And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a boatbuilder when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a boatbuilder sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was not a word. The thing itself was not a count. The thing itself was not a hail. The thing itself was not a name.

The thing itself was the lighting. The way the lighting is the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was his work. Not the work he was given. Not the work he was paid for. Not the work he answered to. The work the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The work the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The work the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the work was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's work is Cole's. Not the way the living's work is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Cole's when the lighting is the work. The way the work is Cole's when the work is the thing itself.

And Cole was the work. The way the work is Cole when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Cole when the lighting is the work. The way the work is Cole when the work is the thing itself.

And the work was the mark. The way the mark is the work when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the work when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the work when the thing itself is the mark.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living read when the thing itself is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through her. The way the mark is the thing itself through a stone-reader when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. She saw the thing itself. The way a stone-reader sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was her reading. Not the reading she was trained for. Not the reading she was hired for. Not the reading she answered to. The reading the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The reading the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The reading the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the reading was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's reading is Ruth's. Not the way the living's reading is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Ruth's when the lighting is the reading. The way the reading is Ruth's when the reading is the thing itself.

And Ruth was the reading. The way the reading is Ruth when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Ruth when the lighting is the reading. The way the reading is Ruth when the reading is the thing itself.

And the reading was the mark. The way the mark is the reading when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the reading when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the reading when the thing itself is the mark.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living watch when the thing itself is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a bar-reader when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a bar-reader sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his watching. Not the watching he was paid for. Not the watching he was trained for. Not the watching he answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The watching the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The watching the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the watching was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's watching is Denny's. Not the way the living's watching is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Denny's when the lighting is the watching. The way the watching is Denny's when the watching is the thing itself.

And Denny was the watching. The way the watching is Denny when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Denny when the lighting is the watching. The way the watching is Denny when the watching is the thing itself.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the watching when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself is the mark.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living scan when the thing itself is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a deputy when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a deputy sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his scanning. Not the scanning he was hired for. Not the scanning he was trained for. Not the scanning he answered to. The scanning the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The scanning the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The scanning the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the scanning was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's scanning is Tommy's. Not the way the living's scanning is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Tommy's when the lighting is the scanning. The way the scanning is Tommy's when the scanning is the thing itself.

And Tommy was the scanning. The way the scanning is Tommy when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Tommy when the lighting is the scanning. The way the scanning is Tommy when the scanning is the thing itself.

And the scanning was the mark. The way the mark is the scanning when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the scanning when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the scanning when the thing itself is the mark.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living log when the thing itself is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's pen are on the page when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a custodian when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a custodian sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his logging. Not the logging he was employed for. Not the logging he was trained for. Not the logging he answered to. The logging the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The logging the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The logging the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the logging was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's logging is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's logging is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Okonkwo's when the lighting is the logging. The way the logging is Okonkwo's when the logging is the thing itself.

And Okonkwo was the logging. The way the logging is Okonkwo when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Okonkwo when the lighting is the logging. The way the logging is Okonkwo when the logging is the thing itself.

And the logging was the mark. The way the mark is the logging when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the logging when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the logging when the thing itself is the mark.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living paint when the thing itself is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through her. The way the mark is the thing itