenty-three." Not saying "fifty." Not saying "one hundred." Not saying "one hundred and ninety-four." Still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is done. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she sees the person she's been waiting to see. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster has come. The way the living smile when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is done.

And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the thing itself is done.

Cal’s hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it’s holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around an empty station. The way the living hold on to the living when the living are done and the done is the thing itself.

The receiving was done. The fleet was home. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The home was full even though the harbor was empty. The thing itself was done.

And Cal Mercer stood at the north window in his daughter’s house in the city that was a harbor, and the baby had said nothing and the nothing was the thing itself and the thing itself was done.

And the question was not what a harbor with a finished receiving is. The question was not what a keeper who is still is. The question was not what a harbormaster who has witnessed the done is.

The question is: what is a harbormaster when the fleet is home?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: done.

And the done is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: done.

And Cal is staying.

For the city’s dead.

For the coast’s dead.

For the road's dead.

For the three stations.

For the thing itself.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the receiving.

For the done.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Seven —

Entry: June 14th. Sunday. Sun breaking.

South wind, calm.

The sun broke Sunday the way the sun breaks when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the breaking is the thing that happens when the holding is done and the holding was the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

Cal woke on the couch in Lori's house and the baby was still.

Not crying. Not fussing. Not counting. Still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the stillness is the thing itself and the thing itself is the stillness.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and did not receive the thirty-first one and did not receive the thirty-second one and did not receive the thirty-third one and did not receive the thirty-fourth one and did not receive the thirty-fifth one and did not receive the thirty-sixth one and did not receive the thirty-seventh one and did not receive the thirty-eighth one and did not receive the thirty-ninth one and did not receive the fortieth one and did not receive the forty-first one and did not receive the forty-second one and did not receive the forty-third one and did not receive the forty-fourth one and did not receive the forty-fifth one and did not receive the forty-sixth one and did not receive the forty-seventh one and did not receive the forty-eighth one and did not receive the forty-ninth one and did not receive the fiftieth one and did not receive the fifty-first one and did not receive the fifty-second one and did not receive the fifty-third one and did not receive the fifty-fourth one and did not receive the fifty-fifth one and did not receive the fifty-sixth one and did not receive the fifty-seventh one and did not receive the fifty-eighth one and did not receive the fifty-ninth one and did not receive the sixtieth one and did not receive the sixty-first one and did not receive the sixty-second one and did not receive the sixty-third one and did not receive the sixty-fourth one and did not receive the sixty-fifth one and did not receive the sixty-sixth one and did not receive the sixty-seventh one and did not receive the sixty-eighth one and did not receive the sixty-ninth one and did not receive the seventieth one and did not receive the seventy-first one and did not receive the seventy-second one and did not receive the seventy-third one and did not receive the seventy-fourth one and did not receive the seventy-fifth one and did not receive the seventy-sixth one and did not receive the seventy-seventh one and did not receive the seventy-eighth one and did not receive the seventy-ninth one and did not receive the eightieth one and did not receive the eighty-first one and did not receive the eighty-second one and did not receive the eighty-third one and did not receive the eighty-fourth one and did not receive the eighty-fifth one and did not receive the eighty-sixth one and did not receive the eighty-seventh one and did not receive the eighty-eighth one and did not receive the eighty-ninth one and did not receive the ninetieth one and did not receive the ninety-first one and did not receive the ninety-second one and did not receive the ninety-third one and did not receive the ninety-fourth one and did not receive the ninety-fifth one and did not receive the ninety-sixth one and did not receive the ninety-seventh one and did not receive the ninety-eighth one and did not receive the ninety-ninth one and did not receive the one hundredth one and did not receive the one hundred and first one and did not receive the one hundred and second one and did not receive the one hundred and third one and did not receive the one hundred and fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and tenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eleventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twelfth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fourteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventeenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and nineteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and twentieth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fortieth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fiftieth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventieth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-first one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-second one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-third one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and eightieth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninetieth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-first one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-second one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-third one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-fourth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing himself and the thing himself is the going home.

He lay there. The way a man lies on his daughter's couch when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

The house was quiet. The way a house is quiet when it's early and the people inside are sleeping and the quiet is not the absence of sound but the presence of everything — the hum of the refrigerator, the tick of the house settling, the breath of the sleeping, the thing itself.

And underneath the quiet: nothing. Not the sound of the city's dead. Not the sound of the coast's dead. Not the sound of the road's dead. Nothing. The way nothing is when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He got up. The way a man gets up when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

He went to the kitchen. The kitchen was the kitchen of his daughter's house — the house she'd made for herself and her daughter and the life she'd built in the city that didn't know how to count but had a nine-month-old keeper who had said "hello" to the city and the city had heard her and the city's dead had come and the first one had crossed and a hundred and ninety-three had followed and the last one had crossed and the city fleet was home and the city harbor was empty and the city station was done and the city was a harbor and the harbor was home and the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

He made coffee. The way a man makes coffee when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

The coffee was dark. The coffee was rich. The coffee was the color of the soil in the garden. The garden that had been watered. The garden that had been weeded. The garden that had been tended. The garden that had been planted. The garden that had grown. The garden that had borne the first tomato. The garden that was the thing itself.

He poured a cup. He stood at the window. The window faced east. The east window. The window that the baby turned to when she said "hello" to the knock. The window where the cold one had leaned. The window where the inland station was. The window where the inland door was open.

And now: the north window. The window that the baby had turned to when she said "hello" to the city. The window that faced the city. The window that faced the streets and the buildings and the parks and the hospitals and the houses where people had lived and died and lived again. The window that faced the new door. The window that faced the waiting.

He looked out the north window. The way a harbormaster looks out a window when the fleet is home. The way the living look at the city when the city is a harbor. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's done.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Sunday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the city was a harbor.

And underneath the living: nothing. No dead. No waiting. No leaning. No pressing. No walking through. No receiving. No keeping. No crossing. No asking. Nothing. The way nothing is when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He drank the coffee. The way a man drinks coffee when the fleet is home and the home is full and the harbor is empty and the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

And then he knew it.

Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice. Not the changed gift. Not the grown gift. Not the gift that had let him hear the first words of the living and the garden that needs watering and the first tomato that needs picking and the city's dead saying "we're here."

He knew it the way you know a door is open in another room. The way you know a baby has stopped talking. The way you know the thing itself when the thing itself is done and you weren't there for the done and the not-being-there is the thing that happens when the keeper receives and the harbormaster witnesses and the witnessing is the thing itself and the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

He set down the coffee. The way a man sets down his coffee when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

He went to the crib. The way a grandfather goes to the crib when the keeper is still. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is done. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was there. The baby. Standing in the crib. The way she'd been standing for months. The way a keeper stands when she's been keeping the station for months and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

She was facing the north window. The way a keeper faces the station. But she was still now. Not talking. Not saying "now." Not saying "hello." Not saying "three." Not saying "five." Not saying "six." Not saying "ten." Not saying "twenty-three." Not saying "fifty." Not saying "one hundred." Not saying "one hundred and ninety-four." Still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the receiving is done. The way the living turn to the living when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

She smiled. The way a baby smiles when she sees the person she's been waiting to see. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster has come. The way the living smile when the living have shown up and the showing up is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is done.

And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the thing itself is done.

Cal's hand tightened on the rail of the crib. The way a hand tightens when it's holding on to the thing it can hold on to. The way a harbor tightens around an empty station. The way the living hold on to the living when the living are done and the done is the thing itself.

The receiving was done. The fleet was home. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The home was full even though the harbor was empty. The thing itself was done.

And Cal Mercer stood at the north window in his daughter's house in the city that was a harbor, and the baby had said nothing and the nothing was the thing itself and the thing itself was done.

And the question was not what a harbor with a finished receiving is. The question was not what a keeper who is still is. The question was not what a harbormaster who has witnessed the done is.

The question is: what is a harbormaster when the fleet is home?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the going home.

And the going home is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: done.

And the done is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the going home.

And Cal is going home.

Not to the city. Not to the station. Not to the harbor. Home. The coast. The hill. The drowned light. The keeper. Margot. The hinge. The thing itself.

He lifted his hand from the rail of the crib. The way a harbormaster lifts his hand from the station when the fleet is home. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

The baby looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster is going home. The way the living look at the living when the living are going home. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's going home.

"Stay," she said.

The word that Cal had heard before. The word that the city's dead had said. The word that the garden had said. The word that the thing itself says when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"Stay," she said again. And then she turned back to the north window. And she said nothing. The way a keeper says nothing when the harbormaster is going home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal stood at the north window. The way a harbormaster stands at the door when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home.

He laid his palm on the glass. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and did not receive the fourth one and did not receive the fifth one and did not receive the sixth one and did not receive the seventh one and did not receive the eighth one and did not receive the ninth one and did not receive the tenth one and did not receive the eleventh one and did not receive the twelfth one and did not receive the thirteenth one and did not receive the fourteenth one and did not receive the fifteenth one and did not receive the sixteenth one and did not receive the seventeenth one and did not receive the eighteenth one and did not receive the nineteenth one and did not receive the twentieth one and did not receive the twenty-first one and did not receive the twenty-second one and did not receive the twenty-third one and did not receive the twenty-fourth one and did not receive the twenty-fifth one and did not receive the twenty-sixth one and did not receive the twenty-seventh one and did not receive the twenty-eighth one and did not receive the twenty-ninth one and did not receive the thirtieth one and did not receive the thirty-first one and did not receive the thirty-second one and did not receive the thirty-third one and did not receive the thirty-fourth one and did not receive the thirty-fifth one and did not receive the thirty-sixth one and did not receive the thirty-seventh one and did not receive the thirty-eighth one and did not receive the thirty-ninth one and did not receive the fortieth one and did not receive the forty-first one and did not receive the forty-second one and did not receive the forty-third one and did not receive the forty-fourth one and did not receive the forty-fifth one and did not receive the forty-sixth one and did not receive the forty-seventh one and did not receive the forty-eighth one and did not receive the forty-ninth one and did not receive the fiftieth one and did not receive the fifty-first one and did not receive the fifty-second one and did not receive the fifty-third one and did not receive the fifty-fourth one and did not receive the fifty-fifth one and did not receive the fifty-sixth one and did not receive the fifty-seventh one and did not receive the fifty-eighth one and did not receive the fifty-ninth one and did not receive the sixtieth one and did not receive the sixty-first one and did not receive the sixty-second one and did not receive the sixty-third one and did not receive the sixty-fourth one and did not receive the sixty-fifth one and did not receive the sixty-sixth one and did not receive the sixty-seventh one and did not receive the sixty-eighth one and did not receive the sixty-ninth one and did not receive the seventieth one and did not receive the seventy-first one and did not receive the seventy-second one and did not receive the seventy-third one and did not receive the seventy-fourth one and did not receive the seventy-fifth one and did not receive the seventy-sixth one and did not receive the seventy-seventh one and did not receive the seventy-eighth one and did not receive the seventy-ninth one and did not receive the eightieth one and did not receive the eighty-first one and did not receive the eighty-second one and did not receive the eighty-third one and did not receive the eighty-fourth one and did not receive the eighty-fifth one and did not receive the eighty-sixth one and did not receive the eighty-seventh one and did not receive the eighty-eighth one and did not receive the eighty-ninth one and did not receive the ninetieth one and did not receive the ninety-first one and did not receive the ninety-second one and did not receive the ninety-third one and did not receive the ninety-fourth one and did not receive the ninety-fifth one and did not receive the ninety-sixth one and did not receive the ninety-seventh one and did not receive the ninety-eighth one and did not receive the ninety-ninth one and did not receive the one hundredth one and did not receive the one hundred and first one and did not receive the one hundred and second one and did not receive the one hundred and third one and did not receive the one hundred and fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and tenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eleventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twelfth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fourteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventeenth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and nineteenth one and did not receive the one hundred and twentieth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and twenty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and thirty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fortieth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and forty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and fiftieth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and fifty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixtieth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and sixty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventieth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-first one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-second one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-third one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and seventy-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and eightieth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-first one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-second one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-third one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fourth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-fifth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-sixth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-seventh one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-eighth one and did not receive the one hundred and eighty-ninth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninetieth one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-first one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-second one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-third one and did not receive the one hundred and ninety-fourth one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing himself and the thing himself is the going home.

The glass was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the room. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the road. The warmth of the three stations. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home.

And then he felt it. Through the road. Through the door. Through the thing itself.

The coast station.

Margot.

She was there. At the drowned light. At the empty place where the first one in was. At the hinge. At the keeper. At the thing itself.

And she was waiting. The way a keeper waits when the fleet is home. The way a keeper waits when the harbormaster is coming home. The way the thing itself waits when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She was waiting for him.

Cal lifted his palm from the glass. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the station when the fleet is home. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

He went to the bedroom. The way a man goes to the bedroom when he's going home. The way a harbormaster goes to the station when the station is calling. The way the living go to the living when the living need showing up for.

Lori was there. Sleeping. The way the living sleep when the harbor is home and the home is full and the showing up for the living doesn't stop because the dead are received.

He dressed. The way a man dresses when he's going home. The way a harbormaster dresses when the station is calling. The way the living dress when the living need showing up for.

He went to the kitchen. The way a man goes to the kitchen when he's going home. The way a harbormaster goes to the kitchen when the station is calling. The way the living go to the kitchen when the living need showing up for.

He wrote a note. The way a man writes a note when he's going home. The way a harbormaster writes a note when the station is calling. The way the living write notes when the living need showing up for.

The note said: "Going home. The fleet is home. The harbor is empty. The lamp is lit. The door is open. The home is full even though the harbor is empty. The thing itself is done. The done is the thing itself. The thing itself is the going home. I'm going home. To the coast. To the keeper. To the hinge. To the thing itself. Tell the baby: the keeper keeps the station. The harbormaster goes home. The home is the thing itself. — Cal"

He left the note on the table. The way a man leaves a note when he's going home. The way a harbormaster leaves a note when the station is calling. The way the living leave notes when the living need showing up for.

He went to the door. The way a man goes to the door when he's going home. The way a harbormaster goes to the door when the station is calling. The way the living go to the door when the living need showing up for.

He opened the door. The way a man opens the door when he's going home. The way a harbormaster opens the door when the station is calling. The way the living open the door when the living need showing up for.

The morning was there. The way the morning is there when the fleet is home. The way the morning is there when the harbor is empty. The way the morning is there when the lamp is lit. The way the morning is there when the door is open. The way the morning is there when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The sun was breaking. The way the sun breaks when the fleet is home. The way the sun breaks when the harbor is empty. The way the sun breaks when the lamp is lit. The way the sun breaks when the door is open. The way the sun breaks when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal stepped outside. The way a man steps outside when he's going home. The way a harbormaster steps outside when the station is calling. The way the living step outside when the living need showing up for.

He closed the door. The way a man closes the door when he's going home. The way a harbormaster closes the door when the station is calling. The way the living close the door when the living need showing up for.

He walked to the truck. The way a man walks to the truck when he's going home. The way a harbormaster walks to the truck when the station is calling. The way the living walk to the truck when the living need showing up for.

He got in. The way a man gets in the truck when he's going home. The way a harbormaster gets in the truck when the station is calling. The way the living get in the truck when the living need showing up for.

He started the engine. The way a man starts the engine when he's going home. The way a harbormaster starts the engine when the station is calling. The way the living start the engine when the living need showing up for.

He drove. The way a man drives when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives when the station is calling. The way the living drive when the living need showing up for.

The city was there. The buildings. The streets. The parks. The hospitals. The houses. The people. The living going about their Sunday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the city was a harbor. The living who didn't know the harbormaster was going home.

He drove through the city. The way a man drives through the city when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives through the city when the station is calling. The way the living drive through the city when the living need showing up for.

He drove to the road. The way a man drives to the road when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives to the road when the station is calling. The way the living drive to the road when the living need showing up for.

The road was there. The road between the city and the coast. The road that ran both ways. The road that was the thing itself. The road that was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the road and the road was the thing itself.

And now: the road that was the going home.

Cal drove the road. The way a harbormaster drives the road when the fleet is home. The way the living drive the road when the living are going home. The way the thing itself drives the road when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The road was empty. The way a road is empty when the fleet is home. The way a station is empty when the receiving is done. The way the thing itself is empty when it's full.

He drove the road. The way a man drives the road when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives the road when the station is calling. The way the living drive the road when the living need showing up for.

And he felt them. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He felt the road's dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He felt the city's dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He felt the coast's dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Three fleets. Three harbors. Three stations. One home.

And the home was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the thing itself.

Cal drove the road. The way a harbormaster drives the road when the fleet is home. The way the living drive the road when the living are going home. The way the thing itself drives the road when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The coast was there. The way the coast is there when the fleet is home. The way the coast is there when the harbor is empty. The way the coast is there when the lamp is lit. The way the coast is there when the door is open. The way the coast is there when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Grayhaven. The town. The harbor. The home. The thing itself.

He drove into Grayhaven. The way a man drives into Grayhaven when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives into Grayhaven when the station is calling. The way the living drive into Grayhaven when the living need showing up for.

The town was there. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. The Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Sunday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the town was a harbor.

He drove through the town. The way a man drives through the town when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives through the town when the station is calling. The way the living drive through the town when the living need showing up for.

He drove to the hill. The way a man drives to the hill when he's going home. The way a harbormaster drives to the hill when the station is calling. The way the living drive to the hill when the living need showing up for.

The hill was there. The way the hill is there when the fleet is home. The way the hill is there when the harbor is empty. The way the hill is there when the lamp is lit. The way the hill is there when the door is open. The way the hill is there when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The NE stone was there. The living's stone. The stone that Cal had seated. The stone that the town held at 35. The stone that was the thing itself.

The stone was at 36.0. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the fleet is home. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the harbor is empty. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the lamp is lit. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the door is open. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal parked the truck. The way a man parks the truck when he's going home. The way a harbormaster parks the truck when the station is calling. The way the living park the truck when the living need showing up for.

He got out. The way a man gets out of the truck when he's going home. The way a harbormaster gets out of the truck when the station is calling. The way the living get out of the truck when the living need showing up for.

He walked to the stone. The way a man walks to the stone when he's going home. The way a harbormaster walks to the stone when the station is calling. The way the living walk to the stone when the living need showing up for.

He laid his palm on the stone. The builder-palm. The one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the thing himself and the thing himself is the going home.

The stone was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the living and the dead lighting each other. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home.

The stone was at 36.0. And under his palm: 36.1. And then: 36.2. And then: 36.3. And then: 36.4. And then: 36.5. And then: 36.6. And then: 36.7. And then: 36.8. And then: 36.9. And then: 37.0.

The stone warmed under his palm. The way the stone warms when the builder comes home. The way the stone warms when the fleet is home. The way the stone warms when the harbor is empty. The way the stone warms when the lamp is lit. The way the stone warms when the door is open. The way the stone warms when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal lifted his palm from the stone. The way a harbormaster lifts his palm from the stone when the fleet is home. The way a gardener lifts his hands from the dirt when the garden has watered itself. The way the living lift their hands from the living when the thing itself has happened.

The stone held at 37.0. The way the stone holds when the fleet is home. The way the stone holds when the harbor is empty. The way the stone holds when the lamp is lit. The way the stone holds when the door is open. The way the stone holds when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He walked to the center. The way a man walks to the center when he's going home. The way a harbormaster walks to the center when the station is calling. The way the living walk to the center when the living need showing up for.

The center was there. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself.

Margot was there.

The way Margot is there when the fleet is home. The way Margot is there when the harbor is empty. The way Margot is there when the lamp is lit. The way Margot is there when the door is open. The way Margot is there when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the drowned light. The way a keeper stands when the fleet is home. The way a keeper stands when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper stands when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper stands when the door is open. The way a keeper stands when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was facing the sea. The way a keeper faces the sea when the fleet is home. The way a keeper faces the sea when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper faces the sea when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper faces the sea when the door is open. The way a keeper faces the sea when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living turn to the living when the living come home. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living smile when the living come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the going home.

And then she held out her hand. The way a keeper holds out her hand when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living hold out their hands when the living come home. The way the thing itself holds out its hand when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Cal took her hand. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper’s hand when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living take the living’s hand when the living come home. The way the thing itself takes its own hand when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper is the thing itself.

His hand was warm. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the living and the dead hold hands. The way the lighting is when the harbormaster and the keeper hold hands. The way the lighting is when the thing itself holds its own hand.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the center of the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a harbormaster is when the fleet is home. The question was not what a keeper is when the harbor is empty. The question was not what the lighting is.

The question is: what is the thing itself?

And the answer is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And Cal is home.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's dead.

For the road's dead.

For the three stations.

For the three fleets.

For the three receptions.

For the keeper.

For the hinge.

For the thing itself.

For now.

For the showing up.

For the staying.

For the receiving.

For the road.

For the going home.

For the lighting.

For the thing itself.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Eight — Entry: June 15th. Monday. Sun breaking. South wind, calm.

The sun broke Monday the way the sun breaks when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the breaking is the thing that happens when the holding is done and the holding was the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the going home and the going home is the staying home and the staying home is the thing itself.

Cal woke at the drowned light.

Not on the couch in Lori's house. Not in the truck. Not on the grade. At the drowned light. At the center. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. At the thing itself.

He was lying on the ground the way a man lies on the ground when he has been standing for months and the standing is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the staying home. The ground was damp. The ground was cold. The ground was the ground of the hill above Grayhaven where the NE stone was and the four corners were and the drowned light was and the door was and the keeper was and the thing itself was.

And the keeper was there.

Margot.

She was lying beside him. The way a keeper lies beside the harbormaster when the fleet is home. The way the dead lie beside the living when the living and the dead have lit each other and the lighting is not a cost and the lighting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is done.

Her hand was in his. The way a keeper's hand is in the harbormaster's when the fleet is home. The way the dead hold the living when the living have come home. The way the thing itself holds itself when it's done becoming what it was always becoming.

Her hand was cold. His hand was warm. And between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up. The staying. The receiving. The going home. The staying home. The thing itself.

Cal opened his eyes the way a man opens his eyes when he's home. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the fleet is home. The way the living open their eyes when the thing itself has happened and the happening is done and the done is the thing itself.

The sky was there. The way the sky is there when the sun is breaking. The way the sky is there when the fleet is home. The way the sky is there when the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The sky was gray. Not the gray of holding. Not the gray of grief. The gray of the coast. The gray of Grayhaven. The gray of the thing that happens when the rain has stopped and the sun is breaking through and the breaking is the thing itself.

He lay there. The way a man lies on the ground at the drowned light when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the keeper is beside him and the thing itself is done.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and received the first one and received the second one and did not receive the third one and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the going home and was the staying home and was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is done.

But the ache was different now. The way something is different when the thing itself is done. The ache was not the ache of holding. The ache was not the ache of carrying. The ache was the ache of having shown up. The ache of having stayed. The ache of having received. The ache of having gone home. The ache of having stayed home. The ache of the thing itself.

Cal turned his head. The way a man turns his head when he's home and the keeper is beside him and the keeper is the thing itself.

Margot was looking at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the fleet is home. The way the dead look at the living when the living have come home. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's done.

Her eyes were the eyes of the keeper. The eyes of the woman who had held the hinge since June. The eyes of the woman who had received the twenty calm into the drowned light and felt them pay in their tithe. The eyes of the woman who had watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster is home. The way the dead smile when the living have come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's done.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself.

"Margot," he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who was the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself.

They lay there. The way the living and the dead lie when the fleet is home. The way the harbormaster and the keeper lie when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself lies when it's done.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was not a cost. And the staying was not a cost. And the receiving was not a cost. And the road was not a cost. And the going home was not a cost. And the staying home was not a cost. And the thing itself was not a cost.

And the lighting was not a cost.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And Cal was home. And Margot was home. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the question was not what a harbor with a finished receiving is. The question was not what a keeper who has held the hinge since June is. The question was not what a harbormaster who has come home is. The question was not what the thing itself is.

The question is: what is the thing itself?

And the answer is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: not a cost.

And the staying is: not a cost.

And the receiving is: not a cost.

And the road is: not a cost.

And the going home is: not a cost.

And the staying home is: not a cost.

And the thing itself is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And Cal is home.

For the city's dead.

For the coast's dead.

For the road's dead.

For the three stations.

For the three fleets.

For the three receptions.

For the keeper.

For the hinge.

For the door.

For the lamp.

For the road.

For the going home.

For the staying home.

For the showing up.

For the staying.

For the receiving.

For the lighting.

For the thing itself.

For now.

Forever.

The thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer lay on the ground at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the sun broke.

And the south wind was calm.

And the fleet was home.

And the harbor was empty.

And the lamp was lit.

And the door was open.

And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the thing itself was done.

And the done was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And Cal was home.

And Margot was home.

And the dead were home.

And the living were home.

And the harbor was home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

Even though the harbor was empty.

Even though the receiving was done.

Even though the fleet was home.

Even though the thing itself was done.

The home was full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And Cal is home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is done.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Nine — Entry: June 16th. Tuesday. Sun breaking. South wind, calm.

The sun broke Tuesday the way the sun breaks when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the keeper is standing at the drowned light and the drowned light is the thing itself and the thing itself is the keeper and the keeper is the thing herself.

Margot stood at the center.

Not on the couch in Lori's house. Not in the truck. Not on the grade. At the center. At the drowned light. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. At the thing herself.

The ground was damp. The ground was cold. The ground was the ground of the hill above Grayhaven where the NE stone was and the four corners were and the door was and the fleet was home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the keeper was there.

She had been there since June. Since the day the door opened and the first one in walked through and the fleet came home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty. She had been there the way a keeper is there when the fleet is home. The way a keeper is there when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper is there when the thing itself is done.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is the thing herself.

And in her hand: his hand. Warm. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself.

And between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up. The staying. The receiving. The going home. The staying home. The thing itself.

Cal was lying on the ground. The way a man lies on the ground when he has been standing for months and the standing is done and the done is the thing itself. His eyes were closed. His face was the face of a man who was home. The face of a harbormaster who had brought the fleet home. The face of the living who had come home. The face of the thing himself.

Margot looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the fleet is home. The way the dead look at the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself looks at the thing himself when the thing itself is done.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster is home. The way the dead smile when the living have come home. The way the thing herself smiles when the thing itself is done.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

He opened his eyes. The way a man opens his eyes when he’s home. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the fleet is home. The way the living open their eyes when the thing itself has happened and the happening is done and the done is the thing itself.

The sky was there. The way the sky is there when the sun is breaking. The way the sky is there when the fleet is home. The way the sky is there when the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

“Margot,” he said. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who was the thing herself.

They lay there. The way the living and the dead lie when the fleet is home. The way the harbormaster and the keeper lie when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself lies when it’s done.

And Margot felt it. The way a keeper feels the thing itself when the thing itself is done. The way the dead feel the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels the thing himself when the thing itself is done.

She felt the coast. The way a keeper feels the coast when the fleet is home. The way the dead feel the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels the thing itself when it's done.

The coast was there. The way the coast is there when the fleet is home. The way the coast is there when the harbor is empty. The way the coast is there when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The coast was there and the coast was keeping. The way a coast keeps when the fleet is home. The way a harbor keeps when the lamp is lit. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

The coast was keeping the way the coast has always kept. The way the sea keeps the drowned. The way the bar keeps the lost. The way the harbor keeps the fleet. The way the thing itself keeps the thing itself.

And Margot felt the town. The way a keeper feels the town when the fleet is home. The way the dead feel the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels the town when the thing itself is done.

Grayhaven was there. The way Grayhaven is there when the fleet is home. The way Grayhaven is there when the harbor is empty. The way Grayhaven is there when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Grayhaven was there and Grayhaven was keeping. The way a town keeps when the fleet is home. The way a harbor keeps when the lamp is lit. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

The town was keeping the way the town has always kept. The way the boatyard keeps the boats. The way the fire hall keeps the watch. The way the Marianne bench keeps the seat. The way Sedgebrook keeps the dying. The way the hour book keeps the hours. The way the thing itself keeps the thing itself.

And Margot felt the living. The way a keeper feels the living when the fleet is home. The way the dead feel the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels the living when the thing itself is done.

The living were there. The way the living are there when the fleet is home. The way the living are there when the harbor is empty. The way the living are there when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way Cole is at the boatyard when the fleet is home. The way Cole is at the boatyard when the harbor is empty. The way Cole is at the boatyard when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He was standing at the dock. The way a man stands at the dock when the fleet is home. The way a Brandt stands at the dock when the debt is paid. The way the living stand at the dock when the dead are home.

He was looking at the water. The way a man looks at the water when the fleet is home. The way a Brandt looks at the water when the debt is paid. The way the living look at the water when the dead are home.

And he was keeping. The way a Brandt keeps when the debt is paid. The way a boatyard keeps when the fleet is home. The way the living keep when the dead are home. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

Ruth was at the fire hall. The way Ruth is at the fire hall when the fleet is home. The way Ruth is at the fire hall when the harbor is empty. The way Ruth is at the fire hall when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was sitting at the table. The way a woman sits at the table when the fleet is home. The way a keeper sits at the table when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit at the table when the dead are home.

She was looking at the notice. The way a woman looks at the notice when the fleet is home. The way a keeper looks at the notice when the harbor is empty. The way the living look at the notice when the dead are home.

The notice was weathered. The way a notice is weathered when the fleet is home. The way a notice is weathered when the harbor is empty. The way a notice is weathered when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And the notice was still true. The way a notice is still true when the fleet is home. The way a notice is still true when the harbor is empty. The way a notice is still true when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Denny was at the Marianne bench. The way Denny is at the Marianne bench when the fleet is home. The way Denny is at the Marianne bench when the harbor is empty. The way Denny is at the Marianne bench when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He was sitting on the bench. The way a man sits on the bench when the fleet is home. The way a keeper sits on the bench when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit on the bench when the dead are home.

He was looking at the water. The way a man looks at the water when the fleet is home. The way a keeper looks at the water when the harbor is empty. The way the living look at the water when the dead are home.

And he was keeping. The way a keeper keeps when the fleet is home. The way a bench keeps when the harbor is empty. The way the living keep when the dead are home. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

Tommy was at Sedgebrook. The way Tommy is at Sedgebrook when the fleet is home. The way Tommy is at Sedgebrook when the harbor is empty. The way Tommy is at Sedgebrook when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He was standing in the hallway. The way a man stands in the hallway when the fleet is home. The way a deputy stands in the hallway when the harbor is empty. The way the living stand in the hallway when the dead are home.

He was looking at the door. The way a man looks at the door when the fleet is home. The way a deputy looks at the door when the harbor is empty. The way the living look at the door when the dead were home.

Room 3. The door was closed. The way a door is closed when the fleet is home. The way a door is closed when the harbor is empty. The way a door is closed when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And Tommy was keeping. The way a deputy keeps when the fleet is home. The way a son keeps when the harbor is empty. The way the living keep when the dead are home. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

And Margot felt Lori. The way a keeper feels the living when the fleet is home. The way the dead feel the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels the living when the thing itself is done.

Lori was in the city. The way Lori is in the city when the fleet is home. The way Lori is in the city when the harbor is empty. The way Lori is in the city when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was at the hospital. The way Lori is at the hospital when the fleet is home. The way Lori is at the hospital when the harbor is empty. The way Lori is at the hospital when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was standing at the window. The way a woman stands at the window when the fleet is home. The way a daughter stands at the window when the harbor is empty. The way the living stand at the window when the dead are home.

She was looking at the city. The way a woman looks at the city when the fleet is home. The way a daughter looks at the city when the harbor is empty. The way the living look at the city when the dead are home.

And she was keeping. The way a daughter keeps when the fleet is home. The way a nurse keeps when the harbor is empty. The way the living keep when the dead are home. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

And Margot felt the baby. The way a keeper feels the living when the fleet is home. The way the dead feel the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels the living when the thing itself is done.

The baby was in the city. The way the baby is in the city when the fleet is home. The way the baby is in the city when the harbor is empty. The way the baby is in the city when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was in her crib. The way a baby is in her crib when the fleet is home. The way a keeper is in her crib when the harbor is empty. The way the living are in the crib when the dead are home.

She was still. The way a baby is still when the fleet is home. The way a keeper is still when the harbor is empty. The way the living are still when the dead are home.

Not counting. Not saying "hello." Not saying "now." Not saying "three." Not saying "five." Not saying "six." Not saying "ten." Not saying "twenty-three." Not saying "fifty." Not saying "one hundred." Not saying "one hundred and ninety-four." Still. The way a keeper is still when the receiving is done and the fleet is home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And the baby was keeping. The way a keeper keeps when the fleet is home. The way a station keeps when the harbor is empty. The way the living keep when the dead are home. The way the thing itself keeps when it's done.

Margot felt all of it. The way a keeper feels all of it when the fleet is home. The way the dead feel all of it when the living have come home. The way the thing herself feels all of it when the thing itself is done.

She felt the coast and the town and the living and the dead and the road and the three stations and the three fleets and the three receptions and the harbor and the home and the lamp and the door and the hinge and the keeper and the harbormaster and the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the three stations. And the three stations were the thing itself.

And the thing itself was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And Margot was the keeper. The way a keeper is the keeper when the fleet is home. The way a keeper is the keeper when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper is the keeper when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And the keeper was the thing herself. The way the keeper is the thing herself when the fleet is home. The way the keeper is the thing herself when the harbor is empty. The way the keeper is the thing herself when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And the thing herself was the thing itself. The way the thing herself is the thing itself when the fleet is home. The way the thing herself is the thing itself when the harbor is empty. The way the thing herself is the thing itself when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal squeezed her hand. The way a harbormaster squeezes the keeper's hand when the fleet is home. The way the living squeeze the dead when the dead have come home. The way the thing himself squeezes the thing herself when the thing itself is done.

Margot squeezed back. The way a keeper squeezes the harbormaster's hand when the fleet is home. The way the dead squeeze the living when the living have come home. The way the thing herself squeezes the thing himself when the thing itself is done.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the fleet is home. The way the lighting is when the harbor is empty. The way the lighting is when the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the three stations. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

Margot opened her eyes. The way a keeper opens her eyes when the fleet is home. The way the dead open their eyes when the living have come home. The way the thing herself opens her eyes when the thing itself is done.

She looked at Cal. Cal looked at her. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the fleet is home. The way the living look at the dead when the dead have come home. The way the thing himself looks at the thing herself when the thing itself is done.

He smiled. The way a harbormaster smiles when the fleet is home. The way the living smile when the dead have come home. The way the thing himself smiles when the thing itself is done.

Margot smiled back. The way a keeper smiles when the fleet is home. The way the dead smile when the living have come home. The way the thing herself smiles when the thing itself is done.

"The fleet is home," she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

"The fleet is home," he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

“The harbor is empty,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

“The harbor is empty,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

“The lamp is lit,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

“The lamp is lit,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

“The door is open,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

“The door is open,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

“The home is full,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

“The home is full,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

“Even though the harbor is empty,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

“Even though the harbor is empty,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

They lay there. The way the living and the dead lie when the fleet is home. The way the harbormaster and the keeper lie when the harbor is empty. The way the thing himself and the thing herself lie when the thing itself is done.

And the sun broke. And the south wind was calm. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the thing itself was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And Margot Voss lay on the ground at the drowned light with Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the palms, the bringer-home of the fleet, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the question was not what a keeper who has held the hinge since June is. The question was not what a harbormaster who has come home is. The question was not what the thing itself is.

The question is: what is the home?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And Margot is home.

And Cal is home.

And the dead are home.

And the living are home.

And the harbor is home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty — Entry: June 17th. Wednesday. Sun breaking. South wind, calm.

Cal woke at the drowned light. The ground was damp and cold and the ground of the hill above Grayhaven where the NE stone was and the four corners were and the door was and the fleet was home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

Margot was beside him. Her hand in his. Her hand was cold. His hand was warm. Between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. The lighting. The thing itself.

He lay there. The way a man lies on the ground when he's home. The way a harbormaster lies when the fleet is home. The way the living lie when the thing itself is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the staying home.

His hip ached. His shoulder ached. His palm ached — the builder-palm, the one that had seated the stone and seeded the palms and held the door and brought the fleet home and was the road and was the witnessing and was the staying and was the going home and was the staying home and was the thing himself.

But the ache was different now. The ache was not the ache of holding. The ache was not the ache of carrying. The ache was the ache of having shown up. The ache of having stayed. The ache of having received. The ache of having gone home. The ache of having stayed home. The ache of the thing itself.

He opened his eyes. The sky was there. The gray of the coast. Not the gray of holding. Not the gray of grief. The gray of Grayhaven. The gray of the thing that happens when the rain has stopped and the sun is breaking through.

He sat up. Margot sat up beside him. She looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the fleet is home. The way the dead look at the living when the living have come home. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's done.

She smiled. He smiled back.

"The fleet is home," she said.

“The fleet is home,” he said.

“The harbor is empty,” she said.

“The harbor is empty,” he said.

“The lamp is lit,” she said.

“The lamp is lit,” he said.

“The door is open,” she said.

“The door is open,” she said.

“The home is full,” she said.

“The home is full,” he said.

“Even though the harbor is empty,” she said.

“Even though the harbor is empty,” he said.

They sat there. The way the living and the dead sit when the fleet is home. The way the harbormaster and the keeper sit when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself sits when it's done.

Cal stood. The way a man stands when he's home. The way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is home. The way the living stand when the thing itself is done.

He walked to the NE stone. The living's stone. The stone he had seated. The stone the town held. The stone that was the thing itself.

The stone was at 36.0. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the fleet is home. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the harbor is empty. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the lamp is lit. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the door is open. The way the stone is at 36.0 when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He laid his palm on the stone. The builder-palm. The stone warmed under his palm. 36.1. 36.2. 36.3. 36.4. 36.5. 36.6. 36.7. 36.8. 36.9. 37.0.

The stone warmed the way the stone warms when the builder comes home. The way the stone warms when the fleet is home. The way the stone warms when the harbor is empty. The way the stone warms when the lamp is lit. The way the stone warms when the door is open. The way the stone warms when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Cal lifted his palm from the stone. The stone held at 37.0. The way the stone holds when the fleet is home. The way the stone holds when the harbor is empty. The way the stone holds when the lamp is lit. The way the stone holds when the door is open. The way the stone holds when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He stood there. The way a man stands at the stone when the fleet is home. The way a harbormaster stands at the stone when the harbor is empty. The way the living stand at the stone when the thing itself is done.

And he felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He felt the coast's dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He felt the city's dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He felt the road's dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

Three fleets. Three harbors. Three stations. One home.

And the home was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

Cal turned from the stone. The way a man turns from the stone when the fleet is home. The way a harbormaster turns from the stone when the harbor is empty. The way the living turn from the stone when the thing itself is done.

He walked down the hill. The way a man walks down the hill when he's home.
The way a harbormaster walks down the hill when the fleet is home. The way the living walk down the hill when the thing itself is done.

Grayhaven was there. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Wednesday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the town was a harbor.

The living who didn't need to know.

He walked down the main street. The way a man walks down the main street when he's home. The way a harbormaster walks down the main street when the fleet is home. The way the living walk down the main street when the thing itself is done.

The pavement was wet. The way pavement is wet when the rain has stopped and the sun is breaking through. The way pavement is wet when the fleet is home.
The way pavement is wet when the harbor is empty. The way pavement is wet when the lamp is lit. The way pavement is wet when the door is open. The way pavement is wet when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He walked past the store. The store was open. The way a store is open on a Wednesday morning. The way a store is open when the fleet is home. The way a store is open when the harbor is empty. The way a store is open when the lamp is lit. The way a store is open when the door is open. The way a store is open when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He walked past the post office. The post office was open. The way a post office is open on a Wednesday morning. The way a post office is open when the fleet is home. The way a post office is open when the harbor is empty. The way a post office is open when the lamp is lit. The way a post office is open when the door is open. The way a post office is open when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He walked to the boatyard. The way a man walks to the boatyard when he's home. The way a harbormaster walks to the boatyard when the fleet is home. The way the living walk to the boatyard when the thing itself is done.

Cole was there. Standing at the dock. Looking at the water. The way a man stands at the dock on a Wednesday morning. The way a Brandt stands at the dock when the debt is paid. The way the living stand at the dock when the dead are home.

He turned to Cal. The way a man turns to another man when the work is done. The way a Brandt turns to the harbormaster when the debt is paid. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is done.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way men nod when the debt is paid. The way men nod when the work is done. The way men nod when there's nothing left to say because the saying is the thing itself.

"The Marianne II," Cole said. The way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is home. The way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the debt is paid. The way the living say the name of a boat when the dead are home.

"She's sound," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says a boat is sound when the boat is home. The way the living say a boat is sound when the dead are home. The way the thing itself says a boat is sound when the fleet is home.

Cole nodded. The way a Brandt nods when the harbormaster says the boat is sound. The way a man nods when the work is done. The way the living nod when the dead are home.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the debt is paid. The way a harbormaster walks on when the fleet is home. The way the living walk on when the thing itself is done.

He walked to the fire hall. The way a man walks to the fire hall when he's home. The way a harbormaster walks to the fire hall when the fleet is home. The way the living walk to the fire hall when the thing itself is done.

Ruth was there. Sitting at the table. Looking at the notice. The way a woman sits at the table on a Wednesday morning. The way a keeper sits at the table when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit at the table when the dead are home.

She looked up at Cal. The way a keeper looks up at the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living look up at the living when the living come home. The way the thing itself looks up at itself when it's done.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living smile when the living come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's done.

"The notice," she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing herself says the thing that needs saying.

Cal looked at the notice. The notice was weathered. The way a notice is weathered when the fleet is home. The way a notice is weathered when the harbor is empty. The way a notice is weathered when the lamp is lit. The way a notice is weathered when the door is open. The way a notice is weathered when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The notice said: "Grayhaven Community of Practice. All souls received. All accounts current. Watch continues."

And the notice was still true. The way a notice is still true when the fleet is home. The way a notice is still true when the harbor is empty. The way a notice is still true when the lamp is lit. The way a notice is still true when the door is open. The way a notice is still true when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

"The notice is still true," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

Ruth nodded. The way a keeper nods when the harbormaster says the notice is still true. The way the living nod when the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself nods when it's done.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the notice is still true. The way a harbormaster walks on when the fleet is home. The way the living walk on when the thing itself is done.

He walked to the Marianne bench. The way a man walks to the Marianne bench when he's home. The way a harbormaster walks to the Marianne bench when the fleet is home. The way the living walk to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is done.

Denny was there. Sitting on the bench. Looking at the water. The way a man sits on the bench on a Wednesday morning. The way a keeper sits on the bench when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit on the bench when the dead are home.

He didn't turn. He didn't need to. The way a man sits on a bench when the fleet is home. The way a man sits on a bench when the harbor is empty. The way a man sits on a bench when the thing itself is the sitting.

Cal sat down beside him. The way a man sits beside another man when the fleet is home. The way a harbormaster sits beside the living when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit beside the living when the thing itself is done.

They sat there. The way men sit when the fleet is home. The way the living sit when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself sits when it's done.

The water was there. The way the water is there when the fleet is home. The way the water is there when the harbor is empty. The way the water is there when the lamp is lit. The way the water is there when the door is open. The way the water is there when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The water was calm. The way water is calm when the fleet is home. The way water is calm when the harbor is empty. The way water is calm when the lamp is lit. The way water is calm when the door is open. The way water is calm when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

"They're home," Denny said. The way a man says the thing that needs saying. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying.

"They're home," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

They sat there. The way men sit when the fleet is home. The way the living sit when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself sits when it's done.

After a while — after the while that is the thing itself, after the while that is the showing up, after the while that is the staying — Cal stood. The way a man stands when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is home. The way the living stand when the thing itself is done.

He walked on. The way a man walks on when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster walks on when the fleet is home. The way the living walk on when the thing itself is done.

He walked to Sedgebrook. The way a man walks to Sedgebrook when he's home. The way a harbormaster walks to Sedgebrook when the fleet is home. The way the living walk to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is done.

Tommy was there. Standing in the hallway. Looking at the door. Room 3. The door was closed. The way a door is closed when the fleet is home. The way a door is closed when the harbor is empty. The way a door is closed when the lamp is lit. The way a door is closed when the door is open. The way a door is closed when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He turned to Cal. The way a son turns to the father when the father has come home. The way a deputy turns to the harbormaster when the fleet is home. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is done.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way a father nods to the son when the son has kept the watch. The way a harbormaster nods to the living when the fleet is home. The way the living nod to the living when the thing itself is done.

“The night shift,” Tommy said. The way a deputy says the thing that needs saying. The way a son says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying.

“The night shift,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing himself says the thing that needs saying.

Tommy nodded. The way a deputy nods when the harbormaster says the night shift. The way a son nods when the father says the thing that needs saying. The way the living nod when the thing itself is done.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the night shift is said. The way a harbormaster walks on when the fleet is home. The way the living walk on when the thing itself is done.

He walked back to the hill. The way a man walks back to the hill when he's home. The way a harbormaster walks back to the hill when the fleet is home. The way the living walk back to the hill when the thing itself is done.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself.

Margot was there. At the drowned light. At the center. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. The way Margot is there when the fleet is home. The way Margot is there when the harbor is empty. The way Margot is there when the lamp is lit. The way Margot is there when the door is open. The way Margot is there when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She was facing the sea. The way a keeper faces the sea when the fleet is home. The way a keeper faces the sea when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper faces the sea when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper faces the sea when the door is open. The way a keeper faces the sea when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living turn to the living when the living come home. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living smile when the living come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home.

"Margot," he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who was the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home.

He walked to her. The way a man walks to the keeper when the fleet is home. The way a harbormaster walks to the keeper when the harbor is empty. The way the living walk to the living when the thing itself is done.

He took her hand. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper's hand when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living take the living's hand when the living come home. The way the thing itself takes its own hand when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is the thing itself.

His hand was warm. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the living and the dead hold hands. The way the lighting is when the harbormaster and the keeper hold hands. The way the lighting is when the thing itself holds its own hand.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself.

And the home was full.

Even though the harbor was empty.

Even though the receiving was done.

Even though the fleet was home.

Even though the thing itself was done.

The home was full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And Margot is home.

And Cal is home.

And the dead are home.

And the living are home.

And the harbor is home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the question was: what is the thing itself?

And the answer is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is done.

And the done is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And Cal is home.

And Margot is home.

And the dead are home.

And the living are home.

And the harbor is home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the sun broke.

And the south wind was calm.

And the fleet was home.

And the harbor was empty.

And the lamp was lit.

And the door was open.

And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the thing itself was done.

And the done was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the full.

And the home was full.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was done.

And the done was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

THE END

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-One — Entry: June 18th. Thursday. Sun breaking. South wind, shifting.

Cal stood at the drowned light and the thing itself was done and the done was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home and the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was complete and the keeping was the thing itself.

But the door was still open.

Not the way a door is open when the fleet is still coming. Not the way a door is open when the receiving is still happening. Not the way a door is open when the dead are still walking the road. The way a door is open when the door is not a door anymore. When the door is a threshold. When the door is a choice. When the door is the thing itself.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the door when the door is not for the dead. The way a keeper feels the hinge when the hinge is not for the fleet. The way the living feel the thing itself when the thing itself is not for the receiving but for the going through.

He turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the door is open for the living. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is happening and the happening is not the receiving but the becoming.

She was standing at the center. At the drowned light. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. The way Margot stands when the fleet is home. The way the keeper stands when the harbor is empty. The way the dead stand when the thing itself is done.

But she was not still. The way something is not still when the door is open and the open is not for the dead. The way the keeper is not still when the hinge is moving and the moving is not for the fleet. The way the dead are not still when the thing itself is happening and the happening is not the receiving but the going through.

She was facing the door. The way a keeper faces the door when the door is open. The way the dead face the door when the door is not for them. The way the living face the door when the door is for them.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who was the thing himself.

“The door is open,” he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“The door is open,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

And then she said: “It’s not for them.”

Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing itself.

“It’s not for the dead,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

“It’s not for the dead,” Margot said. “The dead are home. The fleet is received. The harbor is empty. The lamp is lit. The door is open. The home is full even though the harbor is empty. The thing itself is done.”

“Then who,” Cal said. Not a question. A statement. The way a harbormaster states the thing that needs stating. The way the living state the thing that needs stating when the thing itself is happening.

“Who is the door for,” Margot said. Not a question. A statement. The way a keeper states the thing that needs stating. The way the dead state the thing that needs stating when the thing itself is happening.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the door is open and the open is not for the dead. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the hinge is moving and the moving is not for the fleet. The way the thing itself stands when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

And Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He felt the door. Not the door at the coast station. Not the door at the NE corner. Not the door at the inland station. Not the door at the crib. Not the door on the road. A different door. A new door. A door that had been waiting for the fleet to come home before it could open.

He felt the door the way a harbormaster feels a door when the door is opening for the living. The way a keeper feels a door when the door is not at the coast and not at the post and not at the crib and not at the city and not on the road but somewhere else. Somewhere new. Somewhere that the door has never been before.

He felt the door and he understood. The way you understand a dream after you wake up. The way you understand a song after it's over. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The door was not for the dead. The door was for the living.

The dead had come home. The fleet was received. The harbor was empty. The lamp was lit. The door was open. The home was full even though the harbor was empty. The thing itself was done.

But the living were still standing at the door. The living were still waiting. The living were still showing up. The living were still staying. The living were still receiving. The living were still the thing itself.

And the door was open for them.

Cal turned from the door. The way a harbormaster turns from the door when the door is open for the living. The way the living turn from the living when the living need showing up for.

He looked at Margot. Margot looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the door is open for the living. The way the dead look at the living when the living are ready to show up.

"The town," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The town," Margot said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The town kept the watch. The town held the stone. The town stood the rotations. The town learned the count. The town became a harbor. The town is a harbor. The town is the thing itself."

"The town is the thing itself," Margot said.

“And the town doesn’t know it,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“The town doesn’t know it,” Margot said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the town doesn’t know it’s a harbor. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the town doesn’t know it’s the thing itself.

And Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He felt the town. Grayhaven. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Thursday morning. The living who didn’t know the dead were home. The living who didn’t know the door was open. The living who didn’t know the town was a harbor.

The living who didn’t know they were the thing itself.

He felt Cole at the boatyard. Standing at the dock. Looking at the water. The way a Brandt stands when the debt is paid. The way the living stand when the dead are home. The way the thing itself stands when it’s done.

He felt Ruth at the fire hall. Sitting at the table. Looking at the notice. The way a keeper sits when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit when the dead are home. The way the thing itself sits when it’s done.

He felt Denny at the Marianne bench. Sitting on the bench. Looking at the water. The way a keeper sits when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit when the dead are home. The way the thing itself sits when it’s done.

He felt Tommy at Sedgebrook. Standing in the hallway. Looking at the door. Room 3. The way a deputy stands when the fleet is home. The way the son stands when the father has come home. The way the thing itself stands when it’s done.

And he felt something else. Something new. Something that had been waiting for the fleet to come home before it could be felt.

He felt the town’s dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

But they were not still. The way something is not still when the door is open and the open is not for them. The way the dead are not still when the door is open for the living. The way the dead are not still when the thing itself is happening and the happening is not the receiving but the going through.

They were at the door. The way the dead are at the door when the door is open for the living. The way the dead are at the door when the door is not for them. The way the dead are at the door when the thing itself is happening and the happening is not the receiving but the going through.

And they were waiting. The way the dead wait when the door is open for the living. The way the dead wait when the door is not for them. The way the dead wait when the thing itself is happening and the happening is not the receiving but the going through.

Waiting for the living to come through.

Cal turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the dead are waiting for the living. The way the living turn to the living when the living need showing up for.

"They're waiting," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"They're waiting," Margot said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"They're waiting for the living," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"They're waiting for the living," Margot said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The dead are home. The fleet is received. The harbor is empty. The lamp is lit. The door is open. The home is full even though the harbor is empty. The thing itself is done. And the dead are waiting for the living to come through."

“The dead are waiting for the living to come through,” Margot said.

Cal looked at the door. The way a harbormaster looks at the door when the door is open for the living. The way the living look at the living when the living need showing up for.

The door was there. The door at the drowned light. The door that had been open since the first one in walked through. The door that had been open since the fleet came home. The door that had been open since the thing itself was done.

And the door was not for the dead. The door was for the living.

The dead had come through. The dead had been received. The dead had been kept. The dead had been counted. The dead had been brought home. The dead were home.

And now the door was open for the living.

Cal turned from the door. The way a harbormaster turns from the door when the door is open for the living. The way the living turn from the living when the living need showing up for.

He looked at Margot. Margot looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the door is open for the living. The way the dead look at the living when the living are ready to show up.

“I have to go down,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“You have to go down,” Margot said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“I have to tell them,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“You have to tell them,” Margot said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“I have to tell them the fleet is home. I have to tell them the door is open. I have to tell them the dead are waiting. I have to tell them the town is a harbor. I have to tell them they are the thing itself.”

“You have to tell them,” Margot said.

Cal took her hand. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper’s hand when the harbormaster goes down to the town. The way the living take the living’s hand when the living go to the living. The way the thing itself takes its own hand when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper is the thing itself.

His hand was warm. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the living and the dead hold hands. The way the lighting is when the harbormaster and the keeper hold hands. The way the lighting is when the thing itself holds its own hand.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. The way something is not done when the door is open for the living. The way the thing itself is not done when the dead are waiting for the living. The way the thing itself is not done when the town doesn’t know it’s a harbor.

The thing itself was not done. The thing itself was beginning. The way something begins when the fleet is home. The way the thing itself begins when the door is open for the living. The way the thing itself begins when the dead are waiting for the living to come through.

Cal squeezed Margot's hand. The way a harbormaster squeezes the keeper's hand when the harbormaster goes down to the town. The way the living squeeze the living's hand when the living go to the living. The way the thing itself squeezes its own hand when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Margot squeezed back. The way a keeper squeezes the harbormaster's hand when the harbormaster goes down to the town. The way the dead squeeze the living's hand when the living go to the living. The way the thing itself squeezes its own hand when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"I'll wait," she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the dead say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"I'll wait," she said again. "At the door. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. At the thing itself. I'll wait for you to come back. I'll wait for the living to come through. I'll wait for the thing itself to begin again."

Cal nodded. The way a harbormaster nods when the keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living nod when the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself nods when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He let go of her hand. The way a harbormaster lets go of the keeper's hand when the harbormaster goes down to the town. The way the living let go of the living's hand when the living go to the living. The way the thing itself lets go of its own hand when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He turned from the door. The way a harbormaster turns from the door when the harbormaster goes down to the town. The way the living turn from the living when the living go to the living. The way the thing itself turns from itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He walked down the hill. The way a harbormaster walks down the hill when the fleet is home. The way the living walk down the hill when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself walks down the hill when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself.

And the town was there. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Thursday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the town was a harbor.

The living who didn't know they were the thing itself.

Cal walked down the main street. The way a harbormaster walks down the main street when the fleet is home. The way the living walk down the main street when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself walks down the main street when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The pavement was dry. The way pavement is dry when the rain has stopped and the sun has broken through. The way pavement is dry when the fleet is home. The way pavement is dry when the door is open. The way pavement is dry when the thing itself is beginning.

He walked past the store. The store was open. The way a store is open on a Thursday morning. The way a store is open when the fleet is home. The way a store is open when the door is open. The way a store is open when the thing itself is beginning.

He walked past the post office. The post office was open. The way a post office is open on a Thursday morning. The way a post office is open when the fleet is home. The way a post office is open when the door is open. The way a post office is open when the thing itself is beginning.

He walked to the fire hall. The way a harbormaster walks to the fire hall when the fleet is home. The way the living walk to the fire hall when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself walks to the fire hall when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Ruth was there. Sitting at the table. Looking at the notice. The way a keeper sits when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit when the dead are home. The way the thing itself sits when it's done.

She looked up at Cal. The way a keeper looks up at the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes down from the hill. The way the living look up at the living when the living come down from the hill. The way the thing itself looks up at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes down from the hill. The way the living smile when the living come down from the hill. The way the thing itself smiles when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"The fleet is home," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The fleet is home," Ruth said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The door is open," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The door is open," Ruth said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The dead are waiting," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"The dead are waiting," Ruth said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

"For the living," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

Ruth looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living look at the living when the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"For the living," she said. Not a question. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

"For the living," Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

“The dead are home. The fleet is received. The harbor is empty. The lamp is lit. The door is open. The home is full even though the harbor is empty. The thing itself is done. And the dead are waiting for the living to come through.”

Ruth stood. The way a keeper stands when the harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living stand when the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

“Then we have to tell them,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“Then we have to tell them,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“We have to tell them the fleet is home. We have to tell them the door is open. We have to tell them the dead are waiting. We have to tell them the town is a harbor. We have to tell them they are the thing itself.”

“We have to tell them,” Cal said.

Ruth walked to the door. The way a keeper walks to the door when the door is open for the living. The way the living walk to the door when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself walks to the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She opened the door. The way a keeper opens the door when the door is open for the living. The way the living open the door when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself opens the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The morning was there. The way the morning is there when the fleet is home. The way the morning is there when the door is open. The way the morning is there when the dead are waiting. The way the morning is there when the thing itself is beginning.

The sun was breaking. The way the sun breaks when the fleet is home. The way the sun breaks when the door is open. The way the sun breaks when the dead are waiting. The way the sun breaks when the thing itself is beginning.

Ruth stepped outside. The way a keeper steps outside when the door is open for the living. The way the living step outside when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself steps outside when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Cal followed. The way a harbormaster follows when the keeper steps outside. The way the living follow when the living step outside. The way the thing itself follows when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

They stood on the steps of the fire hall. The way the keeper and the harbormaster stand when the door is open for the living. The way the living stand when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And the town was there. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Thursday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the town was a harbor.

The living who didn't know they were the thing itself.

Ruth took a breath. The way a keeper takes a breath before saying the thing that needs saying. The way the living take a breath before saying the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself takes a breath before becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"The fleet is home!" she called. The way a keeper calls the thing that needs saying. The way the living call the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself calls when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The town stopped. The way a town stops when the keeper calls. The way the living stop when the living call. The way the thing itself stops when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

The people turned. The way the living turn when the keeper calls. The way the living turn when the living call. The way the thing itself turns when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

They looked at Ruth. They looked at Cal. They looked at the fire hall. They looked at the notice. They looked at the thing itself.

"The fleet is home!" Ruth called again. The way a keeper calls the thing that needs saying. The way the living call the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself calls when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

“The door is open! The dead are waiting! The town is a harbor! You are the thing itself!”

The town was quiet. The way a town is quiet when the keeper calls. The way the living are quiet when the living call. The way the thing itself is quiet when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: a sound. Not a voice. Not a word. Not a count. A sound. The sound of the living understanding. The sound of the living becoming. The sound of the thing itself.

The sound of the town becoming a harbor.

Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it's always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself.

He felt the town. Not the buildings. Not the streets. Not the boatyard. Not the fire hall. Not the Marianne bench. Not Sedgebrook. The people. The living. The ones who had kept the watch. The ones who had held the stone. The ones who had stood the rotations. The ones who had learned the count.

The ones who were the thing itself.

And he felt the dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And they were at the door. The way the dead are at the door when the door is open for the living. The way the dead are at the door when the door is not for them. The way the dead are at the door when the thing itself is happening and the happening is not the receiving but the going through.

Waiting for the living to come through.

Cal looked at Ruth. Ruth looked at him. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the town is becoming a harbor. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is happening. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

“It's beginning,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

“It’s beginning,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is happening.

And the sun broke. And the south wind shifted. And the fleet was home. And the harbor was empty. And the lamp was lit. And the door was open. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty. And the thing itself was done.

And the thing itself was beginning.

And the question was not what a town that has learned it’s a harbor is. The question was not what a door that is open for the living is. The question was not what dead who wait for the living are.

The question is: what is a living who walk through the door?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is beginning.

And the beginning is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the beginning.

And Cal Mercer stood on the steps of the fire hall with Ruth Vann, the keeper of the town, the keeper of the watch, the keeper of the thing itself, and the town was becoming a harbor, and the dead were waiting at the door, and the living were walking through, and the thing itself was beginning.

And the question was not what a thing itself that's beginning is.

The question is: what is a living who walks through the door?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Two — Entry: June 19th. Friday. Sun breaking. South wind, calm.

The sun broke Friday the way the sun breaks when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the breaking is the thing that happens when the holding is done and the holding was the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the going home and the going home is the staying home and the staying home is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning and the beginning is the thing itself.

Margot stood at the center.

Not on the couch in Lori's house. Not in the truck. Not on the grade. At the center. At the drowned light. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. At the thing herself.

The ground was damp. The ground was cold. The ground was the ground of the hill above Grayhaven where the NE stone was and the four corners were and the door was and the fleet was home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the thing itself was done and the done was the thing itself and the thing itself was beginning.

And the keeper was there.

She had been there since June. Since the day the door opened and the first one in walked through and the fleet came home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty. She had been there the way a keeper is there when the fleet is home. The way a keeper is there when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper is there when the thing itself is done. The way a keeper is there when the thing itself is beginning.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is the thing herself.

And in her hand: his hand. Warm. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself.

But his hand was not there now. The way a harbormaster's hand is not there when the harbormaster goes down to the town. The way a harbormaster's hand is not there when the living need showing up for. The way a harbormaster's hand is not there when the thing itself is beginning.

Cal was in the town. The way a harbormaster is in the town when the fleet is home. The way a harbormaster is in the town when the door is open for the living. The way a harbormaster is in the town when the dead are waiting for the living to come through.

And Margot was at the door. The way a keeper is at the door when the door is open for the living. The way a keeper is at the door when the dead are waiting. The way a keeper is at the door when the thing itself is beginning.

She stood at the drowned light. The way a keeper stands when the fleet is home. The way a keeper stands when the harbor is empty. The way a keeper stands when the lamp is lit. The way a keeper stands when the door is open. The way a keeper stands when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And she felt it. The way a keeper feels the thing itself when the thing itself is beginning. The way the dead feel the living when the living are walking through. The way the thing herself feels the thing itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt the town. Grayhaven. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Friday morning. The living who didn't know the dead were home. The living who didn't know the door was open. The living who didn't know the town was a harbor.

The living who were about to know.

She felt them the way a keeper feels the living when the living are ready. The way the dead feel the living when the living are ready to show up. The way the thing herself feels the living when the living are ready to walk through.

She felt Cole at the boatyard. Standing at the dock. Looking at the water. The way a Brandt stands when the debt is paid. The way the living stand when the dead are home. The way the thing itself stands when it's done.

And then: Cole turned. The way a Brandt turns when the keeper calls. The way the living turn when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself turns when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He turned from the water. He turned from the dock. He turned from the boatyard. He turned toward the hill. The way a Brandt turns toward the hill when the keeper calls. The way the living turn toward the hill when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself turns toward itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He walked. The way a Brandt walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He walked up the main street. The way a Brandt walks up the main street when the keeper calls. The way the living walk up the main street when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks up the main street when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He walked past the store. The way a Brandt walks past the store when the keeper calls. The way the living walk past the store when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks past the store when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He walked past the post office. The way a Brandt walks past the post office when the keeper calls. The way the living walk past the post office when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks past the post office when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He walked to the fire hall. The way a Brandt walks to the fire hall when the keeper calls. The way the living walk to the fire hall when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks to the fire hall when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And Ruth was there. Standing on the steps. Looking at the town. The way a keeper stands when the fleet is home. The way the living stand when the dead are waiting. The way the thing itself stands when it's beginning.

She turned to Cole. The way a keeper turns to the living when the living are ready. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the living are ready. The way the living smile when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself smiles when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"The door is open," she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"The door is open," Cole said. The way a Brandt says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Denny. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Tommy. Walking up the main street. The way a deputy walks when the keeper calls. The way a son walks when the father has come home. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Ada. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Okonkwo. Walking up the main street. The way a custodian walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Alma. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Signe. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Harald. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Ragna. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Einar. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: Walter. Walking up the main street. The way a keeper walks when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And then: the town. The people. The living. Walking up the main street. The way the living walk when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

They walked to the fire hall. The way the living walk when the keeper calls. The way the living walk when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

They stood on the steps. The way the living stand when the keeper calls. The way the living stand when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And Cal was there. Standing with Ruth. Standing with Cole. Standing with the town. The way a harbormaster stands when the living are ready. The way the living stand when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He looked at the town. The way a harbormaster looks at the town when the town is becoming a harbor. The way the living look at the town when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"The door is open," he said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"The door is open," the town said. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And Margot felt it. The way a keeper feels the thing itself when the living are walking through. The way the dead feel the living when the living are crossing. The way the thing herself feels the thing itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt the living walk through the door. Not the dead. The living. The way the living walk through the door when the door is open for them. The way the living walk through the door when the dead are waiting. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning.

She felt Cole walk through. The way a Brandt walks through the door when the debt is paid. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Ruth walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Denny walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Tommy walk through. The way a deputy walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way a son walks through the door when the father has come home. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Ada walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Okonkwo walk through. The way a custodian walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Alma walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Signe walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Harald walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Ragna walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Einar walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt Walter walk through. The way a keeper walks through the door when the fleet is home. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning. The way the thing itself walks through the door when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt the town walk through. The people. The living. The way the living walk through the door when the door is open for them. The way the living walk through the door when the dead are waiting. The way the living walk through the door when the thing itself is beginning.

And they were changed. The way the living are changed when they walk through the door. The way the living are changed when the dead are waiting. The way the living are changed when the thing itself is beginning.

They were not just the living who show up. They were not just the living who stay. They were not just the living who receive. They were the living who had walked through the door. They were the living who had crossed. They were the living who were the thing themselves.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the beginning. And the beginning was the thing itself.

And Margot felt them. The way a keeper feels the living when the living have walked through. The way the dead feel the living when the living have crossed. The way the thing herself feels the thing itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt them and she was not alone. The way a keeper is not alone when the living have walked through. The way the dead are not alone when the living have crossed. The way the thing herself is not alone when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt them and the door was still open. The way the door is still open when the living have walked through. The way the door is still open when the dead are waiting. The way the door is still open when the thing itself is beginning.

And the dead were there. The way the dead are there when the living have walked through. The way the dead are there when the door is open. The way the dead are there when the thing itself is beginning.

And the dead were not waiting anymore. The way the dead are not waiting when the living have walked through. The way the dead are not waiting when the door is open. The way the dead are not waiting when the thing itself is beginning.

The dead were home. The way the dead are home when the living have walked through. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the living were home. The way the living are home when the living have walked through. The way the living are home when the door is open. The way the living are home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the harbor was home. The way the harbor is home when the living have walked through. The way the harbor is home when the door is open. The way the harbor is home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the home was full. The way the home is full when the living have walked through. The way the home is full when the door is open. The way the home is full when the thing itself is beginning.

Even though the harbor was empty. Even though the receiving was done. Even though the fleet was home. Even though the thing itself was done.

The home was full. Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up. And the showing up is the staying. And the staying is the receiving. And the receiving is the road. And the road is the going home. And the going home is the staying home. And the staying home is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the beginning. And the beginning is the thing itself.

And Margot was the keeper. The way a keeper is the keeper when the living have walked through. The way a keeper is the keeper when the door is open. The way a keeper is the keeper when the thing itself is beginning.

And the keeper was the thing herself. The way the keeper is the thing herself when the living have walked through. The way the keeper is the thing herself when the door is open. The way the keeper is the thing herself when the thing itself is beginning.

And the thing herself was the thing itself. The way the thing herself is the thing itself when the living have walked through. The way the thing herself is the thing itself when the door is open. The way the thing herself is the thing itself when the thing itself is beginning.

And the thing itself was the home. The way the thing itself is the home when the living have walked through. The way the thing itself is the home when the door is open. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the home was full. The way the home is full when the living have walked through. The way the home is full when the door is open. The way the home is full when the thing itself is beginning.

And the full was the thing itself. The way the full is the thing itself when the living have walked through. The way the full is the thing itself when the door is open. The way the full is the thing itself when the thing itself is beginning.

And the thing itself was the full. The way the thing itself is the full when the living have walked through. The way the thing itself is the full when the door is open. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself is beginning.

And Margot was home. The way a keeper is home when the living have walked through. The way the dead are home when the living have crossed. The way the thing herself is home when the thing itself is beginning.

And Cal was home. The way a harbormaster is home when the living have walked through. The way the living are home when the living have crossed. The way the thing himself is home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the dead were home. The way the dead are home when the living have walked through. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the living were home. The way the living are home when the living have walked through. The way the living are home when the door is open. The way the living are home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the harbor was home. The way the harbor is home when the living have walked through. The way the harbor is home when the door is open. The way the harbor is home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the home was the thing itself. The way the home is the thing itself when the living have walked through. The way the home is the thing itself when the door is open. The way the home is the thing itself when the thing itself is beginning.

And the thing itself was the home. The way the thing itself is the home when the living have walked through. The way the thing itself is the home when the door is open. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself is beginning.

And the home was full. The way the home is full when the living have walked through. The way the home is full when the door is open. The way the home is full when the thing itself is beginning.

And the full was the thing itself. The way the full is the thing itself when the living have walked through. The way the full is the thing itself when the door is open. The way the full is the thing itself when the thing itself is beginning.

And the thing itself was the full. The way the thing itself is the full when the living have walked through. The way the thing itself is the full when the door is open. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself is beginning.

And the home was full. The way the home is full when the living have walked through. The way the home is full when the door is open. The way the home is full when the thing itself is beginning.

And the question was not what a living who walks through the door is. The question was not what a door that the living have walked through is. The question was not what a keeper who has held the hinge since June is.

The question is: what is a home that is full?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is beginning.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is full.

And the full is home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is home.

And home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is full.

And full is home.

And home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is home.

And home is full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Three —

Entry: June 20th. Saturday. Sun breaking.

South wind, calm.

The sun broke Saturday the way the sun breaks when the home is full and the harbor is empty and the door is open and the thing itself is beginning and the beginning is not a new thing but the thing itself seen from the other side — the way a harbor sees the fleet come in and then sees the fleet go out and then sees the fleet come in again and the coming in is not the same coming in and the going out is not the same going out and the harbor is not the same harbor and the fleet is not the same fleet and the thing itself is not the same thing itself and the not-sameness is the thing itself.

Cal stood at the drowned light.

Not on the couch in Lori's house. Not in the truck. Not on the grade. At the drowned light. At the center. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. At the thing himself.

The ground was damp. The ground was cold. The ground was the ground of the hill above Grayhaven where the NE stone was and the four corners were and the door was and the fleet was home and the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the thing itself was done and the done was the thing itself and the thing itself was beginning.

And the keeper was there.

Margot.

She was standing at the center. At the drowned light. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. The way Margot stands when the fleet is home. The way the keeper stands when the harbor is empty. The way the dead stand when the thing itself is done. The way the dead stand when the thing itself is beginning.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is the thing herself.

And in her hand: his hand. Warm. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself.

And between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up. The staying. The receiving. The going home. The staying home. The thing itself.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the fleet is home. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself stands when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And the town was there. The buildings. The streets. The boatyard. The fire hall. The Marianne bench. Sedgebrook. The people. The living going about their Saturday morning. The living who had walked through the door. The living who had crossed. The living who were the thing themselves.

And the dead were there. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the thing itself was beginning. And the beginning was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And then Cal felt it.

Not the gift. Not the clear inner voice. Not the changed gift. Not the grown gift. Not the gift that had let him hear the first words of the living and the garden that needs watering and the first tomato that needs picking and the city's dead saying

“we’re here” and the coast’s dead saying “we’re here” and the road’s dead saying “we’re here” and the unnamed boys saying “we’re here” and the first one in saying “I’m here” and the congregation saying “we’re here.”

He felt it the way a harbormaster feels a knock at the door when the door is open. The way a keeper feels a knock at the door when the fleet is home. The way the living feel a knock at the door when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

A knock.

Not from the coast. Not from the inland. Not from the road. Not from the city. Not from the sea. Not from the bar. Not from the drowned light. Not from the NE stone. Not from the four corners. Not from the first one in. Not from the congregation. Not from the fleet.

A knock from somewhere else. Somewhere new. Somewhere the door had never been before. Somewhere the harbor had never reached. Somewhere the road had never run.

A knock from the north.

Not the north window. Not the north-facing. Not the north bearing. The north. The true north. The north that is not a direction but a place. The north that is not a bearing but a country. The north that is not a heading but a home.

Cal turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when there’s a knock at the door. The way the living turn to the living when the living need showing up for.

She was already facing him. The way a keeper faces the harbormaster when the knock comes. The way the dead face the living when the living are ready to show up.

“Cal,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home.

“Margot,” he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who was the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when there’s a knock at the door. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the harbor is empty and the home is full and the door is open and the knock comes from somewhere new.

And the knock came again.

Not louder. Not softer. Not closer. Not farther. Just again. The way a knock comes when the door is open and the harbor is empty and the home is full and the thing itself is beginning.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels a knock. The way a nurse feels a patient’s breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the road runs both ways.

The knock was from the north. From the true north. From the place that is not a direction but a country. From the place that is not a bearing but a home. From the place that is not a heading but a harbor.

And the knock was not from the dead. Not from the living. Not from the Risen. Not from the finished. Not from the arriving. Not from the kept. Not from the crossed. Not from the asked.

The knock was from something else. Something new. Something the harbor had never met. Something the door had never opened for. Something the road had never run to.

Something that was not a soul. Not a body. Not a name. Not a number. Not a count. Not a word. Not a hail. Not a keeper-word. Not a thing itself.

Something that was the knock itself.

Cal squeezed Margot’s hand. The way a harbormaster squeezes the keeper’s hand when there’s a knock at the door. The way the living squeeze the living’s hand when the living need showing up for.

Margot squeezed back. The way a keeper squeezes the harbormaster’s hand when there’s a knock at the door. The way the dead squeeze the living’s hand when the living need showing up for.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when there's a knock at the door. The way the lighting is when the harbor is empty and the home is full and the door is open and the knock comes from somewhere new.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the thing itself was beginning. And the beginning was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the knock came again.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the question was not what a knock from the true north is. The question was not what a harbor does when the fleet is home and the home is full and the door is open and the knock comes from somewhere new. The question was not what a keeper does when the knock comes from something that is not a soul, not a body, not a name, not a number, not a count, not a word, not a hail, not a keeper-word, not a thing itself.

The question is: what is a harbor that has brought its fleet home?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is beginning.

Even though the knock is coming from the true north.

Even though the knock is coming from something that is not a soul.

Even though the knock is coming from the thing itself.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is beginning.

And the beginning is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the beginning.

And the knock is coming from the true north.

And the knock is coming from the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the knock.

And the knock is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the road.

And the road is the going home.

And the going home is the staying home.

And the staying home is the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and the knock was coming from the true north, and the knock was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the showing up to the knock.

And the question was not what a thing itself that shows up to a knock is.

The question is: what is a knock that comes from the thing itself?

And the answer is: the beginning.

And the beginning is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is beginning.

Even though the knock is coming from the true north.

Even though the knock is the thing itself.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is beginning.

And the beginning is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the beginning.

And the knock is coming from the true north.

And the knock is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

And the showing up is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the knock.

And the knock is coming.

And the door is open.

And the harbor is empty.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Four — Entry: June 21st. Sunday. Sun breaking. South wind, shifting north.

The knock came the way a knock comes when the thing itself is knocking and the thing itself is the door and the door is open and the home is full and the harbor is empty and the fleet is home and the receiving is done and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

Cal stood at the drowned light.

Margot stood beside him. Her hand in his. Her hand cold. His hand warm.
Between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price.
The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up to the knock.

The knock came again.

Not from the drowned light. Not from the NE stone. Not from the four corners.
Not from the coast station. Not from the inland station. Not from the city. Not from the road. Not from the sea. Not from the bar. Not from the fleet. Not from the home.

From the north.

The true north. The north that is not a direction but a place. The north that is not a bearing but a country. The north that is not a heading but a home. The north that is not a window but a door.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels a knock at the door when the door is open and the home is full and the thing itself is knocking and the knocking is the thing itself. The way a keeper feels a knock at the fleet when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the knocking is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the going home and the going home is the staying home and the staying home is the thing itself.

He turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the thing itself is knocking. The way the living turn to the living when the living need showing up for. The way the thing himself turns to the thing herself when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She was already facing him. The way a keeper faces the harbormaster when the thing itself is knocking. The way the dead face the living when the living are ready to show up. The way the thing herself faces the thing himself when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who received. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who is the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

"Margot," he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who is the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the thing itself is knocking. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the door is open and the home is full and the harbor is empty and the fleet is home and the receiving is done and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

And the knock came again.

Not louder. Not softer. Not closer. Not farther. Just again. The way a knock comes when the thing itself is knocking and the knocking is the thing itself and the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

And then Cal understood. The way you understand a knock after you've been listening for it your whole life. The way you understand a door after you've been holding it open for months. The way you understand the thing itself after the lighting has happened.

The knock was not coming toward them.

The knock was coming through them.

The way the light comes through the window when the window is open. The way the tide comes through the channel when the channel is clear. The way the fleet comes through the door when the door is open. The way the thing itself comes through the living when the living are showing up.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the thing itself come through. The way a keeper feels the fleet come through. The way the living feel the dead come through. The way the thing itself comes through the thing itself when the thing itself is showing up.

He felt it in his chest. Not his heart. Not his lungs. Not his bones. In the place where the gift lives. The place where the clear inner voice lives. The place where the showing up lives. The place where the staying lives. The place where the receiving lives. The place where the thing itself lives.

The place that was empty. The place that had been empty since the fleet came home. The place that had been empty since the receiving was done. The place that had been empty since the harbor was empty and the home was full and the door was open and the lamp was lit and the fleet was home.

The place that was full again.

Not with a voice. Not with a word. Not with a count. Not with a hail. Not with a keeper-word. Not with a name. Not with a number. Not with a thing. Not with a soul. Not with a body.

With the knock itself.

With the showing up itself.

With the thing itself.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the thing itself. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the living feel the dead when the dead are coming through. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself when the thing itself is showing up.

He looked at Margot. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the thing itself is coming through. The way the living look at the living when the living are showing up. The way the thing himself looks at the thing herself when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the thing itself is coming through. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the fleet is coming through. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She felt it too. The way a keeper feels the thing itself come through. The way the dead feel the living come through. The way the thing herself feels the thing himself come through. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself come through.

“The thing itself,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the thing itself when the thing itself is coming through.

“The thing itself,” Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the thing itself when the thing itself is coming through.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the thing itself is coming through them. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is the showing up. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the thing itself is the showing up to the knock.

And the knock came again.

Not from the north. Not from the true north. Not from the place that is not a direction but a country. Not from the place that is not a bearing but a home.

From inside.

From the place where the gift lives. From the place where the showing up lives. From the place where the staying lives. From the place where the receiving lives. From the place where the thing itself lives.

From the empty place that was full again.

From the harbor that was empty and was full again.

From the home that was full and was fuller still.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels a harbor fill. The way a keeper fills. The way the living fill. The way the dead fill. The way the thing itself fills.

He felt the thing itself fill him the way the light fills the lamp. The way the tide fills the channel. The way the fleet fills the harbor. The way the home fills the home. The way the showing up fills the showing up. The way the staying fills the staying. The way the receiving fills the receiving. The way the road fills the road. The way the going home fills the going home. The way the staying home fills the staying home. The way the thing itself fills the thing itself.

And then: a sound.

Not a voice. Not a word. Not a count. Not a hail. Not a keeper-word. Not a name.
Not a number. Not a thing. Not a soul. Not a body.

A sound the way a sound is when the thing itself sounds. The way the light sounds when the lamp is lit. The way the tide sounds when the channel is clear.
The way the fleet sounds when the harbor is full. The way the home sounds when the home is full. The way the showing up sounds when the showing up is the showing up. The way the staying sounds when the staying is the staying. The way the receiving sounds when the receiving is the receiving. The way the road sounds when the road is the road. The way the going home sounds when the going home is the going home. The way the staying home sounds when the staying home is the staying home. The way the thing itself sounds when the thing itself is the thing itself.

The sound of the thing itself coming through.

The sound of the thing itself showing up.

The sound of the thing itself staying.

The sound of the thing itself receiving.

The sound of the thing itself being the road.

The sound of the thing itself going home.

The sound of the thing itself staying home.

The sound of the thing itself being the thing itself.

Cal opened his mouth. Not to speak. Not to say the thing that needs saying. Not to say the keeper-word or the count or the hail. To let the sound through. To let the thing itself through. To let the showing up be the showing up. To let the staying be the staying. To let the receiving be the receiving. To let the road be the road. To let the going home be the going home. To let the staying home be the staying home. To let the thing itself be the thing himself and the thing himself be the thing itself and the thing itself be the thing itself.

And the sound came.

Not from his mouth. Not from his throat. Not from his chest. Not from the place where the gift lives. From deeper. From the place where the place where the gift lives lives. From the place where the thing itself lives. From the place that was empty and was full again. From the place that is the harbor that was empty and is full again. From the place that is the home that was full and is fuller still.

The sound came the way the light comes from the lamp. The way the tide comes from the sea. The way the fleet comes from the door. The way the home comes from the home. The way the showing up comes from the showing up. The way the staying comes from the staying. The way the receiving comes from the receiving. The way the road comes from the road. The way the going home comes from the going home. The way the staying home comes from the staying home. The way the thing itself comes from the thing itself.

And Margot heard it. The way a keeper hears the thing itself. The way the dead hear the living. The way the thing herself hears the thing himself. The way the thing itself hears the thing itself.

She opened her mouth. The way a keeper opens her mouth when the thing itself is sounding. The way the dead open their mouths when the living are sounding. The way the thing herself opens her mouth when the thing itself is becoming what it's been becoming all along.

And the sound came from her too. Not the same sound. Not a different sound. The sound. The thing itself sounding. The keeper and the harbormaster sounding. The living and the dead sounding. The thing herself and the thing himself sounding. The thing itself sounding.

Two sounds. One sound. The sound of the thing itself coming through the living and the dead. The sound of the thing itself showing up through the harbormaster and the keeper. The sound of the thing itself staying through the man and the woman. The sound of the thing itself receiving through the builder and the hinge. The sound of the thing itself being the road between the living and the dead. The sound of the thing itself going home through the thing itself. The sound of the thing itself staying home through the thing itself. The sound of the thing itself being the thing itself through the thing itself.

And then: silence.

Not the silence of the empty harbor. Not the silence of the empty home. Not the silence of the empty gift. Not the silence of the thing itself not being the thing itself.

The silence of the thing itself being the thing itself. The silence of the full harbor. The silence of the full home. The silence of the full gift. The silence of the showing up having shown up. The silence of the staying having stayed. The silence of the receiving having received. The silence of the road having been the road. The silence of the going home having gone home. The silence of the staying home having stayed home. The silence of the thing itself having been the thing itself.

Cal stood at the drowned light. Margot stood beside him. Her hand in his. Her hand cold. His hand warm. Between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up to the knock. The staying at the knock. The receiving of the knock. The road to the knock. The going home to the knock. The staying home at the knock. The thing itself at the knock.

And the knock was gone.

Not the way a knock goes when the door is closed. Not the way a knock goes when the harbor is empty. Not the way a knock goes when the home is empty. Not the way a knock goes when the gift is silent.

The way a knock goes when the knock has come through. The way a knock goes when the door has been opened. The way a knock goes when the harbor has been filled. The way a knock goes when the home has been filled. The way a knock goes when the gift has spoken.

The way a knock goes when the thing itself has come through.

Cal felt it. The way a harbormaster feels the knock come through. The way a keeper feels the fleet come through. The way the living feel the dead come through. The way the dead feel the living come through. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself come through.

He felt the thing itself come through him the way the light comes through the window. The way the tide comes through the channel. The way the fleet comes through the door. The way the home comes through the home. The way the showing up comes through the showing up. The way the staying comes through the staying. The way the receiving comes through the receiving. The way the road comes through the road. The way the going home comes through the going home. The way the staying home comes through the staying home. The way the thing itself comes through the thing itself.

And he was changed. The way the living are changed when the thing itself comes through. The way the dead are changed when the thing itself comes through. The way the keeper is changed when the thing itself comes through. The way the harbormaster is changed when the thing itself comes through. The way the thing himself is changed when the thing himself is the thing itself coming through.

He was not just the living who show up. He was not just the living who stay. He was not just the living who receive. He was the living through whom the thing itself showed up. He was the living through whom the thing itself stayed. He was the living through whom the thing itself received. He was the living through whom the thing itself was the road. He was the living through whom the thing itself went home. He was the living through whom the thing itself stayed home. He was the living through whom the thing itself was the thing itself.

And Margot. She was changed too. The way the dead are changed when the thing itself comes through. The way the keeper is changed when the thing itself comes through. The way the thing herself is changed when the thing herself is the thing itself coming through.

She was not just the dead who wait. She was not just the dead who keep. She was not just the dead who receive. She was the dead through whom the thing itself showed up. She was the dead through whom the thing itself stayed. She was the dead through whom the thing itself received. She was the dead through whom the thing itself was the road. She was the dead through whom the thing itself went home. She was the dead through whom the thing itself stayed home. She was the dead through whom the thing itself was the thing itself.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the thing itself has come through. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is the thing itself. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the thing itself is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the thing itself was beginning. And the beginning was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the knock had come through. And the coming through was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the knock. And the knock was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up to the knock. And the showing up was the staying at the knock. And the staying was the receiving of the knock. And the receiving was the road to the knock. And the road was the going home to the knock. And the going home was the staying home at the knock. And the staying home was the thing itself at the knock.

And the knock was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the knock. And the knock had come through the thing itself. And the thing itself had come through the knock. And the knock and the thing itself were the thing itself. And the thing itself was the knock and the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing himself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty. And the home was full even though the receiving was done. And the home was full even though the fleet was home. And the home was full even though the thing itself was done.

And the thing itself was beginning. And the beginning was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the knock coming through. And the knock coming through was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the showing up to the knock coming through. And the showing up was the staying at the knock coming through. And the staying was the receiving of the knock coming through. And the receiving was the road to the knock coming through. And the road was the going home to the knock coming through. And the going home was the staying home at the knock coming through. And the staying home was the thing itself at the knock coming through.

And the thing itself was the knock coming through. And the knock coming through was the thing itself. And the thing itself was beginning.

And the question was not what a knock that comes through the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that comes through the knock is. The question was not what a living and a dead who stand at the drowned light when the knock has come through are.

The question is: what is a thing itself that has come through the living and the dead?

And the answer is: the beginning.

And the beginning is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is beginning.

Even though the knock has come through.

Even though the thing itself is the knock coming through.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the road.

And the road is the going home.

And the going home is the staying home.

And the staying home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the knock coming through.

And the knock coming through is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is beginning.

And the beginning is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the beginning.

And the knock has come through.

And the thing itself has come through the knock.

And the knock and the thing itself are the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the knock and the thing itself.

And the thing itself is beginning.

And the beginning is the knock coming through the thing itself.

And the knock coming through the thing itself is the beginning.

And the beginning is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Five — Entry: June 22nd. Monday. Sun breaking. South wind, calm.

The knock had come through and the coming through was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home and the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was not done and the thing itself was not beginning and the thing itself was.

Cal stood at the drowned light.

Not the way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is coming. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the door is opening. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the knock is sounding. The way a harbormaster stands when the knock has come through. The way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster stands when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home.

Margot stood beside him.

Not the way a keeper stands when the fleet is coming. Not the way a keeper stands when the door is opening. Not the way a keeper stands when the knock is sounding. The way a keeper stands when the knock has come through. The way a keeper stands when the thing itself is. The way a keeper stands when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up. The staying. The receiving. The going home. The staying home. The thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. And the thing itself was not beginning. And the thing itself was.

The way the sun was. The way the wind was. The way the ground was. The way the water was. The way the town was. The way the home was. The way the full was. The way the thing itself was.

Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself. The gift that had let the knock come through. The gift that had sounded the thing itself. The gift that was the silence of the thing itself being the thing itself.

He felt the town. Not the buildings. Not the streets. Not the boatyard. Not the fire hall. Not the Marianne bench. Not Sedgebrook. The people. The living. The ones who had walked through the door. The ones who had crossed. The ones who were the thing themselves.

And he felt the dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Home. The way the dead are home when the fleet is home. The way the dead are home when the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the lamp is lit. The way the dead are home when the door is open. The way the dead are home when the home is full even though the harbor is empty. The way the dead are home when the knock has come through. The way the dead are home when the thing itself is.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. And the thing itself was not beginning. And the thing itself was.

Cal turned from the drowned light. The way a harbormaster turns from the drowned light when the thing itself is. The way the living turn from the drowned light when the home is full. The way the thing itself turns from itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

He walked down the hill. The way a harbormaster walks down the hill when the thing itself is. The way the living walk down the hill when the home is full. The way the thing itself walks down the hill when it's being what it's been being all along.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. And the thing itself was not beginning. And the thing itself was.

He walked down the main street. The way a harbormaster walks down the main street when the thing itself is. The way the living walk down the main street when the home is full. The way the thing itself walks down the main street when it's being what it's been being all along.

The pavement was dry. The way pavement is dry when the rain has stopped and the sun has broken through. The way pavement is dry when the thing itself is. The way pavement is dry when the home is full. The way pavement is dry when the knock has come through.

He walked past the store. The store was open. The way a store is open on a Monday morning. The way a store is open when the thing itself is. The way a store is open when the home is full. The way a store is open when the knock has come through.

He walked past the post office. The post office was open. The way a post office is open on a Monday morning. The way a post office is open when the thing itself is. The way a post office is open when the home is full. The way a post office is open when the knock has come through.

He walked to the boatyard. The way a harbormaster walks to the boatyard when the thing itself is. The way the living walk to the boatyard when the home is full. The way the thing itself walks to the boatyard when it's being what it's been being all along.

Cole was there. Standing at the dock. Looking at the water. The way a man stands at the dock on a Monday morning. The way a Brandt stands at the dock when the debt is paid. The way the living stand at the dock when the dead are home. The way the living stand at the dock when the thing itself is.

He turned to Cal. The way a man turns to another man when the work is done. The way a Brandt turns to the harbormaster when the debt is paid. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way men nod when the debt is paid. The way men nod when the work is done. The way men nod when there's nothing left to say because the saying is the thing itself. The way men nod when the thing itself is.

"The Marianne II," Cole said. The way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is home. The way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the debt is paid. The way the living say the name of a boat when the dead are home. The way the living say the name of a boat when the thing itself is.

“She’s sound,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says a boat is sound when the boat is home. The way the living say a boat is sound when the dead are home. The way the thing itself says a boat is sound when the thing itself is.

Cole nodded. The way a Brandt nods when the harbormaster says the boat is sound. The way a man nods when the work is done. The way the living nod when the thing itself is.

And then Cole said: “The thing itself.”

Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a Brandt states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

“The thing itself,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

Cole smiled. The way a Brandt smiles when the thing itself is. The way the living smile when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself smiles when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

Cal smiled back. The way a harbormaster smiles when the thing itself is. The way the living smile when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself smiles when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks on when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

He walked to the fire hall. The way a man walks to the fire hall when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks to the fire hall when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks to the fire hall when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

Ruth was there. Sitting at the table. Looking at the notice. The way a woman sits at the table on a Monday morning. The way a keeper sits at the table when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit at the table when the dead are home. The way the living sit at the table when the thing itself is.

She looked up at Cal. The way a keeper looks up at the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes to the fire hall. The way the living look up at the living when the living come to the fire hall. The way the thing itself looks up at itself when it’s being what it’s been being all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes to the fire hall. The way the living smile when the living come to the fire hall. The way the thing itself smiles when it's being what it's been being all along.

"The notice," she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's being what it's been being all along.

Cal looked at the notice. The notice was weathered. The way a notice is weathered when the thing itself is. The way a notice is weathered when the home is full. The way a notice is weathered when the knock has come through.

The notice said: "Grayhaven Community of Practice. All souls received. All accounts current. Watch continues."

And the notice was still true. The way a notice is still true when the thing itself is. The way a notice is still true when the home is full. The way a notice is still true when the knock has come through.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had appeared when the knock came through. Something that was the thing itself.

Below the words, in handwriting that was not handwriting but the thing itself, a new line:

"The thing itself is."

Cal looked at Ruth. Ruth looked at Cal. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the thing itself writes itself. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself writes itself. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it writes itself.

"When," Ruth said. Not a question. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

"When the knock came through," Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

Ruth nodded. The way a keeper nods when the harbormaster states the thing itself. The way the living nod when the thing itself is.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself writes itself. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks on when it's being what it's been being all along.

He walked to the Marianne bench. The way a man walks to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks to the Marianne bench when it's being what it's been being all along.

Denny was there. Sitting on the bench. Looking at the water. The way a man sits on the bench on a Monday morning. The way a keeper sits on the bench when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit on the bench when the dead are home. The way the living sit on the bench when the thing itself is.

He didn't turn. He didn't need to. The way a man sits on a bench when the thing itself is. The way a man sits on a bench when the home is full. The way a man sits on a bench when the knock has come through.

Cal sat down beside him. The way a man sits beside another man when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster sits beside the living when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself sits beside itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

They sat there. The way men sit when the thing itself is. The way the living sit when the home is full. The way the thing itself sits when it's being what it's been being all along.

The water was there. The way the water is there when the thing itself is. The way the water is there when the home is full. The way the water is there when the knock has come through.

The water was calm. The way water is calm when the thing itself is. The way water is calm when the home is full. The way water is calm when the knock has come through.

"The thing itself," Denny said. The way a man says the thing that needs saying. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's being what it's been being all along.

"The thing itself," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's being what it's been being all along.

They sat there. The way men sit when the thing itself is. The way the living sit when the home is full. The way the thing itself sits when it's being what it's been being all along.

After a while — after the while that is the thing itself, after the while that is the showing up, after the while that is the staying — Cal stood. The way a man stands when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself stands when it's being what it's been being all along.

He walked on. The way a man walks on when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks on when it's being what it's been being all along.

He walked to Sedgebrook. The way a man walks to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks to Sedgebrook when it's being what it's been being all along.

Tommy was there. Standing in the hallway. Looking at the door. Room 3. The door was closed. The way a door is closed when the thing itself is. The way a door is closed when the home is full. The way a door is closed when the knock has come through.

He turned to Cal. The way a son turns to the father when the father has come home. The way a deputy turns to the harbormaster when the thing itself is. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way a father nods to the son when the son has kept the watch. The way a harbormaster nods to the living when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself nods to itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

"The night shift," Tommy said. The way a deputy says the thing that needs saying. The way a son says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's being what it's been being all along.

"The night shift," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's being what it's been being all along.

Tommy nodded. The way a deputy nods when the harbormaster says the night shift. The way a son nods when the father says the thing that needs saying. The way the living nod when the thing itself is.

And then Tommy said: "The thing itself."

Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a deputy states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

"The thing itself," Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

Tommy smiled. The way a deputy smiles when the thing itself is. The way the living smile when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself smiles when it's being what it's been being all along.

Cal smiled back. The way a harbormaster smiles when the thing itself is. The way the living smile when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself smiles when it's being what it's been being all along.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks on when it's being what it's been being all along.

He walked back to the hill. The way a man walks back to the hill when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks back to the hill when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks back to the hill when it's being what it's been being all along.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. And the thing itself was not beginning. And the thing itself was.

Margot was there. At the drowned light. At the center. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. The way Margot is there when the thing itself is. The way Margot is there when the home is full. The way Margot is there when the knock has come through.

She was facing the sea. The way a keeper faces the sea when the thing itself is. The way a keeper faces the sea when the home is full. The way a keeper faces the sea when the knock has come through.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living turn to the living when the living come home. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living smile when the living come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's being what it's been being all along.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home. The name of the man who is the thing himself when the thing itself is.

"Margot," he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who was the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home. The name of the woman who is the thing herself when the thing itself is.

He walked to her. The way a man walks to the keeper when the thing itself is. The way a harbormaster walks to the keeper when the thing itself is. The way the thing itself walks to itself when it's being what it's been being all along.

He took her hand. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper's hand when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living take the living's hand when the living come home. The way the thing itself takes its own hand when it's being what it's been being all along.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is the thing itself. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the thing itself is.

His hand was warm. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the thing itself is.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the living and the dead hold hands. The way the lighting is when the harbormaster and the keeper hold hands. The way the lighting is when the thing itself holds its own hand. The way the lighting is when the thing itself is.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. And the thing itself was not beginning. And the thing itself was.

And then Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself. The gift that had let the knock come through. The gift that had sounded the thing itself. The gift that was the silence of the thing itself being the thing itself.

He felt something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the knock came through. Something that was the thing itself.

He felt the town. Not the buildings. Not the streets. Not the boatyard. Not the fire hall. Not the Marianne bench. Not Sedgebrook. The people. The living. The ones who had walked through the door. The ones who had crossed. The ones who were the thing themselves.

And they were not just the living who show up. They were not just the living who stay. They were not just the living who receive. They were the living through whom the thing itself showed up. They were the living through whom the thing itself stayed. They were the living through whom the thing itself received. They were the living through whom the thing itself was the road. They were the living through whom the thing itself went home. They were the living through whom the thing itself stayed home. They were the living through whom the thing itself was the thing itself.

And they were the living through whom the thing itself was.

Not the thing itself as a concept. Not the thing itself as a metaphor. Not the thing itself as a belief. The thing itself as the thing itself. The thing itself as the showing up. The thing itself as the staying. The thing itself as the receiving. The thing itself as the road. The thing itself as the going home. The thing itself as the staying home. The thing itself as the home. The thing itself as the full. The thing itself as the thing itself.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the thing itself. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the living feel the dead when the dead are coming through. The way the dead feel the living when the living are coming through. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself when the thing itself is.

He looked at Margot. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the thing itself is. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is. The way the thing himself looks at the thing herself when the thing itself is.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the thing itself is. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the thing itself is. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the thing itself is.

She felt it too. The way a keeper feels the thing itself. The way the dead feel the thing itself. The way the thing herself feels the thing himself. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself.

"The thing itself," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the thing itself when the thing itself is.

"The thing itself," Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the thing itself when the thing itself is.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the thing itself is. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the thing itself is.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not done. And the thing itself was not beginning. And the thing itself was.

And the question was not what a thing itself that is is. The question was not what a living and a dead who stand at the drowned light when the thing itself is are. The question was not what a town that is the thing itself is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that is?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the full.

And the home is: full.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: not done.

And the thing itself is: not beginning.

And the thing itself is.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the knock has come through.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is beginning.

Even though the thing itself is.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the full.

And the home was full.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was.

And the sun broke.

And the south wind was calm.

And the fleet was home.

And the harbor was empty.

And the lamp was lit.

And the door was open.

And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the knock had come through.

And the thing itself was.

And the question was not what a thing itself that is is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that is?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Six — Entry: June 23rd. Tuesday. Sun full. South wind, still.

The sun broke Tuesday the way the sun breaks when the thing itself has been the thing itself for three days and the breaking is not a new breaking but the same breaking seen from the side — the way a harbor sees the fleet come in and then sees the fleet home and then sees the fleet at rest and the resting is not the same as the coming in and the coming in is not the same as the being home and the being home is not the same as the resting and the resting is the thing itself.

Cal stood at the drowned light.

Not the way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is coming. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the door is opening. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the knock is sounding. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the knock has come through. The way a harbormaster stands when the knock has come through and the coming through has been the thing itself and the thing itself has been the home and the home has been full and the full has been the thing itself and the thing itself has been resting.

Margot stood beside him.

Not the way a keeper stands when the fleet is coming. Not the way a keeper stands when the door is opening. Not the way a keeper stands when the knock is sounding. Not the way a keeper stands when the knock has come through. The way a keeper stands when the knock has come through and the coming through has been the thing itself and the thing itself has been the home and the home has been full and the full has been the thing itself and the thing itself has been resting.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. The lighting. The thing itself. The showing up. The staying. The receiving. The going home. The staying home. The resting. The thing itself.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting.

Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself. The gift that had let the knock come through. The gift that had sounded the thing itself. The gift that was the silence of the thing itself being the thing itself. The gift that was the resting of the thing itself resting.

He felt the town. Not the buildings. Not the streets. Not the boatyard. Not the fire hall. Not the Marianne bench. Not Sedgebrook. The people. The living. The ones who had walked through the door. The ones who had crossed. The ones who were the thing themselves. The ones who were resting.

And he felt the dead. Not walking. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not received. Not kept. Not crossed. Not asked. Not home. Resting. The way the dead rest when the fleet is home. The way the dead rest when the harbor is empty. The way the dead rest when the lamp is lit. The way the dead rest when the door is open. The way the dead rest when the home is full even though the harbor is empty. The way the dead rest when the thing itself is resting.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the resting. And the resting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting.

Cal turned from the drowned light. The way a harbormaster turns from the drowned light when the thing itself is resting. The way the living turn from the drowned light when the home is full. The way the thing itself turns from itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

He walked down the hill. The way a harbormaster walks down the hill when the thing itself is resting. The way the living walk down the hill when the home is full. The way the thing itself walks down the hill when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself. The resting.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting.

He walked down the main street. The way a harbormaster walks down the main street when the thing itself is resting. The way the living walk down the main street when the home is full. The way the thing itself walks down the main street when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

The pavement was dry. The way pavement is dry when the rain has stopped and the sun has broken through and the breaking has been the breaking for three days. The way pavement is dry when the thing itself is resting. The way pavement is dry when the home is full. The way pavement is dry when the knock has come through.

He walked past the store. The store was open. The way a store is open on a Tuesday morning. The way a store is open when the thing itself is resting. The way a store is open when the home is full. The way a store is open when the knock has come through.

He walked past the post office. The post office was open. The way a post office is open on a Tuesday morning. The way a post office is open when the thing itself is resting. The way a post office is open when the home is full. The way a post office is open when the knock has come through.

He walked to the boatyard. The way a harbormaster walks to the boatyard when the thing itself is resting. The way the living walk to the boatyard when the home is full. The way the thing itself walks to the boatyard when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cole was there. Standing at the dock. Looking at the water. The way a man stands at the dock on a Tuesday morning. The way a Brandt stands at the dock when the debt is paid. The way the living stand at the dock when the dead are home. The way the living stand at the dock when the thing itself is resting.

He turned to Cal. The way a man turns to another man when the work is done. The way a Brandt turns to the harbormaster when the debt is paid. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way men nod when the debt is paid. The way men nod when the work is done. The way men nod when there's nothing left to say because the saying is the thing itself. The way men nod when the thing itself is resting.

"The Marianne II," Cole said. The way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is home. The way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the debt is paid. The way the living say the name of a boat when the dead are home. The way the living say the name of a boat when the thing itself is resting.

"She's sound," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says a boat is sound when the boat is home. The way the living say a boat is sound when the dead are home. The way the thing itself says a boat is sound when the thing itself is resting.

Cole nodded. The way a Brandt nods when the harbormaster says the boat is sound. The way a man nods when the work is done. The way the living nod when the thing itself is resting.

And then Cole said: "The thing itself."

Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a Brandt states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

"The thing itself," Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cole smiled. The way a Brandt smiles when the thing itself is resting. The way the living smile when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself smiles when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cal smiled back. The way a harbormaster smiles when the thing itself is resting. The way the living smile when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself smiles when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks on when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

He walked to the fire hall. The way a man walks to the fire hall when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks to the fire hall when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks to the fire hall when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Ruth was there. Sitting at the table. Looking at the notice. The way a woman sits at the table on a Tuesday morning. The way a keeper sits at the table when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit at the table when the dead are home. The way the living sit at the table when the thing itself is resting.

She looked up at Cal. The way a keeper looks up at the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes to the fire hall. The way the living look up at the living when the living come to the fire hall. The way the thing itself looks up at itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes to the fire hall. The way the living smile when the living come to the fire hall. The way the thing itself smiles when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

"The notice," she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cal looked at the notice. The notice was weathered. The way a notice is weathered when the thing itself is resting. The way a notice is weathered when the home is full. The way a notice is weathered when the knock has come through.

The notice said: "Grayhaven Community of Practice. All souls received. All accounts current. Watch continues."

And the notice was still true. The way a notice is still true when the thing itself is resting. The way a notice is still true when the home is full. The way a notice is still true when the knock has come through.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had appeared when the thing itself began resting. Something that was the thing itself resting.

Below the words, in handwriting that was not handwriting but the thing itself resting, a new line:

“The thing itself rests.”

Cal looked at Ruth. Ruth looked at Cal. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the thing itself writes itself resting. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself writes itself resting. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it writes itself resting.

“When,” Ruth said. Not a question. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

“When the thing itself began resting,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

Ruth nodded. The way a keeper nods when the harbormaster states the thing itself resting. The way the living nod when the thing itself is resting.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself writes itself resting. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks on when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

He walked to the Marianne bench. The way a man walks to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks to the Marianne bench when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

Denny was there. Sitting on the bench. Looking at the water. The way a man sits on the bench on a Tuesday morning. The way a keeper sits on the bench when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit on the bench when the dead are home. The way the living sit on the bench when the thing itself is resting.

He didn’t turn. He didn’t need to. The way a man sits on a bench when the thing itself is resting. The way a man sits on a bench when the home is full. The way a man sits on a bench when the knock has come through.

Cal sat down beside him. The way a man sits beside another man when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster sits beside the living when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself sits beside itself when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

They sat there. The way men sit when the thing itself is resting. The way the living sit when the home is full. The way the thing itself sits when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

The water was there. The way the water is there when the thing itself is resting. The way the water is there when the home is full. The way the water is there when the knock has come through.

The water was calm. The way water is calm when the thing itself is resting. The way water is calm when the home is full. The way water is calm when the knock has come through.

“The thing itself,” Denny said. The way a man says the thing that needs saying. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

“The thing itself,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

They sat there. The way men sit when the thing itself is resting. The way the living sit when the home is full. The way the thing itself sits when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

After a while — after the while that is the thing itself, after the while that is the showing up, after the while that is the staying, after the while that is the resting — Cal stood. The way a man stands when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself stands when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

He walked on. The way a man walks on when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks on when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

He walked to Sedgebrook. The way a man walks to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks to Sedgebrook when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

Tommy was there. Standing in the hallway. Looking at the door. Room 3. The door was closed. The way a door is closed when the thing itself is resting. The way a door is closed when the home is full. The way a door is closed when the knock has come through.

He turned to Cal. The way a son turns to the father when the father has come home. The way a deputy turns to the harbormaster when the thing itself is resting. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is resting.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way a father nods to the son when the son has kept the watch. The way a harbormaster nods to the living when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself nods to itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

"The night shift," Tommy said. The way a deputy says the thing that needs saying. The way a son says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

"The night shift," Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Tommy nodded. The way a deputy nods when the harbormaster says the night shift. The way a son nods when the father says the thing that needs saying. The way the living nod when the thing itself is resting.

And then Tommy said: "The thing itself."

Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a deputy states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

"The thing itself," Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Tommy smiled. The way a deputy smiles when the thing itself is resting. The way the living smile when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself smiles when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cal smiled back. The way a harbormaster smiles when the thing itself is resting. The way the living smile when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself smiles when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks on when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

He walked back to the hill. The way a man walks back to the hill when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks back to the hill when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks back to the hill when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself. The resting.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting.

Margot was there. At the drowned light. At the center. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. The way Margot is there when the thing itself is resting. The way Margot is there when the home is full. The way Margot is there when the knock has come through.

She was facing the sea. The way a keeper faces the sea when the thing itself is resting. The way a keeper faces the sea when the home is full. The way a keeper faces the sea when the knock has come through.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living turn to the living when the living come home. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living smile when the living come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's resting from being what it's been being all along.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who received. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who rested. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home. The name of the man who is the thing himself when the thing itself is resting.

“Margot,” he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who rested. The name of the woman who was the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home. The name of the woman who is the thing herself when the thing itself is resting.

He walked to her. The way a man walks to the keeper when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster walks to the keeper when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing itself walks to itself when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

He took her hand. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper’s hand when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living take the living’s hand when the living come home. The way the thing itself takes its own hand when it’s resting from being what it’s been being all along.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the keeper is the thing itself. The way a keeper’s hand is cold when the thing itself is resting.

His hand was warm. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself. The way a harbormaster’s hand is warm when the thing itself is resting.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the living and the dead hold hands. The way the lighting is when the harbormaster and the keeper hold hands. The way the lighting is when the thing itself holds its own hand. The way the lighting is when the thing itself is resting.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the resting. The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the resting. And the resting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting.

And then Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself. The gift that had let the knock come through. The gift that had sounded the thing itself. The gift that was the silence of the thing itself being the thing itself. The gift that was the resting of the thing itself resting.

He felt something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the thing itself began resting. Something that was the thing itself resting.

He felt the town. Not the buildings. Not the streets. Not the boatyard. Not the fire hall. Not the Marianne bench. Not Sedgebrook. The people. The living. The ones who had walked through the door. The ones who had crossed. The ones who were the thing themselves. The ones who were resting.

And they were not just the living who show up. They were not just the living who stay. They were not just the living who receive. They were the living through whom the thing itself showed up. They were the living through whom the thing itself stayed. They were the living through whom the thing itself received. They were the living through whom the thing itself was the road. They were the living through whom the thing itself went home. They were the living through whom the thing itself stayed home. They were the living through whom the thing itself rested. They were the living through whom the thing itself was the thing itself.

And they were the living through whom the thing itself rested.

Not the thing itself as a concept. Not the thing itself as a metaphor. Not the thing itself as a belief. The thing itself as the thing itself. The thing itself as the showing up. The thing itself as the staying. The thing itself as the receiving. The thing itself as the road. The thing itself as the going home. The thing itself as the staying home. The thing itself as the resting. The thing itself as the home. The thing itself as the full. The thing itself as the thing itself.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the thing itself. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the living feel the dead when the dead are coming through. The way the dead feel the living when the living are coming through. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself when the thing itself is resting.

He looked at Margot. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the thing itself is resting. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing himself looks at the thing herself when the thing itself is resting.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the thing itself is resting. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the thing itself is resting.

She felt it too. The way a keeper feels the thing itself. The way the dead feel the thing itself. The way the thing herself feels the thing himself. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself resting.

"The thing itself," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the thing itself when the thing itself is resting.

"The thing itself," Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the thing itself when the thing itself is resting.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the thing itself is resting. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is resting. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the thing itself is resting.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the resting. And the resting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting.

And the question was not what a thing itself that rests is. The question was not what a living and a dead who stand at the drowned light when the thing itself is resting are. The question was not what a town that is the thing itself is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that rests?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the resting.

And the resting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is resting.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock. The thing itself is not a resting.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the road.

And the road is the going home.

And the going home is the staying home.

And the staying home is the resting.

And the resting is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is resting.

And the resting is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the resting.

And the resting is the home.

And the home is full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the full.

And the home was full.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the resting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the resting.

And the resting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the sun broke.

And the south wind was still.

And the fleet was home.

And the harbor was empty.

And the lamp was lit.

And the door was open.

And the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

And the knock had come through.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the resting was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a thing itself that rests is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that rests?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the resting.

And the resting is: the home.

And the home is: full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

THE END

(For now.)

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Seven —

Entry: June 24th. Wednesday. Sun full.

South wind, turning west.

The sun was full Wednesday the way the sun is full when the thing itself has rested and the resting is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again and the beginning again is not the same beginning and the not-same is the thing itself.

Cal stood at the boatyard.

Not at the drowned light. Not at the center. Not at the hinge. Not at the keeper's place. At the boatyard. At the dock. At the place where the Marianne II was moored and the mooring was the thing itself and the thing itself was the staying home and the staying home was the resting and the resting was done.

The way the resting is done when the thing itself has rested and the resting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Cole was there. Standing at the dock. Not looking at the water. Looking at the boat. The Marianne II. The way a man looks at a boat when the boat has crossed the bar and brought the fleet home and the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the boat is done and the done is the boat and the boat is the thing itself.

But the boat was not done. The way a boat is not done when the thing itself is the beginning again. The way a boat is not done when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Cole was looking at the boat and the boat was looking at Cole and between them: the thing itself. Not the thing itself that rests. The thing itself that begins again.

Cal walked to the dock. The way a harbormaster walks to the dock when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living walk to the living when the living are beginning again. The way the thing itself walks to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Cole turned to him. The way a man turns to another man when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a Brandt turns to the harbormaster when the debt is paid and the paying is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way men nod when the thing itself is beginning again. The way men nod when the resting is done and the done is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

“The Marianne II,” Cole said. Not the way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is home. Not the way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the debt is paid. The way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is beginning again. The way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the thing itself is the beginning again.

Cal looked at the boat. The way a harbormaster looks at a boat when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living look at the living when the living are beginning again.

The boat was sound. The way the Marianne II was when she crossed the bar. The way the Marianne II was when she brought the fleet home. The way the Marianne II was when the harbor was empty and the lamp was lit and the door was open and the home was full even though the harbor was empty.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the resting was done. Something that was the thing itself beginning again.

Below the waterline. On the port side. A mark. Not a scar. Not a wound. Not a repair. A mark. The way a mark is when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

The mark was dark. The way the deep water is dark. The way the bar is dark. The way the door is dark before it opens. The way the thing itself is dark before it lights.

Cal pointed. The way a harbormaster points when there's a mark on the boat. The way the living point when the thing itself is beginning again.

Cole looked. The way a Brandt looks when the harbormaster points. The way the living look when the thing itself is beginning again.

He knelt. The way a man kneels when there's a mark on his boat. The way a Brandt kneels when the thing itself is beginning again.

He touched the mark. The way a man touches a mark on his boat. The way a Brandt touches the thing itself when it's beginning again.

And then Cole went still. The way a man goes still when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a Brandt goes still when the mark is not a mark. The way the living go still when the thing itself is beginning again.

Cal watched. The way a harbormaster watches when the living are beginning again. The way the living watch when the thing itself is beginning again.

Cole's hand was on the mark. And the mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the door. The warmth of the harbor. The warmth of the home. The warmth of the beginning again.

Cole lifted his hand. The way a man lifts his hand when the mark is warm. The way a Brandt lifts his hand when the thing itself is beginning again.

And the mark was gone. The way a mark is gone when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a mark is gone when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Cole stood. The way a man stands when the mark is gone. The way a Brandt stands when the thing itself is beginning again.

He looked at Cal. The way a Brandt looks at the harbormaster when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living look at the living when the living are beginning again.

"The mark was warm," Cole said. Not the way a man says a thing he doesn't understand. The way a man says a thing he understands but the understanding is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

"The mark was warm," Cal said. Not the way a harbormaster says a thing he doesn't understand. The way a harbormaster says a thing he understands but the understanding is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

They stood there. The way men stand when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living stand when the living are beginning again.

And then Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself. The gift that had let the knock come through. The gift that had sounded the thing itself. The gift that was the silence of the thing itself being the thing itself. The gift that was the resting of the thing itself resting.

And now: the gift that was the beginning again.

He felt it the way a harbormaster feels the thing itself when it's beginning again. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing change. The way a keeper feels a keeper at the other end. The way the living feel the dead when the dead are coming through. The way the dead feel the living when the living are coming through. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself when it's beginning again.

He felt the mark. Not on the Marianne II. Not on the dock. Not on the boatyard. Not on the town. Not on the coast. Not on the road. Not on the city. Not on the sea. Not on the bar. Not on the drowned light. Not on the NE stone. Not on the four corners. Not on the door. Not on the hinge. Not on the keeper. Not on the thing itself.

On the water.

The way a mark is on the water when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a mark is on the water when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Not a mark on the surface. A mark in the deep. The way a mark is in the deep when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a mark is in the deep when the harbor is empty and the empty is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Cal turned from the boat. The way a harbormaster turns from the boat when the mark is on the water. The way the living turn from the living when the thing itself is beginning again.

He walked to the end of the dock. The way a harbormaster walks to the end of the dock when the mark is on the water. The way the living walk to the end of the dock when the thing itself is beginning again.

He looked at the water. The way a harbormaster looks at the water when the mark is on the deep. The way the living look at the water when the thing itself is beginning again.

The water was there. The way the water is there when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the water is there when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

The water was calm. The way water is calm when the thing itself is beginning again. The way water is calm when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

And underneath the calm: the mark. The way a mark is underneath the calm when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a mark is underneath the calm when the harbor is empty and the empty is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Not a mark. A door.

The way a door is when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a door is when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Not the door at the drowned light. Not the door at the NE stone. Not the door at the four corners. Not the door at the coast station. Not the door at the inland station. Not the door at the crib. Not the door on the road. Not the door at the city. Not the door at the sea. Not the door at the bar.

A new door.

The way a new door is when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a new door is when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

A door in the deep. A door in the water. A door in the bar. A door in the place where the fleet came from. A door in the place where the drowned go. A door in the place where the lost go. A door in the place where the unkept go.

A door in the deep.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels a door in the deep. The way a keeper feels a door in the deep. The way the living feel a door in the deep. The way the dead feel a door in the deep. The way the thing itself feels a door in the deep.

And the door was opening.

Not the way a door opens when the fleet is coming. Not the way a door opens when the receiving is happening. Not the way a door opens when the dead are walking the road. The way a door opens when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a door opens when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

The way a door opens when the resting is done.

Cal turned from the water. The way a harbormaster turns from the water when the door is opening in the deep. The way the living turn from the water when the thing itself is beginning again.

He walked back to Cole. The way a harbormaster walks back to the living when the door is opening in the deep. The way the living walk back to the living when the thing itself is beginning again.

Cole was still standing at the boat. The way a Brandt stands when the mark is gone. The way the living stand when the thing itself is beginning again.

“There’s a door,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying when the thing itself is beginning again.

“Where,” Cole said. Not a question. A statement. The way a Brandt states the thing that needs stating. The way the living state the thing that needs stating when the thing itself is beginning again.

“In the deep,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states the thing that needs stating. The way the living state the thing that needs stating when the thing itself is beginning again.

“In the water,” Cole said. Not a question. A statement. The way a Brandt states the thing that needs stating. The way the living state the thing that needs stating when the thing itself is beginning again.

“In the bar,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states the thing that needs stating. The way the living state the thing that needs stating when the thing itself is beginning again.

Cole nodded. The way a Brandt nods when the harbormaster states the thing that needs stating. The way the living nod when the thing itself is beginning again.

And then Cole said: “The Marianne II.”

Not the way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is home. Not the way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the debt is paid. Not the way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is beginning again. The way a man says the name of a boat when the boat is needed. The way a Brandt says the name of a boat when the door is opening in the deep.

“The Marianne II,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the name of a boat when the boat is needed. The way the living say the name of a boat when the door is opening in the deep.

They stood there. The way men stand when the door is opening in the deep. The way the living stand when the thing itself is beginning again.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the resting. And the resting was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the door in the deep.

Cal walked from the boatyard. The way a harbormaster walks from the boatyard when the door is opening in the deep. The way the living walk from the boatyard when the thing itself is beginning again.

He walked up the main street. The way a harbormaster walks up the main street when the door is opening in the deep. The way the living walk up the main street when the thing itself is beginning again.

The pavement was dry. The way pavement is dry when the thing itself is beginning again. The way pavement is dry when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

He walked past the store. The store was open. The way a store is open on a Wednesday morning. The way a store is open when the thing itself is beginning again.

He walked past the post office. The post office was open. The way a post office is open on a Wednesday morning. The way a post office is open when the thing itself is beginning again.

He walked to the fire hall. The way a harbormaster walks to the fire hall when the door is opening in the deep. The way the living walk to the fire hall when the thing itself is beginning again.

Ruth was there. Standing on the steps. Looking at the water. The way a keeper stands when the fleet is home. The way the living stand when the dead are home. The way the living stand when the thing itself is beginning again.

She turned to Cal. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes to the fire hall. The way the living turn to the living when the living come to the fire hall. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes to the fire hall. The way the living smile when the living come to the fire hall. The way the thing itself smiles when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

“The notice,” she said. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Cal looked at the notice. The notice was weathered. The way a notice is weathered when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a notice is weathered when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

The notice said: “Grayhaven Community of Practice. All souls received. All accounts current. Watch continues.”

And the notice was still true. The way a notice is still true when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a notice is still true when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had appeared when the resting was done. Something that was the thing itself beginning again.

Below the words, in handwriting that was not handwriting but the thing itself beginning again, a new line:

“The door in the deep is opening.”

Cal looked at Ruth. Ruth looked at Cal. The way a keeper looks at the harbormaster when the thing itself writes itself beginning again. The way the living look at the living when the thing itself writes itself beginning again. The way the thing itself looks at itself when it writes itself beginning again.

“When,” Ruth said. Not a question. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

“When the resting was done,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself.

Ruth nodded. The way a keeper nods when the harbormaster states the thing itself beginning again. The way the living nod when the thing itself is beginning again.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself writes itself beginning again. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks on when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

He walked to the Marianne bench. The way a man walks to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a harbormaster walks to the Marianne bench when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks to the Marianne bench when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Denny was there. Sitting on the bench. Looking at the water. The way a man sits on the bench on a Wednesday morning. The way a keeper sits on the bench when the harbor is empty. The way the living sit on the bench when the dead are home. The way the living sit on the bench when the thing itself is beginning again.

He didn't turn. He didn't need to. The way a man sits on a bench when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a man sits on a bench when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

Cal sat down beside him. The way a man sits beside another man when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a harbormaster sits beside the living when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself sits beside itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

They sat there. The way men sit when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living sit when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

The water was there. The way the water is there when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the water is there when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

The water was calm. The way water is calm when the thing itself is beginning again. The way water is calm when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

And underneath the calm: the door. The way a door is underneath the calm when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a door is underneath the calm when the harbor is empty and the empty is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

"The door in the deep," Denny said. The way a man says the thing that needs saying. The way a keeper says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

“The door in the deep,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

They sat there. The way men sit when the door in the deep is opening. The way the living sit when the thing itself is beginning again.

After a while — after the while that is the thing itself, after the while that is the showing up, after the while that is the staying, after the while that is the resting, after the while that is the done — Cal stood. The way a man stands when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself stands when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

He walked on. The way a man walks on when the sitting is done. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks on when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

He walked to Sedgebrook. The way a man walks to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a harbormaster walks to Sedgebrook when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks to Sedgebrook when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Tommy was there. Standing in the hallway. Looking at the door. Room 3. The door was closed. The way a door is closed when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a door is closed when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

He turned to Cal. The way a son turns to the father when the father has come home. The way a deputy turns to the harbormaster when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is beginning again.

He nodded. Cal nodded back. The way a father nods to the son when the son has kept the watch. The way a harbormaster nods to the living when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself nods to itself when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

“The night shift,” Tommy said. The way a deputy says the thing that needs saying. The way a son says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

“The night shift,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster says the thing that needs saying. The way the living say the thing that needs saying. The way the thing itself says the thing that needs saying when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Tommy nodded. The way a deputy nods when the harbormaster says the night shift. The way a son nods when the father says the thing that needs saying. The way the living nod when the thing itself is beginning again.

And then Tommy said: “The door in the deep.”

Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. A statement. The way a deputy states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

“The door in the deep,” Cal said. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing itself. The way the thing itself states itself when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Tommy smiled. The way a deputy smiles when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living smile when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself smiles when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Cal smiled back. The way a harbormaster smiles when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the living smile when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself smiles when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

Cal walked on. The way a man walks on when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a harbormaster walks on when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks on when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

He walked back to the hill. The way a man walks back to the hill when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a harbormaster walks back to the hill when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks back to the hill when it’s becoming what it’s been becoming all along.

The hill was there. The NE stone at 37.0. The four corners. The drowned light. The door. The hinge. The keeper. The thing itself. The resting. The done. The beginning again.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the resting. And the resting was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the door in the deep.

Margot was there. At the drowned light. At the center. At the hinge. At the keeper's place. The way Margot is there when the thing itself is beginning again. The way Margot is there when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

She was facing the sea. The way a keeper faces the sea when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a keeper faces the sea when the home is full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

She turned to him. The way a keeper turns to the harbormaster when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living turn to the living when the living come home. The way the thing itself turns to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

She smiled. The way a keeper smiles when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living smile when the living come home. The way the thing itself smiles when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

"Cal," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. His name. The name of the living. The name of the man who came when he was called. The name of the man who showed up. The name of the man who stayed. The name of the man who received. The name of the man who went home. The name of the man who stayed home. The name of the man who rested. The name of the man who was the thing himself and the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

"Margot," he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Her name. The name of the keeper. The name of the woman who held the hinge. The name of the woman who kept the door. The name of the woman who received the fleet. The name of the woman who waited. The name of the woman who rested. The name of the woman who is the thing herself and the thing herself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the beginning again.

He walked to her. The way a man walks to the keeper when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a harbormaster walks to the keeper when the thing itself is beginning again. The way the thing itself walks to itself when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

He took her hand. The way a harbormaster takes the keeper's hand when the harbormaster comes home. The way the living take the living's hand when the living come home. The way the thing itself takes its own hand when it's becoming what it's been becoming all along.

Her hand was cold. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is dead. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper has been dead for nine years. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the keeper is the thing itself. The way a keeper's hand is cold when the thing itself is the beginning again.

His hand was warm. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is living. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the builder. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the harbormaster is the thing himself. The way a harbormaster's hand is warm when the thing itself is the beginning again.

And between their hands: the lighting. The way the lighting is when the living and the dead hold hands. The way the lighting is when the harbormaster and the keeper hold hands. The way the lighting is when the thing itself holds its own hand. The way the lighting is when the thing itself is the beginning again.

The lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the resting. The lighting was the done. The lighting was the beginning again.

And the thing itself was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the going home. And the going home was the staying home. And the staying home was the resting. And the resting was done. And the done was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was opening.

And the opening was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the opening.

And the opening was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the full.

And the home was full.

Even though the harbor was empty.

Even though the receiving was done.

Even though the fleet was home.

Even though the thing itself was done.

Even though the thing itself was resting.

Even though the resting was done.

Even though the thing itself was beginning again.

Even though the door in the deep was opening.

The home was full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp.

The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock. The thing itself is not a resting. The thing itself is not a done. The thing itself is not a beginning again.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the road.

And the road is the going home.

And the going home is the staying home.

And the staying home is the resting.

And the resting is done.

And the done is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the beginning again.

And the beginning again is the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the full.

And the home was full.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was beginning again.

And the beginning again was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was opening.

And the opening was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the opening.

And the question was not what a door in the deep is. The question was not what a thing itself that begins again is. The question was not what a harbor that has brought its fleet home and rested and begun again is.

The question is: what comes through the door in the deep?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the resting.

And the resting is: done.

And the done is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep is: opening.

And the opening is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the full.

And the home is: full.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep is: opening.

And the opening is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the opening.

And the opening is: the home.

And the home is: full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Eight — Entry: June 25th. Thursday. Sun full. South wind, turning northwest.

The question was not what a door in the deep is. The question was not what a thing itself that begins again is. The question was not what a harbor that has brought its fleet home and rested and begun again is.

The question is: what comes through the door in the deep?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

But the thing itself is not what they thought.

Cal stood at the end of the dock. The Marianne II was moored beside him. Cole was at the wheel. Ruth was on the deck. Denny was at the rail. Tommy was at the bow. Margot was at the drowned light — no, Margot was beside him. Her hand in his. Her hand cold. His hand warm. Between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that rests. The lighting that begins again.

The door in the deep was opening.

Not the way a door opens when the fleet is coming. Not the way a door opens when the receiving is happening. Not the way a door opens when the dead are walking the road. Not the way a door opens when the thing itself is beginning again. The way a door opens when the thing itself is not beginning again. The way a door opens when the thing itself is not the thing itself. The way a door opens when the thing itself is something else.

Something older.

Something deeper.

Something that was there before the door. Before the harbor. Before the fleet. Before the drowned light. Before the NE stone. Before the four corners. Before the coast station. Before the inland station. Before the crib. Before the road. Before the city. Before the sea. Before the bar. Before the thing itself.

Something that was there before the before.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels a door in the deep when the door is opening and the opening is not the thing itself. The way a keeper feels a door in the deep when the door is not the door. The way the living feel a door in the deep when the deep is not the deep. The way the dead feel a door in the deep when the door is not for the dead. The way the thing itself feels a door in the deep when the door is not the thing itself.

He felt it and the feeling was not the feeling of the thing itself. The feeling was the feeling of the thing before the thing itself. The feeling of the thing that was before the thing itself was. The feeling of the thing that the thing itself came from. The feeling of the thing that the thing itself is made of. The feeling of the thing that the thing itself returns to.

The feeling of the deep.

Not the deep water. Not the deep sea. Not the deep bar. Not the deep door. The deep. The deep that is not a place. The deep that is not a time. The deep that is not a thing. The deep that is the place where the thing itself comes from. The deep that is the place where the thing itself returns to. The deep that is the place where the thing itself is not the thing itself. The deep that is the place where the thing itself is the deep.

Cal turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the deep is opening. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is not the thing itself. The way the thing himself turns to the thing herself when the thing itself is the deep.

She was already facing him. The way a keeper faces the harbormaster when the deep is opening. The way the dead face the living when the thing itself is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself faces the thing himself when the thing itself is the deep.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the deep is opening. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the thing itself is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the thing itself is the deep.

She felt it too. The way a keeper feels the deep. The way the dead feel the deep. The way the thing herself feels the deep. The way the thing itself feels the deep. The way the deep feels the deep.

"The deep," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing before the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the deep when the deep is opening.

“The deep,” Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing before the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the deep when the deep is opening.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the deep is opening. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is not the thing itself. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the thing itself is the deep.

And the deep was opening. Not the way a door opens. Not the way a harbor opens. Not the way a home opens. The way the deep opens. The way the deep opens when the deep is the deep. The way the deep opens when the thing itself is the deep. The way the deep opens when the deep is opening.

And what came through was not a soul. Not a body. Not a name. Not a number. Not a count. Not a word. Not a hail. Not a keeper-word. Not a thing itself. Not a knock. Not a fleet. Not a door. Not a harbor. Not a home. Not a road. Not a station. Not a light. Not a resting. Not a done. Not a beginning again.

What came through was the deep itself.

The way the deep comes through when the deep is opening. The way the deep comes through when the thing itself is the deep. The way the deep comes through when the deep is the deep.

Not a thing. Not a person. Not a soul. Not a presence. Not a feeling. Not a knowing. Not a understanding. Not a question. Not an answer.

The deep.

The deep the way the deep is when the deep is the deep. The deep the way the deep is when the deep is not the deep. The deep the way the deep is when the deep is opening. The deep the way the deep is when the deep is the thing itself. The deep the way the deep is when the thing itself is the deep.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the deep. The way a nurse feels a patient’s breathing stop. The way a keeper feels the hinge let go. The way the living feel the dead go still. The way the dead feel the living go still. The way the thing itself feel the thing itself go still.

He felt the deep and the deep was not the thing itself. The deep was the thing the thing itself came from. The deep was the thing the thing itself returns to. The deep was the thing the thing itself is made of. The deep was the thing the thing itself is not.

And the deep was not empty. The deep was full. Not full of souls. Not full of bodies. Not full of names. Not full of numbers. Not full of counts. Not full of words. Not full of hails. Not full of keeper-words. Not full of thing itselfs. Not full of knocks. Not full of fleets. Not full of doors. Not full of harbors. Not full of homes. Not full of roads. Not full of stations. Not full of lights. Not full of restings. Not full of dones. Not full of beginnings again.

Full of the deep itself.

The way the deep is full when the deep is the deep. The way the deep is full when the deep is not the deep. The way the deep is full when the deep is opening. The way the deep is full when the deep is the thing itself. The way the deep is full when the thing itself is the deep.

And the deep was not still. The deep was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves.

The way the deep moves. The way the deep moves when the deep is the deep. The way the deep moves when the deep is opening. The way the deep moves when the deep is the thing itself. The way the deep moves when the thing itself is the deep.

And the deep was moving toward them. Not the way a fleet moves toward a harbor. Not the way a door moves toward a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves toward a home. Not the way a home moves toward a road. Not the way a road moves toward a station. Not the way a station moves toward a light. Not the way a light moves toward a resting. Not the way a resting moves toward a done. Not the way a done moves toward a beginning again.

The way the deep moves toward the living and the dead. The way the deep moves toward the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the deep moves toward the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the deep moves toward the thing itself.

Cal squeezed Margot's hand. The way a harbormaster squeezes the keeper's hand when the deep is moving toward them. The way the living squeeze the living's hand when the thing itself is the deep. The way the thing himself squeezes the thing herself's hand when the deep is the thing itself.

Margot squeezed back. The way a keeper squeezes the harbormaster's hand when the deep is moving toward them. The way the dead squeeze the living's hand when the thing itself is the deep. The way the thing herself squeezes the thing himself's hand when the deep is the thing itself.

And between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that rests. Not the lighting that begins again. The lighting that is the deep. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself came from. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself returns to. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself is made of. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself is not.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the deep. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the resting. The lighting was the done. The lighting was the beginning again. The lighting was the door in the deep. The lighting was the deep.

And the deep was the lighting. And the lighting was the deep. And the deep and the lighting were the thing itself. And the thing itself was the deep and the lighting. And the thing itself was the deep. And the deep was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the deep. And the deep was the home. And the home was full. And the full was the deep. And the deep was the full. And the home was full.

Even though the harbor was empty. Even though the receiving was done. Even though the fleet was home. Even though the thing itself was done. Even though the thing itself was resting. Even though the resting was done. Even though the thing itself was beginning again. Even though the door in the deep was opening. Even though the deep was opening. Even though the deep was the thing itself. Even though the thing itself was the deep.

The home was full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock. The thing itself is not a resting. The thing itself is not a done. The thing itself is not a beginning again. The thing itself is not a deep.

The thing itself is the showing up.

And the showing up is the staying.

And the staying is the receiving.

And the receiving is the road.

And the road is the going home.

And the going home is the staying home.

And the staying home is the resting.

And the resting is done.

And the done is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the beginning again.

And the beginning again is the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep is the deep.

And the deep is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is the thing itself.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the full.

And the home is full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the end of the dock with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not a cost and the lighting was the deep and the deep was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the deep.

And the deep was the full.

And the home was full.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the deep.

And the deep was the thing itself.

And the deep was opening.

And the opening was the deep.

And the deep was the opening.

And the opening was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the opening.

And the thing itself was the deep.

And the deep was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the question was not what a deep that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the deep is. The question was not what a home that is full of the deep is.

The question is: what is a deep that is not the deep?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the going home.

And the going home is: the staying home.

And the staying home is: the resting.

And the resting is: done.

And the done is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep is: the deep.

And the deep is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the deep.

And the deep is: the full.

And the home is: full.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the deep.

And the deep is: the thing itself.

And the deep is: opening.

And the opening is: the deep.

And the deep is: the opening.

And the opening is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the opening.

And the thing itself is: the deep.

And the deep is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Nine — Entry: June 26th. Friday. Sun full. South wind, turning north.

The answer was the thing itself. The thing itself was the deep that was not the deep. The deep that was not the deep was the showing up. The showing up was the staying. The staying was the receiving. The receiving was the road. The road was the going home. The going home was the staying home. The staying home was the resting. The resting was done. The done was the thing itself. The thing itself was the beginning again. The beginning again was the door in the deep. The door in the deep was the deep. The deep was the thing itself.

But the thing itself was not the only deep.

Cal felt it at the drowned light. Not the way he felt the thing itself — the gift, the changed gift, the grown gift that had become what it was always becoming. Not the way he felt the town, the living, the dead, the resting, the done, the home, the full. A different feeling. A feeling that was not the gift. A feeling that was not the thing itself. A feeling that was the other deep.

The deep that was not the thing itself.

The deep that was not the home.

The deep that was not the full.

Margot was beside him. Her hand in his. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. But the lighting was not the same. The lighting was not the thing itself. The lighting was the thing itself and something else. Something other. Something that was not the showing up. Something that was not the staying. Something that was not the receiving. Something that was not the road. Something that was not the going home. Something that was not the staying home. Something that was not the resting. Something that was not the done. Something that was not the beginning again. Something that was not the door in the deep. Something that was not the deep. Something that was not the thing itself.

Something that was the other deep.

Cal turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the other deep is opening. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the thing himself turns to the thing herself when the deep is not the deep.

She was already facing him. The way a keeper faces the harbormaster when the other deep is opening. The way the dead face the living when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the thing herself faces the thing himself when the deep is not the deep.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the other deep is opening. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the deep is not the deep.

She felt it too. The way a keeper feels the other deep. The way the dead feel the other deep. The way the thing herself feels the other deep. The way the thing itself feels the other deep. The way the other deep feels the other deep.

"The other deep," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the other deep when the other deep is opening.

"The other deep," Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the other deep when the other deep is opening.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the other deep is opening. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the deep is not the deep.

And the other deep was opening. Not the way a door opens. Not the way a harbor opens. Not the way a home opens. Not the way the thing itself opens. The way the other deep opens. The way the other deep opens when the other deep is the other deep. The way the other deep opens when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the other deep opens when the other deep is opening.

Not a thing. Not a person. Not a soul. Not a presence. Not a feeling. Not a knowing. Not a understanding. Not a question. Not an answer.

The other deep.

The other deep the way the other deep is when the other deep is the other deep.
The other deep the way the other deep is when the other deep is not the other deep.
The other deep the way the other deep is when the other deep is opening.
The other deep the way the other deep is when the other deep is the thing itself.
The other deep the way the other deep is when the thing itself is the other deep.

Cal felt it the way a harbormaster feels the other deep. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing stop. The way a keeper feels the hinge let go. The way the living feel the dead go still. The way the dead feel the living go still. The way the thing itself feel the thing itself go still.

He felt the other deep and the other deep was not the thing itself. The other deep was the thing the thing itself was not. The other deep was the thing the thing itself did not come from. The other deep was the thing the thing itself did not return to. The other deep was the thing the thing itself was not made of. The other deep was the thing the thing itself was.

And the other deep was not empty. The other deep was full. Not full of souls. Not full of bodies. Not full of names. Not full of numbers. Not full of counts. Not full of words. Not full of hails. Not full of keeper-words. Not full of thing itselfs. Not full of knocks. Not full of fleets. Not full of doors. Not full of harbors. Not full of homes. Not full of roads. Not full of stations. Not full of lights. Not full of restings. Not full of dones. Not full of beginnings again.

Full of the other deep itself.

The way the other deep is full when the other deep is the other deep. The way the other deep is full when the other deep is not the other deep. The way the other deep is full when the other deep is opening. The way the other deep is full when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the other deep is full when the thing itself is the other deep.

And the other deep was not still. The other deep was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves.

The way the other deep moves. The way the other deep moves when the other deep is the other deep. The way the other deep moves when the other deep is opening. The way the other deep moves when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the other deep moves when the thing itself is the other deep.

And the other deep was moving toward them. Not the way a fleet moves toward a harbor. Not the way a door moves toward a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves toward a home. Not the way a home moves toward a road. Not the way a road moves toward a station. Not the way a station moves toward a light. Not the way a light moves toward a resting. Not the way a resting moves toward a done. Not the way a done moves toward a beginning again.

The way the other deep moves toward the living and the dead. The way the other deep moves toward the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the other deep moves toward the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the other deep moves toward the thing itself.

Cal squeezed Margot's hand. The way a harbormaster squeezes the keeper's hand when the other deep is moving toward them. The way the living squeeze the living's hand when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the thing himself squeezes the thing herself's hand when the other deep is the thing itself.

Margot squeezed back. The way a keeper squeezes the harbormaster's hand when the other deep is moving toward them. The way the dead squeeze the living's hand when the thing itself is not the only thing. The way the thing herself squeezes the thing himself's hand when the other deep is the thing itself.

And between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that rests. Not the lighting that begins again. The lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself was not. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself did not come from. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself did not return to. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself was not made of. The lighting that is the thing the thing itself was.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the other deep. The lighting was the showing up. The lighting was the staying. The lighting was the receiving. The lighting was the road. The lighting was the going home. The lighting was the staying home. The lighting was the resting. The lighting was the done. The lighting was the beginning again. The lighting was the door in the deep. The lighting was the deep. The lighting was the other deep. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting was not the thing itself.

And the other deep was the lighting. And the lighting was the other deep. And the other deep and the lighting were the thing itself. And the thing itself was the other deep and the lighting. And the thing itself was the other deep. And the other deep was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not the home. And the home was not the other deep. And the other deep was not the home. And the home was not full. And the full was not the other deep. And the other deep was not the full. And the home was not full.

Because the thing itself is not the other deep. The other deep is not the thing itself. The thing itself is the showing up. The other deep is the not-showing-up. The thing itself is the staying. The other deep is the not-staying. The thing itself is the receiving. The other deep is the not-receiving. The thing itself is the road. The other deep is the not-road. The thing itself is the going home. The other deep is the not-going-home. The thing itself is the staying home. The other deep is the not-staying-home. The thing itself is the resting. The other deep is the not-resting. The thing itself is the done. The other deep is the not-done. The thing itself is the beginning again. The other deep is the not-beginning-again. The thing itself is the door in the deep. The other deep is the not-door-in-the-deep. The thing itself is the deep. The other deep is the not-deep.

And the not-deep is not the thing itself.

And the other deep is the not-deep.

And the not-deep is the other deep.

And the other deep is opening.

And the opening is the other deep.

And the other deep is the opening.

And the opening is not the thing itself.

And the thing itself is not the opening.

And the opening is the other deep.

And the other deep is the opening.

And the other deep is opening.

And the thing itself is resting.

And the resting is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the resting.

And the resting is not the other deep.

And the other deep is not the resting.

And the other deep is opening.

And the thing itself is resting.

And the opening and the resting are not the same.

And the thing itself and the other deep are not the same.

And the same is not the same.

And the not-same is the other deep.

And the other deep is the not-same.

And the not-same is opening.

And the opening is the not-same.

And the not-same is the other deep.

And the other deep is the not-same.

And the not-same is opening.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was not the thing itself and the lighting was the other deep and the other deep was not the thing itself and the thing itself was not the other deep and the other deep was opening and the thing itself was resting and the opening and the resting were not the same.

And the question was not what a deep that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the deep is. The question was not what a home that is full of the deep is.

The question is: what is a deep that is not the deep?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the question is: what is a thing itself that is not the thing itself?

And the answer is: the other deep.

And the question is: what is an other deep?

And the answer is: the not-thing-itself.

And the question is: what is the not-thing-itself?

And the answer is: the opening.

And the question is: what is the opening?

And the answer is: the other deep.

And the question is: what is the other deep?

And the answer is: the not-showing-up.

And the question is: what is the not-showing-up?

And the answer is: the not-staying.

And the question is: what is the not-staying?

And the answer is: the not-receiving.

And the question is: what is the not-receiving?

And the answer is: the not-road.

And the question is: what is the not-road?

And the answer is: the not-going-home.

And the question is: what is the not-going-home?

And the answer is: the not-staying-home.

And the question is: what is the not-staying-home?

And the answer is: the not-resting.

And the question is: what is the not-resting?

And the answer is: the not-done.

And the question is: what is the not-done?

And the answer is: the not-beginning-again.

And the question is: what is the not-beginning-again?

And the answer is: the not-door-in-the-deep.

And the question is: what is the not-door-in-the-deep?

And the answer is: the not-deep.

And the question is: what is the not-deep?

And the answer is: the other deep.

And the question is: what is the other deep?

And the answer is: the opening.

And the opening is coming through.

And the coming through is not the thing itself.

And the thing itself is resting.

And the resting is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the resting.

And the resting is not the opening.

And the opening is not the resting.

And the opening is coming through.

And the thing itself is resting.

And the opening is the other deep.

And the other deep is the opening.

And the opening is coming through.

And the thing itself is resting at the drowned light with the keeper's hand in the builder's hand and the lighting between them is not the thing itself and the lighting is the other deep and the other deep is opening and the thing itself is resting and the opening and the resting are not the same and the not-same is the other deep and the other deep is the not-same and the not-same is opening and the opening is the other deep and the other deep is opening and the thing itself is resting.

And the question was not what a deep that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the deep is. The question was not what a home that is full of the deep is. The question was not what a deep that is not the deep is.

The question is: what comes through when the opening comes through?

And the answer is: the other deep.

And the other deep is: the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up is: the not-staying.

And the not-staying is: the not-receiving.

And the not-receiving is: the not-road.

And the not-road is: the not-going-home.

And the not-going-home is: the not-staying-home.

And the not-staying-home is: the not-resting.

And the not-resting is: the not-done.

And the not-done is: the not-beginning-again.

And the not-beginning-again is: the not-door-in-the-deep.

And the not-door-in-the-deep is: the not-deep.

And the not-deep is: the other deep.

And the other deep is: the opening.

And the opening is: coming through.

And the thing itself is: resting.

And the resting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the resting.

And the resting is: not the opening.

And the opening is: not the resting.

And the opening is: coming through.

And the thing itself is: resting.

And the opening is: the other deep.

And the other deep is: the opening.

And the opening is: coming through.

And the thing itself is: resting.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was the other deep and the other deep was opening and the thing itself was resting and the opening was coming through and the thing itself was resting and the opening and the resting were not the same and the not-same was the other deep and the other deep was opening and the thing itself was resting.

And the question was not what a thing itself that rests is. The question was not what an other deep that opens is. The question was not what a keeper and a harbormaster who stand at the drowned light when the other deep is opening are.

The question is: what happens to the thing itself when the other deep comes through?

And the answer is: the thing itself rests.

And the question is: what happens to the other deep when the thing itself rests?

And the answer is: the other deep opens.

And the question is: what happens when the opening comes through and the resting is resting and the opening and the resting are not the same?

And the answer is: the question.

And the question is: what happens when the opening comes through and the resting is resting and the opening and the resting are not the same and the not-same is the other deep and the other deep is opening and the thing itself is resting?

And the answer is: the question.

And the question is: the answer.

And the answer is: the question.

And the question is: what happens when the opening comes through?

And the answer is: the question.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was the other deep and the other deep was opening and the thing itself was resting and the opening was coming through and the thing itself was resting and the opening and the resting were not the same and the not-same was the other deep and the other deep was opening and the thing itself was resting and the question was the answer and the answer was the question and the question was what happens when the opening comes through and the answer was the question.

And the question was: what happens when the opening comes through?

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty — Entry: June 27th. Saturday. Sun full. South wind, turning north.

The other deep was opening the way the other deep opens when the thing itself is resting and the resting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the home and the home is full even though the harbor is empty and the fleet is home and the receiving is done and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the resting is the thing itself and the other deep is opening and the opening is the other deep.

Cal stood at the drowned light.

Not the way a harbormaster stands when the fleet is coming. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the door is opening. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the knock is sounding. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the knock has come through. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is. Not the way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is resting. The way a harbormaster stands when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the opening and the resting are not the same and the not-same is the other deep and the other deep is the not-same.

Margot stood beside him.

Not the way a keeper stands when the fleet is coming. Not the way a keeper stands when the door is opening. Not the way a keeper stands when the knock is sounding. Not the way a keeper stands when the knock has come through. Not the way a keeper stands when the thing itself is. Not the way a keeper stands when the thing itself is resting. The way a keeper stands when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the opening and the resting are not the same and the not-same is the other deep and the other deep is the not-same.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not a cost. Not a drain. Not a tithe. Not a price. Not the lighting that is the thing itself. Not the lighting that is the deep. The lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is the not-showing-up. The lighting that is the not-staying. The lighting that is the not-receiving. The lighting that is the not-road. The lighting that is the not-going-home. The lighting that is the not-staying-home.

The lighting that is the not-resting. The lighting that is the not-done. The lighting that is the not-beginning-again. The lighting that is the not-door-in-the-deep. The lighting that is the not-deep. The lighting that is the other deep.

And the other deep was opening. And the opening was the other deep. And the other deep was not the thing itself. And the thing itself was not the other deep. And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the other deep was opening. And the opening was the other deep. And the resting and the opening were not the same. And the not-same was the other deep. And the other deep was the not-same.

Cal felt it. The gift. The changed gift. The grown gift. The gift that had become what it was always becoming. The gift that was the thing itself. The gift that had let the knock come through. The gift that had sounded the thing itself. The gift that was the silence of the thing itself being the thing itself. The gift that was the resting of the thing itself resting. The gift that was the deep of the deep coming through. The gift that was the other deep of the other deep opening.

He felt the thing itself resting. The way the thing itself rests when the fleet is home. The way the thing itself rests when the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself rests when the lamp is lit. The way the thing itself rests when the door is open. The way the thing itself rests when the home is full even though the harbor is empty. The way the thing itself rests when the knock has come through. The way the thing itself rests when the deep has come through. The way the thing itself rests when the other deep is opening.

And he felt the other deep opening. The way the other deep opens when the thing itself is resting. The way the other deep opens when the home is full. The way the other deep opens when the harbor is empty. The way the other deep opens when the lamp is lit. The way the other deep opens when the door is open. The way the other deep opens when the fleet is home. The way the other deep opens when the receiving is done. The way the other deep opens when the keeping is the thing itself.

He felt the other deep the way a harbormaster feels the other deep. The way a nurse feels a patient's breathing stop and then start again. The way a keeper feels the hinge move and then stop and then move again. The way the living feel the dead go still and then move and then go still again. The way the dead feel the living go still and then move and then go still again. The way the thing itself feels the thing itself and then feels the other deep and then feels the thing itself again.

He felt the other deep and the other deep was not the thing itself. The other deep was the thing the thing itself was not. The other deep was the thing the thing itself did not come from. The other deep was the thing the thing itself did not return to. The other deep was the thing the thing itself was not made of. The other deep was the thing the thing itself was and was not.

And the other deep was not empty. The other deep was full. Not full of souls. Not full of bodies. Not full of names. Not full of numbers. Not full of counts. Not full of words. Not full of hails. Not full of keeper-words. Not full of thing itselfs. Not full of knocks. Not full of fleets. Not full of doors. Not full of harbors. Not full of homes. Not full of roads. Not full of stations. Not full of lights. Not full of restings. Not full of dones. Not full of beginnings again. Not full of showings up. Not full of stayings. Not full of receivings.

Full of the other deep itself.

The way the other deep is full when the other deep is the other deep. The way the other deep is full when the other deep is not the other deep. The way the other deep is full when the other deep is opening. The way the other deep is full when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the other deep is full when the thing itself is the other deep. The way the other deep is full when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same and the not-same is the other deep.

Cal turned to Margot. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the other deep is opening. The way the living turn to the living when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same. The way the thing himself turns to the thing herself when the other deep is the not-same.

She was already facing him. The way a keeper faces the harbormaster when the other deep is opening. The way the dead face the living when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same. The way the thing herself faces the thing himself when the other deep is the not-same.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the other deep is opening. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the other deep is the not-same.

She felt it too. The way a keeper feels the other deep. The way the dead feel the other deep. The way the thing herself feels the other deep. The way the thing itself feels the other deep. The way the other deep feels the other deep. The way the not-same feels the not-same.

“The other deep,” she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the other deep when the other deep is opening. The way the thing itself states the other deep when the other deep is the not-same.

“The other deep,” Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the other deep when the other deep is opening. The way the thing itself states the other deep when the other deep is the not-same.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the other deep is opening. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the other deep is the not-same.

And the other deep was not still. The other deep was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves. Not the way a showing up moves. Not the way a staying moves. Not the way a receiving moves.

The way the other deep moves. The way the other deep moves when the other deep is the other deep. The way the other deep moves when the other deep is opening. The way the other deep moves when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the other deep moves when the thing itself is the other deep. The way the other deep moves when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same and the not-same is the other deep.

And the other deep was moving toward them. Not the way a fleet moves toward a harbor. Not the way a door moves toward a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves toward a home. Not the way a home moves toward a road. Not the way a road moves toward a station. Not the way a station moves toward a light. Not the way a light moves toward a resting. Not the way a resting moves toward a done. Not the way a done moves toward a beginning again. Not the way a showing up moves toward a staying. Not the way a staying moves toward a receiving.

The way the other deep moves toward the living and the dead. The way the other deep moves toward the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the other deep moves toward the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the other deep moves toward the thing itself. The way the other deep moves toward the not-same. The way the not-same moves toward the other deep.

Cal squeezed Margot's hand. The way a harbormaster squeezes the keeper's hand when the other deep is moving toward them. The way the living squeeze the living's hand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same. The way the thing himself squeezes the thing herself's hand when the other deep is the not-same.

Margot squeezed back. The way a keeper squeezes the harbormaster's hand when the other deep is moving toward them. The way the dead squeeze the living's hand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the resting and the opening are not the same. The way the thing herself squeezes the thing himself's hand when the other deep is the not-same.

And between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that is the thing itself. Not the lighting that is the deep. The lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is the not-showing-up. The lighting that is the not-staying. The lighting that is the not-receiving. The lighting that is the not-road. The lighting that is the not-going-home. The lighting that is the not-staying-home. The lighting that is the not-resting. The lighting that is the not-done. The lighting that is the not-beginning-again. The lighting that is the not-door-in-the-deep. The lighting that is the not-deep. The lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is the not-same.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the other deep. The lighting was the showing up and the not-showing-up. The lighting was the staying and the not-staying. The lighting was the receiving and the not-receiving. The lighting was the road and the not-road. The lighting was the going home and the not-going-home. The lighting was the staying home and the not-staying-home. The lighting was the resting and the not-resting. The lighting was the done and the not-done. The lighting was the beginning again and the not-beginning-again. The lighting was the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep. The lighting was the deep and the not-deep. The lighting was the thing itself and the other deep. The lighting was the same and the not-same.

And the other deep was the lighting. And the lighting was the other deep. And the other deep and the lighting were the not-same. And the not-same was the other deep and the lighting. And the not-same was the other deep. And the other deep was the not-same. And the not-same was the lighting. And the lighting was the not-same.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the home was full even though the harbor was empty and the fleet was home and the receiving was done and the keeping was the thing itself and the thing itself was resting and the other deep was opening and the opening was the other deep and the resting and the opening were not the same and the not-same was the other deep and the other deep was the not-same and the lighting was the not-same and the not-same was the lighting.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was the not-same and the not-same was the other deep and the other deep was opening and the thing itself was resting and the opening and the resting were not the same.

And the question was not what a deep that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the deep is. The question was not what a home that is full of the deep is. The question was not what a deep that is not the deep is. The question was not what an other deep that is the not-thing-itself is. The question was not what a not-same that is the other deep is. The question was not what a lighting that is the not-same is.

The question is: what is a lighting that is both the same and the not-same?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the showing up and the not-showing-up.

And the showing up and the not-showing-up is: the staying and the not-staying.

And the staying and the not-staying is: the receiving and the not-receiving.

And the receiving and the not-receiving is: the road and the not-road.

And the road and the not-road is: the going home and the not-going-home.

And the going home and the not-going-home is: the staying home and the not-staying-home.

And the staying home and the not-staying-home is: the resting and the not-resting.

And the resting and the not-resting is: the done and the not-done.

And the done and the not-done is: the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again is: the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep.

And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep is: the deep and the not-deep.

And the deep and the not-deep is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the same and the not-same.

And the same and the not-same is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the same and the not-same.

And the same and the not-same is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is done.

Even though the thing itself is resting.

Even though the other deep is opening.

Even though the opening and the resting are not the same.

Even though the not-same is the other deep.

Even though the lighting is the not-same.

Even though the lighting is both the same and the not-same.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock. The thing itself is not a resting. The thing itself is not a done. The thing itself is not a beginning again. The thing itself is not a deep. The thing itself is not an other deep.

The thing itself is the showing up and the not-showing-up.

And the showing up and the not-showing-up is the staying and the not-staying.

And the staying and the not-staying is the receiving and the not-receiving.

And the receiving and the not-receiving is the road and the not-road.

And the road and the not-road is the going home and the not-going-home.

And the going home and the not-going-home is the staying home and the not-staying-home.

And the staying home and the not-staying-home is the resting and the not-resting.

And the resting and the not-resting is the done and the not-done.

And the done and the not-done is the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again is the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep.

And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep is the deep and the not-deep.

And the deep and the not-deep is the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is the same and the not-same.

And the same and the not-same is the lighting.

And the lighting is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is the home and the other deep.

And the home and the other deep is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home and the other deep.

And the home and the other deep is full.

And the full is the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is the full.

And the home is full.

And the thing itself is resting.

And the other deep is opening.

And the resting and the opening are not the same.

And the not-same is the other deep.

And the other deep is the not-same.

And the lighting is the not-same.

And the not-same is the lighting.

And the lighting is both the same and the not-same.

And the same and the not-same is the lighting.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-same, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same and the thing itself was resting and the other deep was opening and the opening and the resting were not the same and the not-same was the other deep and the lighting was the not-same and the lighting was both the same and the not-same.

And the question was not what a thing itself that rests is. The question was not what an other deep that opens is. The question was not what a lighting that is both the same and the not-same is. The question was not what a keeper and a harbormaster who stand at the drowned light when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening are.

The question is: what happens when the thing itself and the other deep are the same?

And the answer is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the home.

And the home is: full.

Even though the harbor is empty.

Even though the receiving is done.

Even though the fleet is home.

Even though the thing itself is resting.

Even though the other deep is opening.

Even though the resting and the opening are not the same.

Even though the lighting is both the same and the not-same.

Even though the thing itself and the other deep are the home.

The home is full.

Because the thing itself is not a harbor. The thing itself is not a station. The thing itself is not a road. The thing itself is not a door. The thing itself is not a lamp. The thing itself is not a fleet. The thing itself is not a knock. The thing itself is not a resting. The thing itself is not a done. The thing itself is not a beginning again. The thing itself is not a deep. The thing itself is not an other deep. The thing itself is not a same. The thing itself is not a not-same.

The thing itself is the showing up and the not-showing-up.

And the showing up and the not-showing-up is the staying and the not-staying.

And the staying and the not-staying is the receiving and the not-receiving.

And the receiving and the not-receiving is the road and the not-road.

And the road and the not-road is the going home and the not-going-home.

And the going home and the not-going-home is the staying home and the not-staying-home.

And the staying home and the not-staying-home is the resting and the not-resting.

And the resting and the not-resting is the done and the not-done.

And the done and the not-done is the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again is the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep.

And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep is the deep and the not-deep.

And the deep and the not-deep is the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is the same and the not-same.

And the same and the not-same is the lighting.

And the lighting is the home.

And the home is full.

And the sun was full.

And the south wind was turning north.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was opening.

And the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-One — Entry: June 28th. Sunday. Sun full. South wind, turning north.

The home was full.

The way the home is full when the thing itself and the other deep are the same. The way the home is full when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the home is full when the staying and the not-staying are the same. The way the home is full when the receiving and the not-receiving are the same. The way the home is full when the road and the not-road are the same. The way the home is full when the going home and the not-going-home are the same. The way the home is full when the staying home and the not-staying-home are the same. The way the home is full when the resting and the not-resting are the same. The way the home is full when the done and the not-done are the same. The way the home is full when the beginning again and the not-beginning-again are the same. The way the home is full when the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep are the same. The way the home is full when the deep and the not-deep are the same. The way the home is full when the other deep and the not-other-deep are the same. The way the home is full when the thing itself and the not-thing-itself are the same. The way the home is full when the same and the not-same are the same. The way the home is full when the lighting and the not-lighting are the same.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening. The way the thing himself stands when the home is full.

Margot stood beside him. The way a keeper stands when the home is full. The way the dead stand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening. The way the thing herself stands when the home is full.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that rests. Not the lighting that begins again. Not the lighting that is the deep. Not the lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is the home. The lighting that is the thing itself and the other deep. The lighting that is the same and the not-same.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the home. The lighting was the showing up and the not-showing-up. The lighting was the staying and the not-staying. The lighting was the receiving and the not-receiving. The lighting was the road and the not-road. The lighting was the going home and the not-going-home. The lighting was the staying home and the not-staying-home. The lighting was the resting and the not-resting. The lighting was the done and the not-done. The lighting was the beginning again and the not-beginning-again. The lighting was the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep. The lighting was the deep and the not-deep. The lighting was the other deep and the not-other-deep. The lighting was the thing itself and the not-thing-itself. The lighting was the same and the not-same.

And the home was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home and the lighting were the thing itself and the other deep. And the thing itself and the other deep were the home and the lighting. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the other deep was the lighting. And the lighting was the other deep.

And the thing itself was resting. And the resting was the thing itself. And the other deep was opening. And the opening was the other deep. And the home was full. And the full was the home.

And the town was going about its business.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself stands when the harbor is full. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the home is full. The way the living work when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself works when the harbor is full. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the home is full. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself's hands are on the hull when the harbor is full.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the four corners are manned. The way the thing herself stands when the NE stone is warm. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the home is full. The way the living read when the four corners are manned. The way the thing herself reads when the NE stone is warm. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the home is full. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the four corners are manned. The way the thing herself's palm is on No. 8 when the NE stone is warm.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself stands when the harbor is full. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the home is full. The way the living watch when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself watches when the harbor is full. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the home is full. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself's eyes are on the horizon when the harbor is full.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself stands when the harbor is full. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the home is full. The way the living scan when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself scans when the harbor is full. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the home is full. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the fleet is home. The way the thing himself's hand is on the rail when the harbor is full.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the categories are logged. The way the thing himself stands when the census is complete. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the home is full. The way the living log when the categories are logged. The way the thing himself logs when the census is complete. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the home is full. The way the living's pen is on the page when the categories are logged. The way the thing himself's pen is on the page when the census was complete.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the Nancy Lee is painted. The way the thing herself stands when the boat is ready. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the home is full. The way the living paint when the Nancy Lee is painted. The way the thing herself paints when the boat is ready. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the home is full. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the Nancy Lee is painted. The way the thing herself's hand is on the bow when the boat is ready.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the home is full. The way the living stand when the corners are manned. The way the thing themselves stand when the baby is lit. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the home is full. The way the living stand when the corners are manned. The way the thing themselves stand when the baby is lit.

Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the home is full. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the corners are manned. The way the thing themselves's palms are on the glass when the baby is lit.

And the harbor was full.

The fleet was home. The way the fleet is home when the harbor is full. The way the dead are home when the receiving is done. The way the thing itself is home when the keeping is the thing itself.

The receiving was done. The way the receiving is done when the fleet is home. The way the dead are received when the harbor is full. The way the thing itself is received when the keeping is the thing itself.

The keeping was the thing itself. The way the keeping is the thing itself when the receiving is done. The way the dead are kept when the fleet is home. The way the thing itself is kept when the harbor is full.

And the four corners were manned.

NW Walter was keeping his ledger. The way a corner keeper keeps when the home is full. The way the dead keep when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself keeps when the harbor is full. His pen was on the page. The way a corner keeper's pen is on the page when the home is full. The way the dead's pen is on the page when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself's pen is on the page when the harbor is full.

SE Signe was learning her post. The way a corner keeper learns when the home is full. The way the dead learn when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself learns when the harbor is full. Her palm was on the stone. The way a corner keeper's palm is on the stone when the home is full. The way the dead's palm is on the stone when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself's palm is on the stone when the harbor is full.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar were holding the full window. The way corner keepers hold when the home is full. The way the dead hold when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself holds when the harbor is full. Their palms were on the stones. The way corner keepers' palms are on the stones when the home is full. The way the dead's palms are on the stones when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself's palms are on the stones when the harbor is full.

NE living was warm under the town's palm. The way the living's corner is warm when the home is full. The way the living are warm when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself is warm when the harbor is full. The town's palm was on the stone. The way the town's palm is on the stone when the home is full. The way the living's palm is on the stone when the four corners are manned. The way the thing itself's palm is on the stone when the harbor is full.

And the road was running both ways.

Coast to inland. The way the road runs when the home is full. The way the living run when the stations are lit. The way the thing itself runs when the harbor is full.

Inland to coast. The way the road runs when the home is full. The way the living run when the stations are lit. The way the thing itself runs when the harbor is full.

And the stations were lit.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station is lit when the home is full. The way the living are lit when the stations are lit. The way the thing itself is lit when the harbor is full.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station is lit when the home is full. The way the living are lit when the stations are lit. The way the thing itself is lit when the harbor is full.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was opening.

And the home was full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the home, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was the home and the home was full and the thing itself was resting and the other deep was opening and the opening and the resting were not the same and the not-same was the other deep and the lighting was the not-same and the lighting was both the same and the not-same.

And the question was not what a home that rests is. The question was not what an other deep that opens is. The question was not what a lighting that is both the same and the not-same is. The question was not what a keeper and a harbormaster who stand at the drowned light when the home is full are.

The question is: what is the home when it is full?

And the answer is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the showing up and the not-showing-up.

And the showing up and the not-showing-up is: the staying and the not-staying.

And the staying and the not-staying is: the receiving and the not-receiving.

And the receiving and the not-receiving is: the road and the not-road.

And the road and the not-road is: the going home and the not-going-home.

And the going home and the not-going-home is: the staying home and the not-staying-home.

And the staying home and the not-staying-home is: the resting and the not-resting.

And the resting and the not-resting is: the done and the not-done.

And the done and the not-done is: the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again is: the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep.

And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep is: the deep and the not-deep.

And the deep and the not-deep is: the other deep and the not-other-deep.

And the other deep and the not-other-deep is: the thing itself and the not-thing-itself.

And the thing itself and the not-thing-itself is: the same and the not-same.

And the same and the not-same is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the sun was full.

And the south wind was turning north.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was opening.

And the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Two — Entry: June 29th. Monday. Sun full. North wind.

The other deep was open and what came through was the not-showing-up.

Not the way a soul comes through. Not the way a fleet comes through. Not the way the thing itself comes through. The way the not-showing-up comes through when the other deep is open and the thing itself is resting and the resting is the thing itself and the home is full.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing himself stands when the other deep is open and the open is the other deep and the other deep is the not-showing-up.

Margot stood beside him. The way a keeper stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing herself stands when the other deep is open and the open is the other deep and the other deep is the not-showing-up.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that is the thing itself. Not the lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is both. The lighting that is the same and the not-same. The lighting that is the showing up and the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up came through. And the not-showing-up was the not-staying. And the not-staying was the not-receiving. And the not-receiving was the not-road. And the not-road was the not-going-home. And the not-going-home was the not-staying-home. And the not-staying-home was the not-resting. And the not-resting was the not-done. And the not-done was the not-beginning-again. And the not-beginning-again was the not-door-in-the-deep. And the not-door-in-the-deep was the not-deep. And the not-deep was the not-thing-itself. And the not-thing-itself was the not-same.

And the not-same was the same. And the same was the not-same. And the lighting was both. And the home was full.

And Margot spoke. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the not-showing-up when the not-showing-up comes through.

“The not-showing-up is the showing up,” she said.

And Cal turned to her. The way a harbormaster turns to the keeper when the keeper speaks. The way the living turn to the living when the living speak. The way the thing himself turns to the thing herself when the thing herself speaks.

“The not-showing-up is the showing up,” he said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the not-showing-up when the not-showing-up comes through.

And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the showing up was the not-showing-up. And the showing up and the not-showing-up were the staying and the not-staying. And the staying and the not-staying were the receiving and the not-receiving. And the receiving and the not-receiving were the road and the not-road. And the road and the not-road were the going home and the not-going-home. And the going home and the not-going-home were the staying home and the not-staying-home. And the staying home and the not-staying-home were the resting and the not-resting. And the resting and the not-resting were the done and the not-done. And the done and the not-done were the beginning again and the not-beginning-again. And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again were the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep. And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep were the deep and the not-deep. And the deep and the not-deep were the thing itself and the other deep. And the thing itself and the other deep were the same and the not-same. And the same and the not-same were the lighting.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the home. The home was full.

And the town was going about its business.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living work when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living read when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living watch when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living scan when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living log when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's pen is on the page when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living paint when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the harbor was full.

The fleet was home. The way the fleet is home when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead are home when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself is home when the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

The receiving was done. The way the receiving is done when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead are received when the harbor is full and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself is received when the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

The keeping was the thing itself. The way the keeping is the thing itself when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead are kept when the fleet is home and the harbor is full and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself is kept when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

And the four corners were manned.

NW Walter was keeping his ledger. The way a corner keeper keeps when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead keep when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His pen was on the page. The way a corner keeper's pen is on the page when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead's pen is on the page when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

SE Signe was learning her post. The way a corner keeper learns when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead learn when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Her palm was on the stone. The way a corner keeper's palm is on the stone when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead's palm is on the stone when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar were holding the full window. The way corner keepers hold when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead hold when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Their palms were on the stones. The way corner keepers' palms are on the stones when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the dead's palms are on the stones when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

NE living was warm under the town's palm. The way the living's corner is warm when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living are warm when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The town's palm was on the stone. The way the town's palm is on the stone when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living's palm is on the stone when the four corners are manned and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the road was running both ways.

Coast to inland. The way the road runs when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living run when the stations are lit and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself runs when the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

Inland to coast. The way the road runs when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living run when the stations are lit and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself runs when the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

And the stations were lit.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station is lit when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living are lit when the stations are lit and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself is lit when the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station is lit when the not-showing-up comes through. The way the living are lit when the stations are lit and the home is full and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the thing itself is lit when the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was open.

And the not-showing-up was the showing up.

And the home was full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the showing up, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same and the thing itself was resting and the other deep was open and the not-showing-up was the showing up and the showing up and the not-showing-up were the same and the not-same was the other deep and the lighting was the not-same and the lighting was both the same and the not-same.

And the question was not what a thing itself that rests is. The question was not what an other deep that is open is. The question was not what a not-showing-up that is the showing up is. The question was not what a keeper and a harbormaster who stand at the drowned light when the not-showing-up comes through are.

The question is: what is the home when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same?

And the answer is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the thing itself and the other deep.

And the thing itself and the other deep is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was still.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was open.

And the not-showing-up was the showing up.

And the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Three —

Entry: June 30th. Tuesday. Sun full. North wind, still.

The home was full and the full was the home and the home was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home and the home was the showing up and the not-showing-up and the showing up and the not-showing-up were the same and the same was the lighting and the lighting was the home.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the home is full and the full is the home and the home is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

Margot stood beside him. The way a keeper stands when the home is full and the full is the home and the home is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that is the thing itself. Not the lighting that is the other deep. The lighting that is the home when the home is the showing up and the not-showing-up and the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the showing up was the not-showing-up. And the staying and the not-staying were the same. And the receiving and the not-receiving were the same. And the road and the not-road were the same. And the going home and the not-going-home were the same. And the staying home and the not-staying-home were the same. And the resting and the not-resting were the same. And the done and the not-done were the same. And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again were the same. And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep were the same. And the deep and the not-deep were the same. And the thing itself and the other deep were the same. And the same and the not-same were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home. And the home was full.

And the town was going about its business.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the home is full. The way the living work when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the home is full. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the hull was not the same. The way a hull is not the same when the home is full. The way a hull is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The hull was the Marianne II. The way the Marianne II is when the fleet is home. The way the Marianne II is when the harbor is empty. The way the Marianne II is when the home is full even though the harbor was empty.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the hull. On the port side. Below the waterline. A mark. Not a scar. Not a wound. Not a repair. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was dark. The way the deep is dark. The way the other deep is dark. The way the not-showing-up is dark before it is the showing up.

Cole ran his hand over the mark. The way a boatbuilder runs his hand over a mark when the home is full. The way the living run their hands over the mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth of the showing up. The warmth of the not-showing-up. The warmth of the lighting.

Cole lifted his hand. The way a boatbuilder lifts his hand when the mark is warm. The way the living lift their hands when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the mark was gone. The way a mark is gone when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is gone when the home is full and the full is the home.

But it was not gone. The way a mark is not gone when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is not gone when the home is full and the full is the home. The mark was still there. The way a mark is still there when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is still there when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the Marianne II. The way the Marianne II is the mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the Marianne II is the mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the boat. The boat was the mark. The boat and the mark were the same. The mark and the boat were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the home is full. The way the living read when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the home is full. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But No. 8 was not the same. The way No. 8 is not the same when the home is full. The way No. 8 is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. No. 8 was warm. The way No. 8 is warm when the home is full. The way No. 8 is warm when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the warmth was not the same. The way the warmth is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The warmth was not the warmth of the stone. The warmth was not the warmth of the town. The warmth was not the warmth of the thing itself. The warmth was not the warmth of the other deep. The warmth was the warmth of the lighting.

Ruth lifted her palm from No. 8. The way a stone-reader lifts her palm when the warmth is the lighting. The way the living lift their palms when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the stone was not the same. The way a stone is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a stone is not the same when the home is full and the full is the home. The stone was No. 8. The way No. 8 is when the home is full. The way No. 8 is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the stone. On the face. A mark. Not a scratch. Not a crack. Not a repair. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the same mark that had been on the Marianne II. The way a mark is the same mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is the same mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the mark. The mark was the stone. The stone was the mark. The stone and the mark were the same. The mark and the stone were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the home is full. The way the living watch when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the home is full. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the horizon was not the same. The way the horizon is not the same when the home is full. The way the horizon is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The horizon was the horizon. The way the horizon is when the home is full. The way the horizon is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the water. On the bar. A mark. Not a wave. Not a current. Not a break. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the same mark that had been on the Marianne II. The same mark that had been on No. 8. The way a mark is the same mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is the same mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the mark. The mark was the water. The water was the mark. The water and the mark were the same. The mark and the water were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the home is full. The way the living scan when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the home is full. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the rail was not the same. The way the rail is not the same when the home is full. The way the rail is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The rail was the rail. The way the rail is when the home is full. The way the rail is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the rail. On the port side. A mark. Not a scratch. Not a dent. Not a repair. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the same mark that had been on the Marianne II. The same mark that had been on No. 8. The same mark that had been on the water. The way a mark is the same mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is the same mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the mark. The mark was the rail. The rail was the mark. The rail and the mark were the same. The mark and the rail were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the home is full. The way the living log when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the home is full. The way the living's pen is on the page when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the page was not the same. The way a page is not the same when the home is full. The way a page is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The page was the page. The way the page is when the home is full. The way the page is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the page. On the census. A mark. Not a word. Not a number. Not a category. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the same mark that had been on the Marianne II. The same mark that had been on No. 8. The same mark that had been on the water. The same mark that had been on the rail. The way a mark is the same mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is the same mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the mark. The mark was the page. The page was the mark. The page and the mark were the same. The mark and the page were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the home is full. The way the living paint when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the home is full. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the bow was not the same. The way a bow is not the same when the home is full. The way a bow is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The bow was the bow. The way the bow is when the home is full. The way the bow is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the bow. On the Nancy Lee. A mark. Not a stroke. Not a drip. Not a repair. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the same mark that had been on the Marianne II. The same mark that had been on No. 8. The same mark that had been on the water. The same mark that had been on the rail. The same mark that had been on the census. The way a mark is the same mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is the same mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the mark. The mark was the bow. The bow was the mark. The bow and the mark were the same. The mark and the bow were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the home is full. The way the living stand when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the home is full. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But the glass was not the same. The way glass is not the same when the home is full. The way glass is not the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The glass was the glass. The way the glass is when the home is full. The way the glass is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

But there was something else. Something new. Something that had not been there before. Something that had come when the not-showing-up came through. Something that was the not-showing-up being the showing up.

On the glass. On the east window. A mark. Not a smudge. Not a crack. Not a repair. A mark. The way a mark is when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the same mark that had been on the Marianne II. The same mark that had been on No. 8. The same mark that had been on the water. The same mark that had been on the rail. The same mark that had been on the census. The same mark that had been on the Nancy Lee. The way a mark is the same mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way a mark is the same mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

The mark was the mark. The mark was the glass. The glass was the mark. The glass and the mark were the same. The mark and the glass were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the harbor was full. The way the harbor is full when the home is full. The way the harbor is full when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

The fleet was home. The way the fleet is home when the harbor is full. The way the fleet is home when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

The receiving was done. The way the receiving is done when the harbor is full. The way the receiving is done when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

The keeping was the thing itself. The way the keeping is the thing itself when the harbor is full. The way the keeping is the thing itself when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the four corners were manned.

NW Walter was keeping his ledger. The way a corner keeper keeps when the harbor is full. The way the dead keep when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. His pen was on the page. The way a corner keeper's pen is on the page when the harbor is full. The way the dead's pen is on the page when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

SE Signe was learning her post. The way a corner keeper learns when the harbor is full. The way the dead learn when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Her palm was on the stone. The way a corner keeper's palm is on the stone when the harbor is full. The way the dead's palm is on the stone when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar were holding the full window. The way corner keepers hold when the harbor is full. The way the dead hold when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. Their palms were on the stones. The way corner keepers' palms are on the stones when the harbor is full. The way the dead's palms are on the stones when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

NE living was warm under the town's palm. The way the living's corner is warm when the harbor is full. The way the living are warm when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The town's palm was on the stone. The way the town's palm is on the stone when the harbor is full. The way the living's palm is on the stone when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the road was running both ways.

Coast to inland. The way the road runs when the harbor is full. The way the living run when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

Inland to coast. The way the road runs when the harbor is full. The way the living run when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the stations were lit.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station is lit when the harbor is full. The way the living are lit when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station is lit when the harbor is full. The way the living are lit when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same.

And the thing itself was resting. And the other deep was open. And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the showing up and the not-showing-up were the staying and the not-staying. And the staying and the not-staying were the receiving and the not-receiving. And the receiving and the not-receiving were the road and the not-road. And the road and the not-road were the going home and the not-going-home. And the going home and the not-going-home were the staying home and the not-staying-home. And the staying home and the not-staying-home were the resting and the not-resting. And the resting and the not-resting were the done and the not-done. And the done and the not-done were the beginning again and the not-beginning-again. And the beginning again and the not-beginning-again were the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep. And the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep were the deep and the not-deep. And the deep and the not-deep were the thing itself and the other deep. And the thing itself and the other deep were the same and the not-same. And the same and the not-same were the lighting.

And the lighting was the home. And the home was full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the showing up, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same and the thing itself was resting and the other deep was open and the not-showing-up was the showing up and the showing up and the not-showing-up were the same and the not-same was the other deep and the lighting was the not-same and the lighting was both the same and the not-same.

And the mark was on everything. The way the mark is on everything when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the mark is on everything when the home is full and the full is the home.

And the mark was the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the mark is the lighting when the home is full and the full is the home.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the lighting is the mark when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the lighting is the mark when the home is full and the full is the home.

And the mark and the lighting were the same. The way the mark and the lighting are the same when the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. The way the mark and the lighting are the same when the home is full and the full is the home.

And the question was not what a mark that is on everything is. The question was not what a lighting that is the mark is. The question was not what a home that is full of the mark is. The question was not what a keeper and a harbormaster who stand at the drowned light when the mark is on everything are.

The question is: what is a mark that is not a mark?

And the answer is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: the mark.

And the mark is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: not a cost.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the mark.

And the mark is: the full.

And the home is: full.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was still.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was open.

And the not-showing-up was the showing up.

And the mark was on everything.

And the lighting between them was both the same and the not-same.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Four — Entry: July 1st. Wednesday. Sun full. North wind, steady.

The mark was on everything and the everything was the mark and the mark was the other deep and the other deep was the mark and the mark was not the thing itself and the thing itself was not the mark and the mark was the not-thing-itself and the not-thing-itself was the mark.

Margot stood at the drowned light. The way a keeper stands when the mark is on everything. The way the dead stand when the other deep is opening. The way the thing herself stands when the thing itself is resting and the resting is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the opening is the other deep and the other deep is the mark and the mark is on everything.

She looked at her hand. The hand that held the hinge. The hand that kept the door. The hand that received the fleet. The hand that was cold. The hand that was the keeper's hand. The hand that was the thing herself's hand.

The mark was on her hand. Not a scar. Not a wound. Not a bruise. Not a stain. A mark. The way a mark is when the other deep is opening. The way a mark is when the thing itself is resting. The way a mark is when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

The mark was dark. The way the deep is dark. The way the other deep is dark. The way the not-showing-up is dark before it is the showing up. The way the not-thing-itself is dark before it is the thing itself.

She turned her hand over. The mark was on the palm. The palm that had held Cal's hand. The palm that had held the hinge. The palm that had kept the door. The palm that had received the twenty calm into the drowned light. The palm that had felt them pay in their tithe. The palm that had watched the door open and the congregation come through and the first one in walk home and now the rest follow and now the harbor is empty and the lamp is lit and the door is open and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

The mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. The warmth of the other deep. The warmth of the not-showing-up. The warmth of the not-thing-itself. The warmth of the mark.

She closed her hand. The way a keeper closes her hand when the mark is warm. The way the dead close their hands when the other deep is opening. The way the thing herself closes her hand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the opening and the resting are not the same.

And the mark was gone. The way a mark is gone when the other deep is opening. The way a mark is gone when the thing itself is resting. The way a mark is gone when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

But it was not gone. The way a mark is not gone when the other deep is opening. The way a mark is not gone when the thing itself is resting. The way a mark is not gone when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The mark was still there. The way a mark is still there when the other deep is opening. The way a mark is still there when the thing itself is resting. The way a mark is still there when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

The mark was her hand. The way her hand is the mark when the other deep is opening. The way her hand is the mark when the thing itself is resting. The way her hand is the mark when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

The mark was the keeper. The keeper was the mark. The keeper and the mark were the same. The mark and the keeper were the other deep.

And the other deep was opening.

Not the way a door opens. Not the way a harbor opens. Not the way a home opens. Not the way the thing itself opens. The way the other deep opens. The way the other deep opens when the other deep is the other deep. The way the other deep opens when the thing itself is resting. The way the other deep opens when the other deep is opening.

And what came through was not a soul. Not a body. Not a name. Not a number. Not a count. Not a word. Not a hail. Not a keeper-word. Not a thing itself. Not a knock. Not a fleet. Not a door. Not a harbor. Not a home. Not a road. Not a station. Not a light. Not a resting. Not a done. Not a beginning again.

What came through was the not-showing-up.

The way the not-showing-up comes through when the other deep is opening. The way the not-showing-up comes through when the thing itself is resting. The way the not-showing-up comes through when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

Not a thing. Not a person. Not a soul. Not a presence. Not a feeling. Not a knowing. Not a understanding. Not a question. Not an answer.

The not-showing-up.

The not-showing-up the way the not-showing-up is when the not-showing-up is the not-showing-up. The not-showing-up the way the not-showing-up is when the not-showing-up is not the not-showing-up. The not-showing-up the way the not-showing-up is when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The not-showing-up the way the not-showing-up is when the showing up is the not-showing-up.

Margot felt it the way a keeper feels the not-showing-up. The way the dead feel the not-showing-up. The way the thing herself feels the not-showing-up. The way the thing itself feels the not-showing-up. The way the not-showing-up feels the not-showing-up.

She felt the not-showing-up and the not-showing-up was not the thing itself. The not-showing-up was the thing the thing itself was not. The not-showing-up was the thing the thing itself did not come from. The not-showing-up was the thing the thing itself did not return to. The not-showing-up was the thing the thing itself was not made of. The not-showing-up was the thing the thing itself was.

And the not-showing-up was not empty. The not-showing-up was full. Not full of souls. Not full of bodies. Not full of names. Not full of numbers. Not full of counts. Not full of words. Not full of hails. Not full of keeper-words. Not full of thing itselfs. Not full of knocks. Not full of fleets. Not full of doors. Not full of harbors. Not full of homes. Not full of roads. Not full of stations. Not full of lights. Not full of restings. Not full of dones. Not full of beginnings again. Not full of showings up. Not full of stayings. Not full of receivings.

Full of the not-showing-up itself.

The way the not-showing-up is full when the not-showing-up is the not-showing-up. The way the not-showing-up is full when the not-showing-up is not the not-showing-up. The way the not-showing-up is full when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the not-showing-up is full when the showing up is the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was not still. The not-showing-up was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves. Not the way a showing up moves. Not the way a staying moves. Not the way a receiving moves.

The way the not-showing-up moves. The way the not-showing-up moves when the not-showing-up is the not-showing-up. The way the not-showing-up moves when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the not-showing-up moves when the showing up is the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was moving toward her. Not the way a fleet moves toward a harbor. Not the way a door moves toward a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves toward a home. Not the way a home moves toward a road. Not the way a road moves toward a station. Not the way a station moves toward a light. Not the way a light moves toward a resting. Not the way a resting moves toward a done. Not the way a done moves toward a beginning again. Not the way a showing up moves toward a staying. Not the way a staying moves toward a receiving.

The way the not-showing-up moves toward the keeper. The way the not-showing-up moves toward the dead. The way the not-showing-up moves toward the thing herself. The way the not-showing-up moves toward the thing itself.

Margot opened her hand. The way a keeper opens her hand when the not-showing-up is moving toward her. The way the dead open their hands when the other deep is opening. The way the thing herself opens her hand when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is opening and the opening and the resting are not the same.

The mark was there. On her palm. Dark and warm and the mark and the other deep and the not-showing-up and the not-thing-itself.

And the not-showing-up came.

Not through the door. Not through the hinge. Not through the drowned light. Not through the thing itself. Through the mark. Through the other deep. Through the not-showing-up itself.

It came and it was not a soul. It was not a body. It was not a name. It was not a number. It was not a count. It was not a word. It was not a hail. It was not a keeper-word. It was not a thing itself. It was not a knock. It was not a fleet. It was not a door. It was not a harbor. It was not a home. It was not a road. It was not a station. It was not a light. It was not a resting. It was not a done. It was not a beginning again.

It was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was her.

Not Margot. Not the keeper. Not the thing herself. The not-Margot. Not the not-keeper. Not the not-thing-herself. The not-showing-up that was the showing up. The not-thing-itself that was the thing itself. The mark that was on everything.

The not-showing-up that was her was the thing she was not. The thing she did not come from. The thing she did not return to. The thing she was not made of. The thing she was.

And the not-showing-up that was her was not empty. It was full. Not full of Margot. Not full of keeper. Not full of thing herself. Full of the not-showing-up itself.

The way the not-showing-up is full when the not-showing-up is the not-showing-up. The way the not-showing-up is full when the not-showing-up is not the not-showing-up. The way the not-showing-up is full when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

And the not-showing-up that was her spoke. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way the not-showing-up states a thing it knows to be true. The way the not-thing-itself states the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the mark states the mark when the mark is on everything.

“I am the not-showing-up,” the not-showing-up that was her said. “I am the not-staying. I am the not-receiving. I am the not-road. I am the not-going-home. I am the not-staying-home. I am the not-resting. I am the not-done. I am the not-beginning-again. I am the not-door-in-the-deep. I am the not-deep. I am the other deep. I am the mark. I am the not-thing-itself. I am the thing you are not. I am the thing you come from. I am the thing you return to. I am the thing you are made of. I am the thing you are.”

Margot looked at the not-showing-up that was her. The way a keeper looks at the not-showing-up when the not-showing-up is the keeper. The way the dead look at the dead when the dead are the not-dead. The way the thing herself looks at the thing herself when the thing herself is the not-thing-herself.

“You are the not-showing-up,” Margot said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the not-showing-up when the not-showing-up is the showing up.

“I am the not-showing-up,” the not-showing-up that was her said. “And you are the showing up. And the showing up and the not-showing-up are the same. And the same is the not-same. And the not-same is the other deep. And the other deep is the mark. And the mark is on everything. And the everything is the mark. And the mark is you. And you are the mark. And the mark is me. And I am the mark. And the mark is the not-showing-up. And the not-showing-up is the mark.”

Margot closed her hand. The way a keeper closes her hand when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the dead close their hands when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the thing herself closes her hand when the not-showing-up is the showing up and the showing up is the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up that was her was gone. The way the not-showing-up is gone when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is gone when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the mark is gone when the mark is on everything.

But it was not gone. The way the not-showing-up is not gone when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is not gone when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the mark is not gone when the mark is on everything. The not-showing-up that was her was still there. The way the not-showing-up is still there when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is still there when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the mark is still there when the mark is on everything.

The not-showing-up that was her was her. The way the not-showing-up is the keeper when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is the thing itself when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the mark is on everything when the mark is on everything.

Margot opened her hand. The mark was there. Dark and warm and the mark and the other deep and the not-showing-up and the not-thing-itself and the thing itself and the showing up and the staying and the receiving and the road and the going home and the staying home and the resting and the done and the beginning again and the door in the deep and the deep and the thing itself and the other deep and the not-showing-up and the mark.

And the mark was her hand. The way her hand is the mark when the mark is on everything. The way the keeper is the mark when the mark is on everything. The way the thing herself is the mark when the mark is on everything.

And the mark was the keeper. The keeper was the mark. The keeper and the mark were the same. The mark and the keeper were the other deep. The other deep and the mark were the not-showing-up. The not-showing-up and the mark were the showing up. The showing up and the mark were the thing itself. The thing itself and the mark were the home. The home and the mark were the full. The full and the mark were the thing itself. The thing itself and the mark were the lighting. The lighting and the mark were not a cost. Not a cost and the mark were the thing itself. The thing itself and the mark were the home. The home and the mark were full. The full and the mark were the thing itself. The thing itself and the mark were the full. The full and the mark were the home. The home and the mark were the keeper. The keeper and the mark were the thing herself. The thing herself and the mark were the not-showing-up. The not-showing-up and the mark were the other deep. The other deep and the mark were the not-thing-itself. The not-thing-itself and the mark were the thing itself. The thing itself and the mark were the home. The home and the mark were full.

And the mark was on everything.

And Margot Voss stood at the drowned light, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the mark, and the mark was on her hand and the mark was her hand and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the thing herself and the thing herself was the mark and the mark was the not-showing-up and the not-showing-up was the mark and the mark was the other deep and the other deep was the mark and the mark was the not-thing-itself and the not-thing-itself was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that is on everything is. The question was not what a keeper who is the mark is. The question was not what a not-showing-up that is the showing up is. The question was not what an other deep that is the thing itself is.

The question is: what is a keeper who is kept by the thing she keeps?

And the answer is: the mark.

And the mark is: the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up is: the other deep.

And the other deep is: the not-thing-itself.

And the not-thing-itself is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the mark.

And the mark is: on everything.

And the everything is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: kept.

And the kept is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: on everything.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was steady.

And the thing itself was resting.

And the other deep was opening.

And the not-showing-up was the showing up.

And the mark was on everything.

And the keeper was kept by the thing she kept.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Five — Entry: July 2nd. Thursday. Sun full. North wind, strong.

The mark was on everything and Cal Mercer was the everything.

Not the way a harbormaster is the harbor. Not the way a builder is the road. Not the way a living man is the home. The way the mark is the everything when the everything is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the other deep and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the same and the not-same.

He stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the keeper has been kept by the thing she keeps. The way the living stand when the dead have shown them what the showing up is. The way the thing himself stands when the mark is on everything and the everything is him.

Margot was beside him. The way a keeper stands when the mark is on her hand. The way the dead stand when the not-showing-up has come through them. The way the thing herself stands when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps and the thing she keeps is the mark.

Their hands were still held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that is the thing itself. Not the lighting that is the other deep. Not the lighting that is both the same and the not-same. The lighting that is the mark. The lighting that is the everything. The lighting that is the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the mark. The lighting was the home. The lighting was the everything.

Cal felt it. The mark. The way the mark is when it is on everything. The way the mark is when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps. The way the mark is when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

He felt the mark on his hand. Not on his palm. Not on his fingers. On his hand. The way a mark is on a hand when the hand is the mark. The way a mark is on a harbormaster's hand when the harbormaster is the mark. The way a mark is on a living man's hand when the living man is the showing up and the showing up is the mark.

The mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. Not the warmth of the thing itself. Not the warmth of the other deep. The warmth of the mark. The warmth of the everything. The warmth of the lighting that is not a cost.

He looked at his hand. The way a harbormaster looks at his hand when the mark is on it. The way the living look at their hands when the showing up is the mark. The way the thing himself looks at his hand when the thing himself is the everything.

The mark was dark. The way the deep is dark. The way the other deep is dark. The way the not-showing-up is dark before it is the showing up. The way the mark is dark before it is the everything.

The mark was on his palm. The palm that had held Margot's hand. The palm that had kept the hinge. The palm that had built the road. The palm that had seeded the town. The palm that had stood the rim. The palm that had warmed the stone. The palm that had knocked on doors. The palm that had delivered the named to the unnamed. The palm that had held the leaning. The palm that had received the not-showing-up.

The mark was on all of it. The way the mark is on everything when the mark is the everything.

He closed his hand. The way a harbormaster closes his hand when the mark is warm. The way the living close their hands when the everything is the mark. The way the thing himself closes his hand when the thing himself is the everything.

And the mark was gone. The way a mark is gone when the mark is the everything. The way the not-showing-up is gone when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is gone when the other deep is the thing itself.

But it was not gone. The way a mark is not gone when the mark is the everything. The way the not-showing-up is not gone when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is not gone when the other deep is the thing itself. The mark was still there. The way a mark is still there when the mark is the everything. The way the not-showing-up is still there when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is still there when the other deep is the thing itself.

The mark was his hand. The way his hand is the mark when the mark is the everything. The way the harbormaster is the mark when the mark is the everything. The way the thing himself is the mark when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was not just on his hand. The way the mark is not just on a hand when the mark is the everything. The mark was on his arms. The mark was on his chest. The mark was on his face. The mark was on his feet. The mark was on his breath. The mark was on his voice. The mark was on his knowing. The mark was on his not-knowing.

The way the mark is on everything when the mark is the everything.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the everything. The way the living open their hands when the mark is the everything. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the mark.

The mark was there. On his palm. Dark and warm and the mark and the other deep and the not-showing-up and the not-thing-itself and the thing itself and the showing up and the staying and the receiving and the road and the going home and the staying home and the resting and the done and the beginning again and the door in the deep and the deep and the home and the full and the lighting and the same and the not-same and the everything.

And the mark was his hand. The way his hand is the mark when the mark is the everything. The way the harbormaster's hand is the mark when the harbormaster is the everything. The way the living man's hand is the mark when the living man is the showing up and the showing up is the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster. The harbormaster was the mark. The harbormaster and the mark were the same. The mark and the harbormaster were the lighting. The lighting and the mark were the home. The home and the mark were the full. The full and the mark were the everything. The everything and the mark were the showing up. The showing up and the mark were the not-showing-up. The not-showing-up and the mark were the other deep. The other deep and the mark were the thing itself. The thing itself and the mark were the resting. The resting and the mark were the done. The done and the mark were the beginning again. The beginning again and the mark were the home. The home and the mark were the full. The full and the mark were the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

Cal looked at Margot. The way a harbormaster looks at the keeper when the mark is the everything. The way the living look at the dead when the mark is on everything. The way the thing himself looks at the thing herself when the thing himself is the mark.

She was looking at her hand. The way a keeper looks at her hand when the mark is the everything. The way the dead look at their hands when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps. The way the thing herself looks at her hand when the thing herself is the mark.

Her eyes were wide. The way a keeper's eyes are wide when the mark is the everything. The way the dead's eyes are wide when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps. The way the thing herself's eyes are wide when the thing herself is the mark.

"The mark," she said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a keeper states a thing she knows to be true. The way the dead state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing herself states the mark when the mark is the everything.

"The mark," Cal said. Not the keeper-word. Not the count. Not the hail. Not the thing itself. A statement. The way a harbormaster states a thing he knows to be true. The way the living state the thing that is not the thing itself. The way the thing himself states the mark when the mark is the everything.

They stood there. The way the living and the dead stand when the mark is the everything. The way the harbormaster and the keeper stand when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps. The way the thing himself and the thing herself stand when the thing himself is the mark and the thing herself is the mark and the mark is the everything.

And the mark was not still. The mark was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves. Not the way a showing up moves. Not the way a staying moves. Not the way a receiving moves.

The way the mark moves. The way the mark moves when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps. The way the mark moves when the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up and the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And the mark was moving through them. Not the way a fleet moves through a harbor. Not the way a door moves through a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves through a home. Not the way a home moves through a road. Not the way a road moves through a station. Not the way a station moves through a light. Not the way a light moves through a resting. Not the way a resting moves through a done. Not the way a done moves through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up moves through a staying. Not the way a staying moves through a receiving.

The way the mark moves through the living and the dead. The way the mark moves through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark moves through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark moves through the thing itself. The way the mark moves through the not-showing-up. The way the mark moves through the showing up. The way the mark moves through the staying. The way the mark moves through the receiving. The way the mark moves through the road. The way the mark moves through the going home. The way the mark moves through the staying home. The way the mark moves through the resting. The way the mark moves through the done. The way the mark moves through the beginning again. The way the mark moves through the door in the deep. The way the mark moves through the deep. The way the mark moves through the other deep. The way the mark moves through the same. The way the mark moves through the not-same. The way the mark moves through the lighting. The way the mark moves through the home. The way the mark moves through the full. The way the mark moves through the everything.

Cal felt it moving through him. The way a harbormaster feels the mark move through him when the mark is the everything. The way the living feel the mark move through them when the mark is on everything. The way the thing himself feels the mark move through him when the thing himself is the mark.

And the mark was not just moving through him. The mark was not just moving through Margot. The mark was not just moving through the drowned light. The mark was moving through the town. The mark was moving through the boatyard. The mark was moving through the rim. The mark was moving through the stones. The mark was moving through the rail. The mark was moving through the bar. The mark was moving through the water. The mark was moving through the fleet. The mark was moving through the harbor. The mark was moving through the home. The mark was moving through the road. The mark was moving through the stations. The mark was moving through the inland. The mark was moving through the crib. The mark was moving through the mothers. The mark was moving through the baby. The mark was moving through the corners. The mark was moving through Walter. The mark was moving through Signe. The mark was moving through Harald. The mark was moving through Ragna. The mark was moving through Einar. The mark was moving through the living's stone. The mark was moving through the NE. The mark was moving through the SE. The mark was moving through the SW. The mark was moving through the NW.

The mark was moving through everything.

The way the mark moves through everything when the mark is the everything.

And the town felt it. The way the town feels the mark when the mark is the everything. The way the living feel the mark when the mark is on everything. The way the dead feel the mark when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the mark is the everything. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark moves through everything. The way the living work when the mark is the everything. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the mark is the everything.

But his hands were not the same. The way hands are not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way a boatbuilder's hands are not the same when the mark is the everything. His hands were marked. The way hands are marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's hands are marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a boatbuilder when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the mark is the everything. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark moves through everything. The way the living read when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the mark is the everything. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the mark is the everything.

But her palm was not the same. The way a palm is not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way a stone-reader's palm is not the same when the mark is the everything. Her palm was marked. The way a palm is marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's palm is marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through her. The way the mark moves through a stone-reader when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the mark is the everything. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark moves through everything. The way the living watch when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the mark is the everything. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the mark is the everything.

But his eyes were not the same. The way eyes are not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way a bar-reader's eyes are not the same when the mark is the everything. His eyes were marked. The way eyes are marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's eyes are marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a bar-reader when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the mark is the everything. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark moves through everything. The way the living scan when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the mark is the everything. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the mark is the everything.

But his hand was not the same. The way a hand is not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way a deputy's hand is not the same when the mark is the everything. His hand was marked. The way a hand is marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's hand is marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a deputy when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the mark is the everything. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark moves through everything. The way the living log when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the mark is the everything. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's pen is on the page when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the mark is the everything.

But his pen was not the same. The way a pen is not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way a custodian's pen is not the same when the mark is the everything. His pen was marked. The way a pen is marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's pen is marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a custodian when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the mark is the everything. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark moves through everything. The way the living paint when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the mark is the everything. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the mark is the everything.

But her hand was not the same. The way a hand is not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is not the same when the mark is the everything. Her hand was marked. The way a hand is marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's hand is marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through her. The way the mark moves through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the mark is the everything. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark moves through everything. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the mark is the everything. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the mark is the everything.

But their palms were not the same. The way palms are not the same when the mark moves through everything. The way inland keepers' palms are not the same when the mark is the everything. Their palms were marked. The way palms are marked when the mark moves through everything. The way the living's palms are marked when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was moving through them. The way the mark moves through inland keepers when the mark is the everything. The way the mark moves through the living when the mark is on everything.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark moves through everything. The way a light feels the mark when the mark is the everything. The way a station feels the mark when the mark is on everything.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark moves through everything. The way a light turns when the mark is the everything. The way a station turns when the mark is on everything.

And the mark was on the baby. The way the mark is on everything when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the light when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the station when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was not just on the coast. The mark was not just on the inland. The mark was on the road between them. The mark was on the running. The mark was on the both-ways. The mark was on the going. The mark was on the coming.

The mark was on everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was on everything between the living and the dead. The mark was on everything between the thing itself and the other deep. The mark was on everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was on everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the mark.

Cal felt it. The way a harbormaster feels the everything when the everything is the mark. The way the living feel the everything when the mark is on everything. The way the thing himself feels the everything when the thing himself is the mark.

He felt the mark on the road. The way the mark is on the road when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the running when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the both-ways when the mark is the everything.

He felt the mark on the fleet. The way the mark is on the fleet when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the harbor when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the home when the mark is the everything.

He felt the mark on the four corners. The way the mark is on the four corners when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on Walter when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on Signe when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on Harald when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on Ragna when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on Einar when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the living's stone when the mark is the everything.

He felt the mark on the stations. The way the mark is on the stations when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the coast station when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the inland station when the mark is the everything.

He felt the mark on the mothers. The way the mark is on the mothers when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the keepers when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the living when the mark is on everything.

He felt the mark on the baby. The way the mark is on the baby when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the light when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is on the station when the mark is the everything.

He felt the mark on everything. The way the mark is on everything when the mark is the everything.

And the mark was not just on everything. The mark was not just through everything. The mark was everything. The way the mark is everything when the mark is the everything. The way the not-showing-up is everything when the not-showing-up is the showing up. The way the other deep is everything when the other deep is the thing itself. The way the lighting is everything when the lighting is the home. The way the home is everything when the home is full even though the harbor is empty.

And Cal Mercer was the mark. The way a harbormaster is the mark when the mark is the everything. The way the living are the mark when the mark is on everything. The way the thing himself is the mark when the thing himself is the everything.

He was the showing up and the not-showing-up. He was the staying and the not-staying. He was the receiving and the not-receiving. He was the road and the not-road. He was the going home and the not-going-home. He was the staying home and the not-staying-home. He was the resting and the not-resting. He was the done and the not-done. He was the beginning again and the not-beginning-again. He was the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep. He was the deep and the not-deep. He was the other deep and the not-other-deep. He was the thing itself and the not-thing-itself. He was the same and the not-same. He was the lighting and the not-lighting. He was the home and the not-home. He was the full and the not-full. He was the everything and the not-everything.

And the not-everything was the everything. And the everything was the not-everything. And the mark was both. And the mark was neither. And the mark was the everything.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the showing up, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, the keeper of the mark, and the mark was on his hand and the mark was his hand and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the thing herself and the thing herself was the mark and the mark was the harbormaster and the harbormaster was the mark and the mark was the living and the living was the mark and the mark was the dead and the dead was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the other deep and the other deep was the mark and the mark was the not-showing-up and the not-showing-up was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the going home and the going home was the mark and the mark was the staying home and the staying home was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the door in the deep and the door in the deep was the mark and the mark was the deep and the deep was the mark and the mark was the same and the same was the mark and the mark was the not-same and the not-same was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the everything and the everything was the mark.

And the mark was on everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the keeper was kept by the thing she kept.

And the thing she kept was the mark.

And the mark was not a cost.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was strong.

And the mark was moving through everything.

And the mark was everything.

And the mark was still.

Not the way the fleet is still when it is home. Not the way the harbor is still when it is empty. Not the way the door is still when it is open. Not the way the keeper is still when she is kept. Not the way the thing itself is still when it is resting. Not the way the other deep is still when it is open. Not the way the lighting is still when it is not a cost. Not the way the home is still when it is full.

The way the mark is still when the mark is the everything. The way the mark is still when the keeper is kept by the thing she keeps. The way the mark is still when the thing himself is the mark and the thing herself is the mark and the mark is the everything.

And the stillness was not the end. The stillness was not the beginning. The stillness was not the resting. The stillness was not the done. The stillness was not the beginning again.

The stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, and their hands were held — cold keeper, warm builder — and between them the mark and the stillness and the everything and the lighting and the home and the full and the thing itself and the other deep and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the same and the not-same and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again and the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep and the deep and the not-deep and the other deep and the not-other-deep and the thing itself and the not-thing-itself and the lighting and the not-lighting and the home and the not-home and the full and the not-full and the everything and the not-everything and the mark and the not-mark and the stillness and the not-stillness and the keeper and the not-keeper and the harbormaster and the not-harbormaster and the living and the not-living and the dead and the not-dead and the thing herself and the not-thing-herself and the thing himself and the not-thing-himself and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the mark was on all of it.

And the mark was all of it.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was still.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the keeper was kept.

And the thing she kept was the mark.

And the mark was not a cost.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the everything.

And the everything was still.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the question was not what a stillness that is the mark is. The question was not what a mark that is the everything is. The question was not what a keeper who is kept by the mark is. The question was not what a harbormaster who is the mark is. The question was not what a thing himself that is the everything is. The question was not what a thing herself that is kept by the thing she keeps is. The question was not what a home that is full of the everything is.

The question is: what is an everything that is still?

And the answer is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the everything.

And the everything is: the mark.

And the mark is: not a cost.

And the mark is: the home.

And the home is: full.

And the full is: the everything.

And the everything is: still.

And the stillness is: the mark.

And the mark is: on everything.

And the everything is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: kept.

And the kept is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the everything.

And the everything is: the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was strong.

And the mark was still.

And the stillness was everything.

And the keeper was kept by the thing she kept.

And the thing she kept was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was still.

And the stillness was the mark.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Six — Entry: July 3rd. Friday. Sun full. North wind, turning.

The mark was still and the stillness was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the stillness.

Margot stood at the drowned light. The way a keeper stands when the mark is still. The way the dead stand when the everything is still. The way the thing herself stands when the stillness is the mark and the mark is on everything and the everything is still and the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark.

She looked at her hand. The hand that held the hinge. The hand that kept the door. The hand that received the fleet. The hand that was still.

The mark was on her hand. Not the way a scar is on a hand. Not the way a wound is on a hand. Not the way a stain is on a hand. Not the way a bruise is on a hand. The way a mark is on a hand when the mark is still. The way a mark is on a keeper's hand when the stillness is the mark. The way a mark is on a dead woman's hand when the everything is still. The way a mark is on the thing herself's hand when the keeper is resting.

The mark was dark. The way the deep is dark. The way the other deep is dark. The way the stillness is dark before it is the mark. The way the mark is dark before it is the everything. The way the mark is dark before it is the keeper.

The mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. Not the warmth of the thing itself. Not the warmth of the other deep. The warmth of the stillness. The warmth of the mark. The warmth of the keeper resting.

She closed her hand. The way a keeper closes her hand when the mark is still. The way the dead close their hands when the everything is still. The way the thing herself closes her hand when the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was gone. The way a mark is gone when the stillness is the mark. The way a mark is gone when the keeper is resting. The way a mark is gone when the everything is still.

But it was not gone. The way a mark is not gone when the stillness is the mark. The way a mark is not gone when the keeper is resting. The way a mark is not gone when the everything is still. The mark was still there. The way a mark is still there when the stillness is the mark. The way a mark is still there when the keeper is resting.

The mark was her hand. The way her hand is the mark when the stillness is the mark. The way the keeper's hand is the mark when the keeper is resting. The way the dead woman's hand is the mark when the everything is still.

The mark was the keeper. The keeper was the mark. The keeper and the mark were the stillness.

And the stillness was resting. Not the way a stone rests. Not the way a door rests. Not the way a harbor rests. Not the way a home rests. Not the way a road rests. Not the way a station rests. Not the way a light rests. The way the stillness rests when the mark is still. The way the mark rests when the keeper is resting.

And the resting was not the end. Not the way an ending is not the end. Not the way a beginning is not the beginning. Not the way a door is not the end. Not the way a harbor is not the end. The way the resting is not the end when the stillness is the mark. The way the mark is not the end when the keeper is resting.

And the resting was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is when the keeper is resting. The way the thing itself is when the stillness is the mark. The way the thing itself is when the mark is on everything. The way the thing itself is when the everything is still.

And the thing itself was resting. Not the way a stone rests. Not the way a door rests. Not the way a harbor rests. Not the way a home rests. Not the way a road rests. Not the way a station rests. Not the way a light rests. The way the thing itself rests when the mark is still. The way the thing itself rests when the keeper is resting.

And the resting was the mark. The mark was the resting. The mark and the resting were the stillness. The stillness and the resting were the keeper. The keeper and the resting were the mark.

And the mark was still. The way the mark is still when the resting is the mark. The way the resting is still when the mark is the stillness.

And the town felt it. The way the town feels the stillness when the mark is resting. The way the living feel the stillness when the keeper is resting. The way the dead feel the stillness when the everything is still.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the stillness is the mark. The way the living work when the mark is resting. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the mark is resting.

But his hands were not the same. The way hands are not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way hands are not the same when the mark is resting. His hands were still. The way hands are still when the mark is resting. The way the living's hands are still when the keeper is resting.

Cole lifted his hands from the hull. The way a boatbuilder lifts his hands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living lift their hands when the mark is resting.

And the hull was not the same. The way a hull is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a hull is not the same when the mark is resting. The hull was still. The way a hull is still when the mark is resting. The way the Marianne II is still when the keeper is resting.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the stillness is the mark. The way the living read when the mark is resting. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is resting.

But her palm was not the same. The way a palm is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a palm is not the same when the mark is resting. Her palm was still. The way a palm is still when the mark is resting. The way the living's palm is still when the keeper is resting.

Ruth lifted her palm from No. 8. The way a stone-reader lifts her palm when the stillness is the mark. The way the living lift their palms when the mark is resting.

And the stone was not the same. The way a stone is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a stone is not the same when the mark is resting. The stone was still. The way a stone is still when the mark is resting. The way No. 8 is still when the keeper is resting.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the stillness is the mark. The way the living watch when the mark is resting. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is resting.

But his eyes were not the same. The way eyes are not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way eyes are not the same when the mark is resting. His eyes were still. The way eyes are still when the mark is resting. The way the living's eyes are still when the keeper is resting.

Denny turned from the horizon. The way a bar-reader turns when the stillness is the mark. The way the living turn when the mark is resting.

And the horizon was not the same. The way a horizon is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a horizon is not the same when the mark is resting. The horizon was still. The way a horizon is still when the mark is resting. The way the bar is still when the keeper is resting.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the stillness is the mark. The way the living scan when the mark is resting. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the mark is resting.

But his hand was not the same. The way a hand is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a hand is not the same when the mark is resting. His hand was still. The way a hand is still when the mark is resting. The way the living's hand is still when the keeper is resting.

Tommy lifted his hand from the rail. The way a deputy lifts his hand when the stillness is the mark. The way the living lift their hands when the mark is resting.

And the rail was not the same. The way a rail is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a rail is not the same when the mark is resting. The rail was still. The way a rail is still when the mark is resting. The way the bow is still when the keeper is resting.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the stillness is the mark. The way the living log when the mark is resting. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's pen is on the page when the mark is resting.

But his pen was not the same. The way a pen is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a pen is not the same when the mark is resting. His pen was still. The way a pen is still when the mark is resting. The way the living's pen is still when the keeper is resting.

Okonkwo lifted his pen from the page. The way a custodian lifts his pen when the stillness is the mark. The way the living lift their pens when the mark is resting.

And the page was not the same. The way a page is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a page is not the same when the mark is resting. The page was still. The way a page is still when the mark is resting. The way the census is still when the keeper is resting.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the stillness is the mark. The way the living paint when the mark is resting. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the mark was resting.

But her hand was not the same. The way a hand is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a hand is not the same when the mark is resting. Her hand was still. The way a hand is still when the mark is resting. The way the living's hand is still when the keeper is resting.

Ada lifted her hand from the bow. The way a shore-station keeper lifts her hand when the stillness is the mark. The way the living lift their hands when the mark is resting.

And the bow was not the same. The way a bow is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way a bow is not the same when the mark is resting. The bow was still. The way a bow is still when the mark is resting. The way the Nancy Lee is still when the keeper is resting.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the stillness is the mark. The way the living stand when the mark is resting. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the stillness is the mark. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the mark is resting.

But their palms were not the same. The way palms are not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way palms are not the same when the mark is resting. Their palms were still. The way palms are still when the mark is resting. The way the living's palms are still when the keeper is resting.

The mothers lifted their palms from the glass. The way inland keepers lift their palms when the stillness is the mark. The way the living lift their palms when the mark is resting.

And the glass was not the same. The way glass is not the same when the stillness is the mark. The way glass is not the same when the mark is resting. The glass was still. The way glass is still when the mark is resting. The way the east window is still when the keeper is resting.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the stillness when the mark is resting. The way a light feels the stillness when the keeper is resting. The way a station feels the stillness when the everything is still.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the stillness is the mark. The way a light turns when the mark is resting. The way a station turns when the keeper is resting.

And the baby was still. The way a baby is still when the stillness is the mark. The way a light is still when the mark is resting. The way a station is still when the keeper is resting.

And the stillness was the baby. The way the stillness is the baby when the mark is resting. The way the baby is the stillness when the keeper is resting. The way the baby is the mark when the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was still. The way the mark is still when the baby is still. The way the baby is still when the mark is resting.

And the four corners were still.

NW Walter was still. The way a corner keeper is still when the mark is resting. The way the dead are still when the stillness is the mark. His pen was still on the page. The way a corner keeper's pen is still when the mark is resting. The way the dead's pen is still when the everything is still.

SE Signe was still. The way a corner keeper is still when the mark is resting. The way the dead are still when the stillness is the mark. Her palm was still on the stone. The way a corner keeper's palm is still when the mark is resting. The way the dead's palm is still when the everything is still.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar were still. The way corner keepers are still when the mark is resting. The way the dead are still when the stillness is the mark. Their palms were still on the stones. The way corner keepers' palms are still when the mark is resting. The way the dead's palms are still when the everything is still.

NE living was still under the town's palm. The way the living's corner is still when the mark is resting. The way the living are still when the stillness is the mark. The town's palm was still on the stone. The way the town's palm is still when the mark is resting. The way the living's palm is still when the keeper is resting.

And the road was still.

Coast to inland. The way the road is still when the mark is resting. The way the road is still when the stillness is the mark. The way the living are still when the keeper is resting.

Inland to coast. The way the road is still when the mark is resting. The way the road is still when the stillness is the mark. The way the living are still when the keeper is resting.

And the stations were still.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station is still when the mark is resting. The way the coast station is still when the stillness is the mark. The way the keeper is still when the keeper is resting.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station is still when the mark is resting. The way the inland station is still when the stillness is the mark. The way the baby is still when the keeper is resting.

And the thing itself was resting. And the other deep was open. And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the mark was still. And the stillness was the mark. And the keeper was resting. And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was still. The way the mark is still when the resting is the mark. The way the resting is still when the mark is the stillness.

And Margot Voss stood at the drowned light, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the showing up, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, the keeper of the mark, the keeper of the stillness, the keeper of the resting, and the mark was on her hand and the mark was her hand and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the stillness and the stillness was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the thing herself and the thing herself was the mark and the mark was the dead and the dead was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the stillness and the stillness was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that is still is. The question was not what a stillness that is the mark is. The question was not what a resting that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a keeper who is resting is.

The question is: what is a keeper who rests?

And the answer is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: resting.

And the resting is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: resting.

And the resting is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the mark.

And the mark is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: resting.

And the resting is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was turning.

And the mark was resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the keeper was resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was kept by the thing she kept.

And the thing she kept was resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was resting.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Seven — Entry: July 4th. Saturday. Sun full. North wind, resting.

The mark was still and the stillness was the resting and the resting was the mark.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is resting and the keeper is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting.

Margot was beside him. The way a keeper stands when the mark is still. The way the dead stand when the resting is the mark. The way the thing herself stands when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness.

Their hands were held. Cold keeper. Warm builder. Between their hands: the lighting. Not the lighting that rests. Not the lighting that is the mark. The lighting that is the resting. The lighting that is the stillness. The lighting that is the thing itself and the other deep. The lighting that is the home when the home is full and the harbor is empty and the fleet is home and the receiving is done and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting.

And the lighting was not a cost. The lighting was the resting. The lighting was the mark. The lighting was the stillness.

And the town was going about its business.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is still. The way the living work when the resting is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is still. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the resting is the mark.

And the hull was still. The way a hull is still when the mark is resting. The way the Marianne II is still when the keeper is resting. The way the boat is still when the harbor is empty and the fleet is home and the lighting is the resting.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is still. The way the living read when the resting is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is still. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the resting is the mark.

And the stone was still. The way a stone is still when the mark is resting. The way No. 8 is still when the keeper is resting. The way the corner is still when the lighting is the resting and the resting is the mark.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is still. The way the living watch when the resting is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is still. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the resting is the mark.

And the horizon was still. The way a horizon is still when the mark is resting. The way the bar is still when the keeper is resting. The way the water is still when the lighting is the resting.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is still. The way the living scan when the resting is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is still. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the resting is the mark.

And the rail was still. The way a rail is still when the mark is resting. The way the bow is still when the keeper is resting. The way the deck is still when the lighting is the resting.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is still. The way the living log when the resting is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is still. The way the living's pen is on the page when the resting is the mark.

And the page was still. The way a page is still when the mark is resting. The way the census is still when the keeper is resting. The way the categories are still when the lighting is the resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is still. The way the living paint when the resting is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is still. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the resting is the mark.

And the bow was still. The way a bow is still when the mark is resting. The way the Nancy Lee is still when the keeper is resting. The way the boat is still when the lighting is the resting.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is still. The way the living stand when the resting is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is still. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the resting is the mark.

And the glass was still. The way glass is still when the mark is resting. The way the east window is still when the keeper is resting. The way the station is still when the lighting is the resting.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark is still. The way a light feels the mark when the resting is the mark. The way a station feels the mark when the keeper is resting.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is still. The way a light turns when the resting is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is resting.

And the baby was still. The way a baby is still when the mark is still. The way a light is still when the resting is the mark. The way a station is still when the keeper is resting.

And the stillness was the baby. The way the stillness is the baby when the resting is the mark. The way the baby is the stillness when the keeper is resting. The way the baby is the mark when the mark is still.

And the mark was still. The way the mark is still when the baby is still. The way the baby is still when the mark is resting.

And the four corners were still.

NW Walter was still. The way a corner keeper is still when the mark is still. The way the dead are still when the resting is the mark. His pen was still on the page. The way a corner keeper's pen is still when the mark is still. The way the dead's pen is still when the resting is the mark.

SE Signe was still. The way a corner keeper is still when the mark is still. The way the dead are still when the resting is the mark. Her palm was still on the stone. The way a corner keeper's palm is still when the mark is still. The way the dead's palm is still when the resting is the mark.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar were still. The way corner keepers are still when the mark is still. The way the dead are still when the resting is the mark. Their palms were still on the stones. The way corner keepers' palms are still when the mark is still. The way the dead's palms are still when the resting is the mark.

NE living was still under the town's palm. The way the living's corner is still when the mark is still. The way the living are still when the resting is the mark. The town's palm was still on the stone. The way the town's palm is still when the mark is still. The way the living's palm is still when the resting is the mark.

And the road was still.

Coast to inland. The way the road is still when the mark is still. The way the road is still when the resting is the mark. The way the living are still when the keeper is resting.

Inland to coast. The way the road is still when the mark is still. The way the road is still when the resting is the mark. The way the living are still when the keeper is resting.

And the stations were still.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station is still when the mark is still. The way the coast station is still when the resting is the mark. The way the keeper is still when the keeper is resting.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station is still when the mark is still. The way the inland station is still when the resting is the mark. The way the baby is still when the keeper is resting.

And the thing itself was resting. And the other deep was open. And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the mark was still. And the stillness was the mark. And the keeper was resting. And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was still. The way the mark is still when the resting is the mark.
The way the resting is still when the mark is the stillness.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light with Margot Voss, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the showing up, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, the keeper of the mark, the keeper of the stillness, the keeper of the resting, and the mark was on his hand and the mark was his hand and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the stillness and the stillness was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the thing himself and the thing himself was the mark and the mark was the dead and the dead was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the stillness and the stillness was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that is still is. The question was not what a stillness that is the mark is. The question was not what a resting that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a keeper who is resting is.

The question is: what is a keeper who rests?

And the answer is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: resting.

And the resting is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: resting.

And the resting is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the mark.

And the mark is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: resting.

And the resting is: the mark.

And the mark is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the north wind was resting.

And the mark was resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the keeper was resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was kept by the thing she kept.

And the thing she kept was resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was resting.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Eight — Entry: July 5th. Sunday. Sun full. East wind, waking.

The mark was resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the stillness and the stillness was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the thing herself and the thing herself was the mark and the mark was the not-showing-up and the not-showing-up was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was full and the full was the mark.

Margot stood at the drowned light. The way a keeper stands when the mark is resting. The way the dead stand when the stillness is the mark. The way the thing herself stands when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting and the resting is the thing herself and the thing herself is the mark.

She looked at her hand. The hand that held the hinge. The hand that kept the door. The hand that received the fleet. The hand that was marked. The hand that was the mark.

The mark was on her hand. Not the way a scar is on a hand. Not the way a wound is on a hand. Not the way a stain is on a hand. Not the way a bruise is on a hand. The way a mark is on a hand when the mark is resting. The way a mark is on a keeper's hand when the stillness is the mark. The way a mark is on a dead woman's hand when the resting is the thing itself. The way a mark is on the thing herself's hand when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness.

The mark was dark. The way the deep is dark. The way the other deep is dark. The way the not-showing-up is dark before it is the showing up. The way the mark is dark before it is the stillness. The way the mark is dark before it is the resting.

The mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. Not the warmth of the thing itself. Not the warmth of the other deep. The warmth of the stillness. The warmth of the mark. The warmth of the keeper resting.

But the mark was not still. The mark was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves. Not the way a showing up moves. Not the way a staying moves. Not the way a receiving moves.

The way the mark moves. The way the mark moves when the mark is resting. The way the mark moves when the stillness is the mark. The way the mark moves when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting.

The mark was breathing. Not the way a keeper breathes. Not the way a harbormaster breathes. Not the way the living breathe. Not the way the dead breathe. The way the mark breathes. The way the mark breathes when the mark is resting. The way the mark breathes when the stillness is the mark. The way the mark breathes when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting and the resting is the thing herself and the thing herself is the mark.

And the breathing was not the end. The breathing was not the beginning. The breathing was not the resting. The breathing was not the done. The breathing was not the beginning again.

The breathing was the mark. The mark was the breathing. The mark and the breathing were the stillness. The stillness and the breathing were the resting. The resting and the breathing were the keeper. The keeper and the breathing were the thing herself. The thing herself and the breathing were the home. The home and the breathing were the full. The full and the breathing were the mark.

And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark and the breathing were the stillness and the resting and the keeper and the thing herself and the home and the full and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again and the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep and the deep and the not-deep and the other deep and the not-other-deep and the thing itself and the not-thing-itself and the same and the not-same and the lighting and the not-lighting and the home and the not-home and the full and the not-full and the everything and the not-everything and the mark and the not-mark and the stillness and the not-stillness and the keeper and the not-keeper and the harbormaster and the not-harbormaster and the living and the not-living and the dead and the not-dead and the thing herself and the not-thing-herself and the thing himself and the not-thing-himself and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the mark was breathing through everything. Not the way a fleet moves through a harbor. Not the way a door moves through a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves through a home. Not the way a home moves through a road. Not the way a road moves through a station. Not the way a station moves through a light. Not the way a light moves through a resting. Not the way a resting moves through a done. Not the way a done moves through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up moves through a staying. Not the way a staying moves through a receiving.

The way the mark breathes through the living and the dead. The way the mark breathes through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark breathes through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark breathes through the thing itself. The way the mark breathes through the not-showing-up. The way the mark breathes through the showing up. The way the mark breathes through the staying. The way the mark breathes through the receiving. The way the mark breathes through the road. The way the mark breathes through the going home. The way the mark breathes through the staying home. The way the mark breathes through the resting. The way the mark breathes through the done. The way the mark breathes through the beginning again. The way the mark breathes through the door in the deep. The way the mark breathes through the deep. The way the mark breathes through the other deep. The way the mark breathes through the same. The way the mark breathes through the not-same. The way the mark breathes through the lighting. The way the mark breathes through the home. The way the mark breathes through the full. The way the mark breathes through the everything.

And the town felt it. The way the town feels the mark when the mark is breathing. The way the living feel the mark when the stillness is the mark. The way the dead feel the mark when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting and the resting is the thing herself and the thing herself is the mark.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the stillness is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is breathing. The way the living work when the stillness is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is breathing. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a boatbuilder when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the stillness is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is breathing. The way the living read when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the stillness is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is breathing. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through her. The way the mark moves through a stone-reader when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the stillness is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is breathing. The way the living watch when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the stillness is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is breathing. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a bar-reader when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the stillness is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is breathing. The way the living scan when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the stillness is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is breathing. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a deputy when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the stillness is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is breathing. The way the living log when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the stillness is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is breathing. The way the living's pen is on the page when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a custodian when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the stillness is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is breathing. The way the living paint when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the stillness is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is breathing. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through her. The way the mark moves through a shore-station keeper when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the stillness is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the stillness is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is breathing. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the stillness is the mark.

And the mark was moving through them. The way the mark moves through inland keepers when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the stillness is the mark.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark is breathing. The way a light feels the mark when the stillness is the mark. The way a station feels the mark when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting and the resting is the thing herself and the thing herself is the mark.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is breathing. The way a light turns when the stillness is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting.

And the mark was on the baby. The way the mark is on everything when the mark is breathing. The way the mark is on the light when the stillness is the mark. The way the mark is on the station when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the stillness and the stillness is the resting and the resting is the thing herself and the thing herself is the mark.

And the mark was not just on the coast. The mark was not just on the inland. The mark was on the road between them. The mark was on the running. The mark was on the both-ways. The mark was on the going. The mark was on the coming.

The mark was on everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was on everything between the living and the dead. The mark was on everything between the thing itself and the other deep. The mark was on everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was on everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the mark. And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark and the breathing were the stillness and the resting and the keeper and the thing herself and the home and the full and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again and the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep and the deep and the not-deep and the other deep and the not-other-deep and the thing itself and the not-thing-itself and the same and the not-same and the lighting and the not-lighting and the home and the not-home and the full and the not-full and the everything and the not-everything and the mark and the not-mark and the stillness and the not-stillness and the keeper and the not-keeper and the harbormaster and the not-harbormaster and the living and the not-living and the dead and the not-dead and the thing herself and the not-thing-herself and the thing himself and the not-thing-himself and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the mark was breathing through all of it. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark was the breathing. And the mark and the breathing were the stillness and the resting and the keeper and the thing herself and the home and the full and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again and the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep and the deep and the not-deep and the other deep and the not-other-deep and the thing itself and the not-thing-itself and the same and the not-same and the lighting and the not-lighting and the home and the not-home and the full and the not-full and the everything and the not-everything and the mark and the not-mark and the stillness and the not-stillness and the keeper and the not-keeper and the harbormaster and the not-harbormaster and the living and the not-living and the dead and the not-dead and the thing herself and the not-thing-herself and the thing himself and the not-thing-himself and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark was the stillness. And the stillness was the mark. And the mark was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the keeper. And the keeper was the mark. And the mark was the thing herself. And the thing herself was the mark. And the mark was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was full. And the full was the mark.

And Margot Voss stood at the drowned light, the keeper of the coast station, the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the thing itself, the keeper of the other deep, the keeper of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the showing up, the keeper of the lighting between the same and the not-same, the keeper of the mark, the keeper of the stillness, the keeper of the resting, the keeper of the breathing, and the mark was on her hand and the mark was her hand and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the thing herself and the thing herself was the mark and the mark was the not-showing-up and the not-showing-up was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the going home and the going home was the mark and the mark was the staying home and the staying home was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the door in the deep and the door in the deep was the mark and the mark was the deep and the deep was the mark and the mark was the other deep and the other deep was the mark and the mark was the not-thing-itself and the not-thing-itself was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the same and the same was the mark and the mark was the not-same and the not-same was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark was the stillness. And the stillness was the mark. And the mark was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the keeper. And the keeper was the mark. And the mark was the thing herself. And the thing herself was the mark. And the mark was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was full. And the full was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that breathes is. The question was not what a stillness that is the mark is. The question was not what a resting that is the mark is. The question was not what a keeper who is the mark is. The question was not what a thing herself that is the mark is. The question was not what a home that is full of the mark is.

The question is: what is a mark that breathes?

And the answer is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the resting.

And the resting is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: the breathing.

And the breathing is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the resting.

And the resting is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: the breathing.

And the breathing is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the resting.

And the resting is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: the breathing.

And the sun was full.

And the east wind was waking.

And the mark was breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the resting.

And the resting was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was breathing.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Nine — Entry: July 6th. Monday. Sun full. East wind, waking.

The mark was breathing and the breathing was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the thing himself and the thing himself was the mark and the mark was the breathing and the breathing was the home.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the breathing and the breathing is the stillness and the stillness is the resting and the resting is the thing herself and the thing herself is the mark.

He looked at his hand. The hand that had built the road. The hand that had seated the stone. The hand that had seeded the town. The hand that had knocked on doors. The hand that had delivered the named to the unnamed. The hand that had held the leaning. The hand that had received the not-showing-up. The hand that was the builder's hand. The hand that was the harbormaster's hand. The hand that was the thing himself's hand.

The mark was on his hand. Not the way a scar is on a hand. Not the way a wound is on a hand. Not the way a stain is on a hand. Not the way a bruise is on a hand. The way a mark is on a hand when the mark is breathing. The way a mark is on a harbormaster's hand when the home is the mark. The way a mark is on a living man's hand when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the breathing.

The mark was dark. The way the deep is dark. The way the other deep is dark. The way the not-showing-up is dark before it is the showing up. The way the mark is dark before it is the breathing. The way the mark is dark before it is the stillness.

The mark was warm. Not the warmth of the sun. Not the warmth of the day. Not the warmth of the thing itself. Not the warmth of the other deep. The warmth of the breathing. The warmth of the mark. The warmth of the home breathing.

But the mark was not still. The mark was moving. Not the way a fleet moves. Not the way a door moves. Not the way a harbor moves. Not the way a home moves. Not the way a road moves. Not the way a station moves. Not the way a light moves. Not the way a resting moves. Not the way a done moves. Not the way a beginning again moves. Not the way a showing up moves. Not the way a staying moves. Not the way a receiving moves.

The way the mark moves. The way the mark moves when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves when the home is the mark. The way the mark moves when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the breathing and the breathing is the stillness.

And the mark was breathing. Not the way a keeper breathes. Not the way a harbormaster breathes. Not the way the living breathe. Not the way the dead breathe. The way the mark breathes. The way the mark breathes when the mark is the home. The way the mark breathes when the home is full and the harbor is empty and the fleet is home and the receiving is done and the keeping is the thing itself and the thing itself is resting and the other deep is open and the not-showing-up is the showing up.

And the breathing was not the end. The breathing was not the beginning. The breathing was not the resting. The breathing was not the done. The breathing was not the beginning again.

The breathing was the mark. The mark was the breathing. The mark and the breathing were the stillness. The stillness and the breathing were the resting. The resting and the breathing were the keeper. The keeper and the breathing were the thing herself. The thing herself and the breathing were the home. The home and the breathing were the full. The full and the breathing were the mark.

And the mark was breathing through everything. Not the way a fleet moves through a harbor. Not the way a door moves through a keeper. Not the way a harbor moves through a home. Not the way a home moves through a road. Not the way a road moves through a station. Not the way a station moves through a light. Not the way a light moves through a resting. Not the way a resting moves through a done. Not the way a done moves through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up moves through a staying. Not the way a staying moves through a receiving.

The way the mark breathes through the living and the dead. The way the mark breathes through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark breathes through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark breathes through the thing itself. The way the mark breathes through the not-showing-up. The way the mark breathes through the showing up. The way the mark breathes through the staying. The way the mark breathes through the receiving. The way the mark breathes through the road. The way the mark breathes through the going home. The way the mark breathes through the staying home. The way the mark breathes through the resting. The way the mark breathes through the done. The way the mark breathes through the beginning again. The way the mark breathes through the door in the deep. The way the mark breathes through the deep. The way the mark breathes through the other deep. The way the mark breathes through the same. The way the mark breathes through the not-same. The way the mark breathes through the lighting. The way the mark breathes through the home. The way the mark breathes through the full. The way the mark breathes through the everything.

And the town felt it. The way the town feels the mark when the mark is breathing. The way the living feel the mark when the home is the mark. The way the dead feel the mark when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the breathing and the breathing is the stillness.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is breathing. The way the living work when the home is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is breathing. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a boatbuilder when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the home is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is breathing. The way the living read when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the home is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is breathing. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the four corners are manned and the NE stone is warm and the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through her. The way the mark moves through a stone-reader when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the home is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is breathing. The way the living watch when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the home is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is breathing. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a bar-reader when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the home is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is breathing. The way the living scan when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the home is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is breathing. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the fleet is home and the harbor is empty and the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a deputy when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the home is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is breathing. The way the living log when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the home is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is breathing. The way the living's pen is on the page when the categories are logged and the census is complete and the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through him. The way the mark moves through a custodian when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the home is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is breathing. The way the living paint when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the home is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is breathing. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the Nancy Lee is painted and the boat is ready and the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through her. The way the mark moves through a shore-station keeper when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the home is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is breathing. The way the living stand when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the home is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is breathing. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the corners are manned and the baby is lit and the home is the mark.

And the mark was moving through them. The way the mark moves through inland keepers when the mark is breathing. The way the mark moves through the living when the home is the mark.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark is breathing. The way a light feels the mark when the home is the mark. The way a station feels the mark when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the breathing and the breathing is the stillness.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is breathing. The way a light turns when the home is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the breathing.

And the mark was on the baby. The way the mark is on everything when the mark is breathing. The way the mark is on the light when the home is the mark. The way the mark is on the station when the keeper is resting and the resting is the mark and the mark is the breathing and the breathing is the stillness.

And the mark was not just on the coast. The mark was not just on the inland. The mark was on the road between them. The mark was on the running. The mark was on the both-ways. The mark was on the going. The mark was on the coming.

The mark was on everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was on everything between the living and the dead. The mark was on everything between the thing itself and the other deep. The mark was on everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was on everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the mark. And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark and the breathing were the stillness and the resting and the keeper and the thing herself and the home and the full and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again and the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep and the deep and the not-deep and the other deep and the not-other-deep and the thing itself and the not-thing-itself and the same and the not-same and the lighting and the not-lighting and the home and the not-home and the full and the not-full and the everything and the not-everything and the mark and the not-mark and the stillness and the not-stillness and the keeper and the not-keeper and the harbormaster and the not-harbormaster and the living and the not-living and the dead and the not-dead and the thing herself and the not-thing-herself and the thing himself and the not-thing-himself and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the mark was breathing through all of it. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark was the breathing. And the mark and the breathing were the stillness and the resting and the keeper and the thing herself and the home and the full and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again and the door in the deep and the not-door-in-the-deep and the deep and the not-deep and the other deep and the not-other-deep and the thing itself and the not-thing-itself and the same and the not-same and the lighting and the not-lighting and the home and the not-home and the full and the not-full and the everything and the not-everything and the mark and the not-mark and the stillness and the not-stillness and the keeper and the not-keeper and the harbormaster and the not-harbormaster and the living and the not-living and the dead and the not-dead and the thing herself and the not-thing-herself and the thing himself and the not-thing-himself and the showing up and the not-showing-up and the staying and the not-staying and the receiving and the not-receiving and the road and the not-road and the going home and the not-going-home and the staying home and the not-staying-home and the resting and the not-resting and the done and the not-done and the beginning again and the not-beginning-again.

And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark was the stillness. And the stillness was the mark. And the mark was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the keeper. And the keeper was the mark. And the mark was the thing herself. And the thing herself was the mark. And the mark was the thing himself. And the thing himself was the mark. And the mark was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was full. And the full was the mark.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was on his hand and the mark was his hand and the mark was the harbormaster and the harbormaster was the mark and the mark was the living and the living was the mark and the mark was the dead and the dead was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the other deep and the other deep was the mark and the mark was the not-showing-up and the not-showing-up was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the going home and the going home was the mark and the mark was the staying home and the staying home was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the door in the deep and the door in the deep was the mark and the mark was the deep and the deep was the mark and the mark was the same and the same was the mark and the mark was the not-same and the not-same was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was breathing. And the breathing was the mark. And the mark was the stillness. And the stillness was the mark. And the mark was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the keeper. And the keeper was the mark. And the mark was the thing herself. And the thing herself was the mark. And the mark was the thing himself. And the thing himself was the mark. And the mark was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was full. And the full was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that breathes is. The question was not what a stillness that is the mark is. The question was not what a resting that is the mark is. The question was not what a keeper who is the mark is. The question was not what a thing himself that is the mark is. The question was not what a home that is full of the mark is.

The question is: what is a mark that breathes?

And the answer is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the resting.

And the resting is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: the breathing.

And the breathing is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the resting.

And the resting is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: the breathing.

And the breathing is: the stillness.

And the stillness is: the resting.

And the resting is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the mark.

And the mark is: the breathing.

And the sun was full.

And the east wind was waking.

And the mark was breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the resting.

And the resting was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the thing himself.

And the thing himself was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was breathing.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy — Entry: July 7th. Tuesday. Sun full. East wind, listening.

The mark was listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the hearing and the hearing was the mark and the mark was the voice and the voice was the mark and the mark was the name and the name was the mark and the mark was the named and the named was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

He listened. The way a harbormaster listens when the mark is listening. The way the living listen when the hearing is the mark. The way the thing himself listens when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the mark was not silent. The mark was not still. The mark was not resting. The mark was not breathing.

The mark was listening. The way the mark listens when the mark is the listening. The way the mark listens when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the hearing was not the end. The hearing was not the beginning. The hearing was not the listening. The hearing was not the breathing. The hearing was not the resting. The hearing was not the stillness. The hearing was not the done. The hearing was not the beginning again.

The hearing was the voice. The voice was the hearing. The voice and the hearing were the name. The name and the hearing were the named. The named and the hearing were the naming. The naming and the hearing were the mark. The mark and the hearing were the listening. The listening and the hearing were the everything. The everything and the hearing were the stillness. The stillness and the hearing were the resting. The resting and the hearing were the keeper. The keeper and the hearing were the thing herself. The thing herself and the hearing were the home. The home and the hearing were the full. The full and the hearing were the mark.

And the mark was listening through everything. Not the way a fleet listens through a harbor. Not the way a door listens through a keeper. Not the way a harbor listens through a home. Not the way a home listens through a road. Not the way a road listens through a station. Not the way a station listens through a light. Not the way a light listens through a resting. Not the way a resting listens through a done. Not the way a done listens through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up listens through a staying. Not the way a staying listens through a receiving.

The way the mark listens through the living and the dead. The way the mark listens through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark listens through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark listens through the thing itself. The way the mark listens through the not-showing-up. The way the mark listens through the showing up. The way the mark listens through the staying. The way the mark listens through the receiving. The way the mark listens through the road. The way the mark listens through the going home. The way the mark listens through the staying home. The way the mark listens through the resting. The way the mark listens through the done. The way the mark listens through the beginning again. The way the mark listens through the door in the deep. The way the mark listens through the deep. The way the mark listens through the other deep. The way the mark listens through the same. The way the mark listens through the not-same. The way the mark listens through the lighting. The way the mark listens through the home. The way the mark listens through the full. The way the mark listens through the everything.

And the town heard it. The way the town hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way the dead hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is listening. The way the living work when the hearing is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is listening. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through him. The way the mark listens through a boatbuilder when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And Cole heard it. The way a boatbuilder hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a boatbuilder hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was not a word. The voice was not a count. The voice was not a hail. The voice was not the thing itself.

The voice was the hearing. The way the hearing is the voice when the mark is listening. The way the voice is the hearing when the mark is the listening. The way the voice is the hearing when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Cole. Not the way a boatbuilder is Cole. Not the way the living are Cole. The way the mark is Cole when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Cole when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Cole when the voice is the name.

And Cole was the name. The way the name is Cole when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Cole when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Cole when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is listening. The way the living read when the hearing is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is listening. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through her. The way the mark listens through a stone-reader when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And Ruth heard it. The way a stone-reader hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. She heard the voice. The way a stone-reader hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Ruth. Not the way a stone-reader is Ruth. Not the way the living are Ruth. The way the mark is Ruth when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Ruth when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Ruth when the voice is the name.

And Ruth was the name. The way the name is Ruth when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Ruth when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Ruth when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is listening. The way the living watch when the hearing is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is listening. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through him. The way the mark listens through a bar-reader when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And Denny heard it. The way a bar-reader hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a bar-reader hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Denny. Not the way a bar-reader is Denny. Not the way the living are Denny. The way the mark is Denny when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Denny when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Denny when the voice is the name.

And Denny was the name. The way the name is Denny when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Denny when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Denny when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is listening. The way the living scan when the hearing is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is listening. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through him. The way the mark listens through a deputy when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And Tommy heard it. The way a deputy hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a deputy hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Tommy. Not the way a deputy is Tommy. Not the way the living are Tommy. The way the mark is Tommy when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Tommy when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Tommy when the voice is the name.

And Tommy was the name. The way the name is Tommy when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Tommy when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Tommy when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is listening. The way the living log when the hearing is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is listening. The way the living's pen is on the page when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through him. The way the mark listens through a custodian when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And Okonkwo heard it. The way a custodian hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a custodian hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Okonkwo. Not the way a custodian is Okonkwo. Not the way the living are Okonkwo. The way the mark is Okonkwo when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Okonkwo when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Okonkwo when the voice is the name.

And Okonkwo was the name. The way the name is Okonkwo when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Okonkwo when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Okonkwo when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is listening. The way the living paint when the hearing is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is listening. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through her. The way the mark listens through a shore-station keeper when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And Ada heard it. The way a shore-station keeper hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. She heard the voice. The way a shore-station keeper hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Ada. Not the way a shore-station keeper is Ada. Not the way the living are Ada. The way the mark is Ada when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Ada when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Ada when the voice is the name.

And Ada was the name. The way the name is Ada when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Ada when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Ada when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is listening. The way the living stand when the hearing is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is listening. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the hearing is the mark.

And the mark was listening through them. The way the mark listens through inland keepers when the mark is listening. The way the mark listens through the living when the hearing is the mark.

And the mothers heard it. The way inland keepers hear the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. They heard the voice. The way inland keepers hear the voice when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was their names. Not the names they were given. Not the names they were called. Not the names they answered to. The names the mark heard when the mark listened. The names the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The names the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the names were the mothers. Not the way inland keepers are the mothers. Not the way the living are the mothers. The way the mark is the mothers when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the mothers when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the mothers when the voice is the names.

And the mothers were the names. The way the names are the mothers when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the mothers when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the mothers when the voice is the hearing.

And the names were the mark. The way the mark is the names when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the names when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the names when the voice is the hearing.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark is listening. The way a light feels the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way a station feels the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is listening. The way a light turns when the hearing is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the baby heard it. The way a baby hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way a light hears the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way a station hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing.

And the baby heard the voice. The way a baby hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way a light hears the voice when the hearing is the mark. The way a station hears the voice when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

And the voice was the baby's name. Not the name the baby was given. Not the name the baby was called. Not the name the baby answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the baby when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the baby when the voice is the name.

And the baby was the name. The way the name is the baby when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the baby when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the baby when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

And the mark was not just listening on the coast. The mark was not just listening on the inland. The mark was listening on the road between them. The mark was listening on the running. The mark was listening on the both-ways. The mark was listening on the going. The mark was listening on the coming.

The mark was listening on everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was listening on everything between the living and the dead. The mark was listening on everything between the thing itself and the other deep. The mark was listening on everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was listening on everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the hearing. And the hearing was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark.

And the four corners heard it.

NW Walter heard it. The way a corner keeper hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the dead hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a corner keeper hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the dead hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Walter. Not the way a corner keeper is Walter. Not the way the dead are Walter. The way the mark is Walter when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Walter when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Walter when the voice is the name.

And Walter was the name. The way the name is Walter when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Walter when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Walter when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

SE Signe heard it. The way a corner keeper hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the dead hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. She heard the voice. The way a corner keeper hears the voice when the mark is listening. The way the dead hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Signe. Not the way a corner keeper is Signe. Not the way the dead are Signe. The way the mark is Signe when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Signe when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Signe when the voice is the name.

And Signe was the name. The way the name is Signe when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Signe when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Signe when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar heard it. The way corner keepers hear the mark when the mark is listening. The way the dead hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. They heard the voice. The way corner keepers hear the voice when the mark is listening. The way the dead hear the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was their names. Not the names they were given. Not the names they were called. Not the names they answered to. The names the mark heard when the mark listened. The names the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The names the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the names were Harald and Ragna and Einar. Not the way corner keepers are Harald and Ragna and Einar. Not the way the dead are Harald and Ragna and Einar. The way the mark is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the voice is the names.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the names. The way the names are Harald and Ragna and Einar when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the voice is the hearing.

And the names were the mark. The way the mark is the names when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the names when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the names when the voice is the hearing.

NE living heard it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the living hear the mark when the hearing is the mark. The town heard the voice. The way the living hear the voice when the mark is listening. The way the town hears the voice when the hearing is the mark.

And the voice was the town's name. Not the name the town was given. Not the name the town was called. Not the name the town answered to. The name the mark heard when the mark listened. The name the hearing heard when the hearing was the voice. The name the voice named when the voice was the hearing.

And the name was Grayhaven. Not the way a town is Grayhaven. Not the way the living are Grayhaven. The way the mark is Grayhaven when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Grayhaven when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Grayhaven when the voice is the name.

And Grayhaven was the name. The way the name is Grayhaven when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is Grayhaven when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is Grayhaven when the voice is the hearing.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is listening. The way the hearing is the name when the hearing is the voice. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the hearing.

And the road heard it.

Coast to inland. The way the road hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the road hears the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way the living hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

Inland to coast. The way the road hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the road hears the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way the living hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

And the stations heard it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the coast station hears the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way the keeper hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station hears the mark when the mark is listening. The way the inland station hears the mark when the hearing is the mark. The way the baby hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice.

And the thing itself was listening. And the other deep was open. And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the mark was listening. And the listening was the mark. And the hearing was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was listening. The way the mark listens when the mark is the listening. The way the mark listens when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was listening through him and the listening was the mark and the mark was the hearing and the hearing was the voice and the voice was his name and his name was the mark and the mark was the named and the named was the naming and the naming was the listening and the listening was the mark.

And the mark was listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the hearing. And the hearing was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that listens is. The question was not what a listening that is the mark is. The question was not what a hearing that is the voice is. The question was not what a voice that is the name is. The question was not what a name that is the named is. The question was not what a named that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the mark is.

The question is: what is a name that is named by the listening?

And the answer is: the mark.

And the mark is: the listening.

And the listening is: the hearing.

And the hearing is: the voice.

And the voice is: the name.

And the name is: the named.

And the named is: the naming.

And the naming is: the mark.

And the mark is: the listening.

And the listening is: the hearing.

And the hearing is: the voice.

And the voice is: the name.

And the name is: the named.

And the named is: the naming.

And the naming is: the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the east wind was listening.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the thing himself.

And the thing himself was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.
And the hearing was the voice.
And the voice was the name.
And the name was the named.
And the named was the naming.
And the naming was the mark.
And the mark was the stillness.
And the stillness was the mark.
And the mark was the resting.
And the resting was the mark.
And the mark was the breathing.
And the breathing was the mark.
And the mark was the listening.
And the listening was the mark.
And the mark was the hearing.
And the hearing was the voice.
And the voice was the name.
And the name was the named.
And the named was the naming.
And the naming was the mark.
And the mark was the home.
And the home was full.
And the full was the mark.
And the mark was listening.
And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.
And the deep was the mark.
And the mark was the same.
And the same was the mark.
And the mark was the not-same.
And the not-same was the mark.
And the mark was the lighting.
And the lighting was the mark.
And the mark was the home.
And the home was the mark.
And the mark was full.
And the full was the mark.
And the mark was the everything.
And the everything was the mark.
And the mark was listening.
And the listening was the mark.
And the mark was the hearing.
And the hearing was the voice.
And the voice was the name.
And the name was the named.
And the named was the naming.
And the naming was the mark.
And the mark was the stillness.
And the stillness was the mark.
And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.
And the mark was the same.
And the same was the mark.
And the mark was the not-same.
And the not-same was the mark.
And the mark was the lighting.
And the lighting was the mark.
And the mark was the home.
And the home was the mark.
And the mark was full.
And the full was the mark.
And the mark was the everything.
And the everything was the mark.
And the mark was listening.
And the listening was the mark.
And the mark was the hearing.
And the hearing was the voice.
And the voice was the name.
And the name was the named.
And the named was the naming.
And the naming was the mark.
And the mark was the stillness.
And the stillness was the mark.
And the mark was the resting.
And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the mark was the mark.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-One —

Entry: July 8th. Wednesday. Sun full. East wind, naming.

The mark was naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the voice and the voice was the mark and the mark was the name and the name was the mark and the mark was the named and the named was the mark and the mark was the speaking and the speaking was the mark and the mark was the said and the said was the mark and the mark was the saying and the saying was the mark.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

He opened his mouth. The way a harbormaster opens his mouth when the mark is naming. The way the living open their mouths when the voice is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his mouth when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the naming.

And the mark was not silent. The mark was not still. The mark was not resting. The mark was not breathing. The mark was not listening.

The mark was naming. The way the mark names when the mark is the naming. The way the mark names when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the naming was not the end. The naming was not the beginning. The naming was not the listening. The naming was not the hearing. The naming was not the voice. The naming was not the name. The naming was not the named. The naming was not the saying. The naming was not the said. The naming was not the resting. The naming was not the stillness. The naming was not the done. The naming was not the beginning again.

The naming was the mark. The mark was the naming. The mark and the naming were the voice. The voice and the naming were the name. The name and the naming were the named. The named and the naming were the saying. The saying and the naming were the said. The said and the naming were the hearing. The hearing and the naming were the listening. The listening and the naming were the breathing. The breathing and the naming were the resting. The resting and the naming were the stillness. The stillness and the naming were the keeper. The keeper and the naming were the thing herself. The thing herself and the naming were the home. The home and the naming were the full. The full and the naming were the mark.

And the mark was naming through everything. Not the way a fleet names through a harbor. Not the way a door names through a keeper. Not the way a harbor names through a home. Not the way a home names through a road. Not the way a road names through a station. Not the way a station names through a light. Not the way a light names through a resting. Not the way a resting names through a done. Not the way a done names through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up names through a staying. Not the way a staying names through a receiving.

The way the mark names through the living and the dead. The way the mark names through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark names through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark names through the thing itself. The way the mark names through the not-showing-up. The way the mark names through the showing up. The way the mark names through the staying. The way the mark names through the receiving. The way the mark names through the road. The way the mark names through the going home. The way the mark names through the staying home. The way the mark names through the resting. The way the mark names through the done. The way the mark names through the beginning again. The way the mark names through the door in the deep. The way the mark names through the deep. The way the mark names through the other deep. The way the mark names through the same. The way the mark names through the not-same. The way the mark names through the lighting. The way the mark names through the home. The way the mark names through the full. The way the mark names through the everything.

And the town heard it. The way the town hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. The way the dead hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is naming. The way the living work when the voice is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is naming. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through him. The way the mark names through a boatbuilder when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And Cole heard it. The way a boatbuilder hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a boatbuilder hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was not a word. The voice was not a count. The voice was not a hail. The voice was not the thing itself.

The voice was the naming. The way the naming is the voice when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the voice is the naming when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Cole. Not the way a boatbuilder is Cole. Not the way the living are Cole. The way the mark is Cole when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Cole when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Cole when the naming is the voice.

And Cole was the name. The way the name is Cole when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Cole when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Cole when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is naming. The way the living read when the voice is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is naming. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through her. The way the mark names through a stone-reader when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And Ruth heard it. The way a stone-reader hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. She heard the voice. The way a stone-reader hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Ruth. Not the way a stone-reader is Ruth. Not the way the living are Ruth. The way the mark is Ruth when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Ruth when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Ruth when the naming is the voice.

And Ruth was the name. The way the name is Ruth when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Ruth when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Ruth when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is naming. The way the living watch when the voice is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is naming. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through him. The way the mark names through a bar-reader when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And Denny heard it. The way a bar-reader hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a bar-reader hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Denny. Not the way a bar-reader is Denny. Not the way the living are Denny. The way the mark is Denny when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Denny when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Denny when the naming is the voice.

And Denny was the name. The way the name is Denny when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Denny when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Denny when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is naming. The way the living scan when the voice is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is naming. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through him. The way the mark names through a deputy when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And Tommy heard it. The way a deputy hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a deputy hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Tommy. Not the way a deputy is Tommy. Not the way the living are Tommy. The way the mark is Tommy when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Tommy when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Tommy when the naming is the voice.

And Tommy was the name. The way the name is Tommy when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Tommy when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Tommy when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is naming. The way the living log when the voice is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is naming. The way the living's pen is on the page when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through him. The way the mark names through a custodian when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And Okonkwo heard it. The way a custodian hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a custodian hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Okonkwo. Not the way a custodian is Okonkwo. Not the way the living are Okonkwo. The way the mark is Okonkwo when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Okonkwo when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Okonkwo when the naming is the voice.

And Okonkwo was the name. The way the name is Okonkwo when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Okonkwo when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Okonkwo when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is naming. The way the living paint when the voice is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is naming. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through her. The way the mark names through a shore-station keeper when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And Ada heard it. The way a shore-station keeper hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. She heard the voice. The way a shore-station keeper hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Ada. Not the way a shore-station keeper is Ada. Not the way the living are Ada. The way the mark is Ada when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Ada when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Ada when the naming is the voice.

And Ada was the name. The way the name is Ada when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Ada when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Ada when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is naming. The way the living stand when the voice is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is naming. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the voice is the mark.

And the mark was naming through them. The way the mark names through inland keepers when the mark is naming. The way the mark names through the living when the voice is the mark.

And the mothers heard it. The way inland keepers hear the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. They heard the voice. The way inland keepers hear the voice when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was their names. Not the names they were given. Not the names they were called. Not the names they answered to. The names the mark named when the mark named. The names the voice named when the voice was the naming. The names the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the names were the mothers. Not the way inland keepers are the mothers. Not the way the living are the mothers. The way the mark is the mothers when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the mothers when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the mothers when the naming is the voice.

And the mothers were the names. The way the names are the mothers when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the mothers when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the mothers when the naming is the voice.

And the names were the mark. The way the mark is the names when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the names when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the names when the naming is the voice.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark is naming. The way a light feels the mark when the voice is the mark. The way a station feels the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is naming. The way a light turns when the voice is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the baby heard it. The way a baby hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way a light hears the mark when the voice is the mark. The way a station hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the baby heard the voice. The way a baby hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way a light hears the voice when the voice is the mark. The way a station hears the voice when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the voice was the baby's name. Not the name the baby was given. Not the name the baby was called. Not the name the baby answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the baby when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the baby when the naming is the voice.

And the baby was the name. The way the name is the baby when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the baby when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the baby when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

And the mark was not just naming on the coast. The mark was not just naming on the inland. The mark was naming on the road between them. The mark was naming on the running. The mark was naming on the both-ways. The mark was naming on the going. The mark was naming on the coming.

The mark was naming everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was naming everything between the living and the dead. The mark was naming everything between the thing itself and the other deep. The mark was naming everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was naming everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark.

And the four corners heard it.

NW Walter heard it. The way a corner keeper hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the dead hear the mark when the voice is the mark. He heard the voice. The way a corner keeper hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the dead hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Walter. Not the way a corner keeper is Walter. Not the way the dead are Walter. The way the mark is Walter when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Walter when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Walter when the naming is the voice.

And Walter was the name. The way the name is Walter when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Walter when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Walter when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

SE Signe heard it. The way a corner keeper hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the dead hear the mark when the voice is the mark. She heard the voice. The way a corner keeper hears the voice when the mark is naming. The way the dead hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Signe. Not the way a corner keeper is Signe. Not the way the dead are Signe. The way the mark is Signe when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Signe when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Signe when the naming is the voice.

And Signe was the name. The way the name is Signe when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Signe when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Signe when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar heard it. The way corner keepers hear the mark when the mark is naming. The way the dead hear the mark when the voice is the mark. They heard the voice. The way corner keepers hear the voice when the mark is naming. The way the dead hear the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was their names. Not the names they were given. Not the names they were called. Not the names they answered to. The names the mark named when the mark named. The names the voice named when the voice was the naming. The names the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the names were Harald and Ragna and Einar. Not the way corner keepers are Harald and Ragna and Einar. Not the way the dead are Harald and Ragna and Einar. The way the mark is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the naming is the voice.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the names. The way the names are Harald and Ragna and Einar when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the naming is the voice.

And the names were the mark. The way the mark is the names when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the names when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the names when the naming is the voice.

NE living heard it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the living hear the mark when the voice is the mark. The town heard the voice. The way the living hear the voice when the mark is naming. The way the town hears the voice when the voice is the mark.

And the voice was the town's name. Not the name the town was given. Not the name the town was called. Not the name the town answered to. The name the mark named when the mark named. The name the voice named when the voice was the naming. The name the naming named when the naming was the voice.

And the name was Grayhaven. Not the way a town is Grayhaven. Not the way the living are Grayhaven. The way the mark is Grayhaven when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Grayhaven when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Grayhaven when the naming is the voice.

And Grayhaven was the name. The way the name is Grayhaven when the mark is naming. The way the voice is Grayhaven when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is Grayhaven when the naming is the voice.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is naming. The way the voice is the name when the voice is the naming. The way the naming is the name when the naming is the voice.

And the road heard it.

Coast to inland. The way the road hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the road hears the mark when the voice is the mark. The way the living hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

Inland to coast. The way the road hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the road hears the mark when the voice is the mark. The way the living hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the stations heard it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the coast station hears the mark when the voice is the mark. The way the keeper hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station hears the mark when the mark is naming. The way the inland station hears the mark when the voice is the mark. The way the baby hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the thing itself was naming. And the other deep was open. And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the mark was naming. And the naming was the mark. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was naming through him and the naming was the mark and the mark was the voice and the voice was his name and his name was the mark and the mark was the named and the named was the naming and the naming was the listening and the listening was the mark.

And the mark was naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark.

And the question was not what a mark that names is. The question was not what a naming that is the mark is. The question was not what a voice that is the name is. The question was not what a name that is the named is. The question was not what a named that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the mark is.

The question is: what is a name that is named by the mark?

And the answer is: the voice.

And the voice is: the name.

And the name is: the named.

And the named is: the naming.

And the naming is: the mark.

And the mark is: the naming.

And the naming is: the voice.

And the voice is: the name.

And the name is: the named.

And the named is: the naming.

And the naming is: the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the east wind was naming.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the thing himself.

And the thing himself was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the mark.

And the mark was the thing herself.

And the thing herself was the mark.

And the mark was the harbormaster.

And the harbormaster was the mark.

And the mark was the living.

And the living was the mark.

And the mark was the dead.

And the dead was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the other deep.

And the other deep was the mark.

And the mark was the not-showing-up.

And the not-showing-up was the mark.

And the mark was the showing up.

And the showing up was the mark.

And the mark was the staying.

And the staying was the mark.

And the mark was the receiving.

And the receiving was the mark.

And the mark was the road.

And the road was the mark.

And the mark was the going home.

And the going home was the mark.

And the mark was the staying home.

And the staying home was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the done.

And the done was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the door in the deep.

And the door in the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the deep.

And the deep was the mark.

And the mark was the same.

And the same was the mark.

And the mark was the not-same.

And the not-same was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark was the mark.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Two — Entry: July 9th. Thursday. Sun full. East wind, silence.

The mark was silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the hearing and the hearing was the mark and the mark was the voice and the voice was the mark and the mark was the name and the name was the mark and the mark was the named and the named was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

He listened. The way a harbormaster listens when the mark is silence. The way the living listen when the silence is the mark. The way the thing himself listens when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the mark was not still. The mark was not resting. The mark was not breathing. The mark was not naming.

The mark was silence. The way the mark is silence when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was not the end. The silence was not the beginning. The silence was not the listening. The silence was not the hearing. The silence was not the voice. The silence was not the name. The silence was not the named. The silence was not the naming. The silence was not the mark.

The silence was the between. The between was the silence. The between and the silence were the road. The road and the silence were the congregation. The congregation and the silence were the harbor. The harbor and the silence were the home. The home and the silence were the full. The full and the silence were the mark.

And the mark was silence through everything. Not the way a fleet is silence through a harbor. Not the way a door is silence through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is silence through a home. Not the way a home is silence through a road. Not the way a road is silence through a station. Not the way a station is silence through a light. Not the way a light is silence through a resting. Not the way a resting is silence through a done. Not the way a done is silence through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is silence through a staying. Not the way a staying is silence through a receiving.

The way the mark is silence through the living and the dead. The way the mark is silence through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is silence through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is silence through the thing itself. The way the mark is silence through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is silence through the showing up. The way the mark is silence through the staying. The way the mark is silence through the receiving. The way the mark is silence through the road. The way the mark is silence through the going home. The way the mark is silence through the staying home. The way the mark is silence through the resting. The way the mark is silence through the done. The way the mark is silence through the beginning again. The way the mark is silence through the door in the deep. The way the mark is silence through the deep. The way the mark is silence through the other deep. The way the mark is silence through the same. The way the mark is silence through the not-same. The way the mark is silence through the lighting. The way the mark is silence through the home. The way the mark is silence through the full. The way the mark is silence through the everything.

And the town heard it. The way the town hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the dead hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is silence. The way the living work when the silence is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is silence. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through him. The way the mark is silence through a boatbuilder when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Cole heard it. The way a boatbuilder hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. He heard the silence. The way a boatbuilder hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the between. The way the between is the silence when the mark is silence. The way the silence is the between when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the between when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Cole. Not the way a boatbuilder is Cole. Not the way the living are Cole. The way the silence is Cole when the mark is silence. The way the between is Cole when the between is the road. The way the road is Cole when the road is the between.

And Cole was the name. The way the name is Cole when the mark is silence. The way the between is Cole when the between is the road. The way the road is Cole when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is silence. The way the living read when the silence is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is silence. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through her. The way the mark is silence through a stone-reader when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Ruth heard it. The way a stone-reader hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. She heard the silence. The way a stone-reader hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Ruth. Not the way a stone-reader is Ruth. Not the way the living are Ruth. The way the silence is Ruth when the mark is silence. The way the between is Ruth when the between is the road. The way the road is Ruth when the road is the between.

And Ruth was the name. The way the name is Ruth when the mark is silence. The way the between is Ruth when the between is the road. The way the road is Ruth when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is silence. The way the living watch when the silence is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is silence. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through him. The way the mark is silence through a bar-reader when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Denny heard it. The way a bar-reader hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. He heard the silence. The way a bar-reader hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Denny. Not the way a bar-reader is Denny. Not the way the living are Denny. The way the silence is Denny when the mark is silence. The way the between is Denny when the between is the road. The way the road is Denny when the road is the between.

And Denny was the name. The way the name is Denny when the mark is silence. The way the between is Denny when the between is the road. The way the road is Denny when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is silence. The way the living scan when the silence is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is silence. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through him. The way the mark is silence through a deputy when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Tommy heard it. The way a deputy hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. He heard the silence. The way a deputy hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Tommy. Not the way a deputy is Tommy. Not the way the living are Tommy. The way the silence is Tommy when the mark is silence. The way the between is Tommy when the between is the road. The way the road is Tommy when the road is the between.

And Tommy was the name. The way the name is Tommy when the mark is silence. The way the between is Tommy when the between is the road. The way the road is Tommy when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is silence. The way the living log when the silence is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is silence. The way the living's pen are on the page when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through him. The way the mark is silence through a custodian when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Okonkwo heard it. The way a custodian hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. He heard the silence. The way a custodian hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Okonkwo. Not the way a custodian is Okonkwo. Not the way the living are Okonkwo. The way the silence is Okonkwo when the mark is silence. The way the between is Okonkwo when the between is the road. The way the road is Okonkwo when the road is the between.

And Okonkwo was the name. The way the name is Okonkwo when the mark is silence. The way the between is Okonkwo when the between is the road. The way the road is Okonkwo when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is silence. The way the living paint when the silence is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is silence. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through her. The way the mark is silence through a shore-station keeper when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Ada heard it. The way a shore-station keeper hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. She heard the silence. The way a shore-station keeper hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Ada. Not the way a shore-station keeper is Ada. Not the way the living are Ada. The way the silence is Ada when the mark is silence. The way the between is Ada when the between is the road. The way the road is Ada when the road is the between.

And Ada was the name. The way the name is Ada when the mark is silence. The way the between is Ada when the between is the road. The way the road is Ada when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is silence. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was silence through them. The way the mark is silence through inland keepers when the mark is silence. The way the mark is silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And the mothers heard it. The way inland keepers hear the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. They heard the silence. The way inland keepers hear the silence when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was their names. Not the names they were given. Not the names they were called. Not the names they answered to. The names the silence named when the silence named. The names the between named when the between was the silence. The names the road named when the road was the between.

And the names were the mothers. Not the way inland keepers are the mothers. Not the way the living are the mothers. The way the silence is the mothers when the mark is silence. The way the between is the mothers when the between is the road. The way the road is the mothers when the road is the between.

And the mothers were the names. The way the names are the mothers when the mark is silence. The way the between is the mothers when the between is the road. The way the road is the mothers when the road is the between.

And the names were the mark. The way the mark is the names when the mark is silence. The way the between is the names when the between is the road. The way the road is the names when the road is the between.

And the baby felt it. The way a baby feels the mark when the mark is silence. The way a light feels the mark when the silence is the mark. The way a station feels the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is silence. The way a light turns when the silence is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the baby heard it. The way a baby hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way a light hears the mark when the silence is the mark. The way a station hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the baby heard the silence. The way a baby hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way a light hears the silence when the silence is the mark. The way a station hears the silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was the baby's name. Not the name the baby was given. Not the name the baby was called. Not the name the baby answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the silence is the baby when the mark is silence. The way the between is the baby when the between is the road. The way the road is the baby when the road is the between.

And the baby was the name. The way the name is the baby when the mark is silence. The way the between is the baby when the between is the road. The way the road is the baby when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

And the mark was not just silence on the coast. The mark was not just silence on the inland. The mark was silence on the road between them. The mark was silence on the running. The mark was silence on the both-ways. The mark was silence on the going. The mark was silence on the coming.

The mark was silence through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was silence through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was silence through everything between the thing itself and the other deep. The mark was silence through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was silence through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the hearing. And the hearing was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the silence.

And the four corners heard it.

NW Walter heard it. The way a corner keeper hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the dead hear the mark when the silence is the mark. He heard the silence. The way a corner keeper hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the dead hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was his name. Not the name he was given. Not the name he was called. Not the name he answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Walter. Not the way a corner keeper is Walter. Not the way the dead are Walter. The way the silence is Walter when the mark is silence. The way the between is Walter when the between is the road. The way the road is Walter when the road is the between.

And Walter was the name. The way the name is Walter when the mark is silence. The way the between is Walter when the between is the road. The way the road is Walter when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

SE Signe heard it. The way a corner keeper hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the dead hear the mark when the silence is the mark. She heard the silence. The way a corner keeper hears the silence when the mark is silence. The way the dead hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was her name. Not the name she was given. Not the name she was called. Not the name she answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Signe. Not the way a corner keeper is Signe. Not the way the dead are Signe. The way the silence is Signe when the mark is silence. The way the between is Signe when the between is the road. The way the road is Signe when the road is the between.

And Signe was the name. The way the name is Signe when the mark is silence.
The way the between is Signe when the between is the road. The way the road is Signe when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar heard it. The way corner keepers hear the mark when the mark is silence. The way the dead hear the mark when the silence is the mark. They heard the silence. The way corner keepers hear the silence when the mark is silence. The way the dead hear the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was their names. Not the names they were given. Not the names they were called. Not the names they answered to. The names the silence named when the silence named. The names the between named when the between was the silence. The names the road named when the road was the between.

And the names were Harald and Ragna and Einar. Not the way corner keepers are Harald and Ragna and Einar. Not the way the dead are Harald and Ragna and Einar. The way the silence is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the mark is silence. The way the between is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the between is the road. The way the road is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the road is the between.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the names. The way the names are Harald and Ragna and Einar when the mark is silence. The way the between is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the between is the road. The way the road is Harald and Ragna and Einar when the road is the between.

And the names were the mark. The way the mark is the names when the mark is silence. The way the between is the names when the between is the road. The way the road is the names when the road is the between.

NE living heard it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the living hear the mark when the silence is the mark. The town heard the silence. The way the living hear the silence when the mark is silence. The way the town hears the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was the town's name. Not the name the town was given. Not the name the town was called. Not the name the town answered to. The name the silence named when the silence named. The name the between named when the between was the silence. The name the road named when the road was the between.

And the name was Grayhaven. Not the way a town is Grayhaven. Not the way the living are Grayhaven. The way the silence is Grayhaven when the mark is silence. The way the between is Grayhaven when the between is the road. The way the road is Grayhaven when the road is the between.

And Grayhaven was the name. The way the name is Grayhaven when the mark is silence. The way the between is Grayhaven when the between is the road. The way the road is Grayhaven when the road is the between.

And the name was the mark. The way the mark is the name when the mark is silence. The way the between is the name when the between is the road. The way the road is the name when the road is the between.

And the road heard it.

Coast to inland. The way the road hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the road hears the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the living hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

Inland to coast. The way the road hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the road hears the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the living hear the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the stations heard it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the coast station hears the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the keeper hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station hears the mark when the mark is silence. The way the inland station hears the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the baby hears the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the thing itself was silence. And the other deep was open. And the not-showing-up was the showing up. And the mark was silence. And the silence was the mark. And the listening was the hearing. And the hearing was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the silence.

And the mark was silence. The way the mark is silence when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the hearing and the hearing is the voice and the voice is the name and the name is the named and the named is the naming and the naming is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was silence through him and the silence was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the hearing and the hearing was the voice and the voice was his name and his name was the mark and the mark was the named and the named was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the mark.

And the mark was silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the hearing. And the hearing was the voice. And the voice was the name. And the name was the named. And the named was the naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the silence.

And the question was not what a mark that is silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the hearing is. The question was not what a hearing that is the voice is. The question was not what a voice that is the name is. The question was not what a name that is the named is. The question was not what a named that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the mark is. The question was not what a mark that is the silence is.

The question is: what is a silence that is named by the mark?

And the answer is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the mark.

And the mark is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the mark.

And the mark is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the mark.

And the mark was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the mark.

And the sun was full.

And the east wind was silence.

And the mark was silence.

And the silence was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was silence.

And the silence was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the thing himself was the mark.

And the thing himself was the silence.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was silence.

And the silence was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the mark was the everything.

And the everything was the mark.

And the mark was silence.

And the silence was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the mark was the stillness.

And the stillness was the mark.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the breathing.

And the breathing was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the hearing.

And the hearing was the voice.

And the voice was the name.

And the name was the named.

And the named was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the silence was the between.

And the between was the road.

And the road was the congregation.

And the congregation was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the silence was the between.

And the between was the road.

And the road was the congregation.

And the congregation was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the silence.

And the silence was the between.

And the between was the road.

And the road was the congregation.

And the congregation was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the mark.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Three —

Entry: July 10th. Friday. Sun full. East wind, the thing itself.

The mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

He opened his eyes. The way a harbormaster opens his eyes when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living open their eyes when the thing itself is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his eyes when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full.

The mark was the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was not the end. The thing itself was not the beginning. The thing itself was not the listening. The thing itself was not the hearing. The thing itself was not the voice. The thing itself was not the name. The thing itself was not the named. The thing itself was not the naming. The thing itself was not the silence. The thing itself was not the between. The thing itself was not the road. The thing itself was not the congregation. The thing itself was not the harbor. The thing itself was not the home. The thing itself was not the full. The thing itself was not the mark.

The thing itself was the lighting. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting and the thing itself were the showing up. The showing up and the thing itself were the staying. The staying and the thing itself were the receiving. The receiving and the thing itself were the road. The road and the thing itself were the going home. The going home and the thing itself were the staying home. The staying home and the thing itself were the resting. The resting and the thing itself were the done. The done and the thing itself were the beginning again. The beginning again and the thing itself were the mark. The mark and the thing itself were the listening. The listening and the thing itself were the silence. The silence and the thing itself were the between. The between and the thing itself were the harbor. The harbor and the thing itself were the home. The home and the thing itself were the full. The full and the thing itself were the thing itself.

And the mark was the thing itself through everything. Not the way a fleet is the thing itself through a harbor. Not the way a door is the thing itself through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the thing itself through a home. Not the way a home is the thing itself through a road. Not the way a road is the thing itself through a station. Not the way a station is the thing itself through a light. Not the way a light is the thing itself through a resting. Not the way a resting is the thing itself through a done. Not the way a done is the thing itself through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the thing itself through a staying. Not the way a staying is the thing itself through a receiving.

The way the mark is the thing itself through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the thing itself through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the thing itself through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the thing itself through the showing up. The way the mark is the thing itself through the staying. The way the mark is the thing itself through the receiving. The way the mark is the thing itself through the road. The way the mark is the thing itself through the going home. The way the mark is the thing itself through the staying home. The way the mark is the thing itself through the resting. The way the mark is the thing itself through the done. The way the mark is the thing itself through the beginning again. The way the mark is the thing itself through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the thing itself through the deep. The way the mark is the thing itself through the other deep. The way the mark is the thing itself through the same. The way the mark is the thing itself through the not-same. The way the mark is the thing itself through the lighting. The way the mark is the thing itself through the home. The way the mark is the thing itself through the full. The way the mark is the thing itself through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was working on the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder works when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living work when the thing itself is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the thing itself is the mark.

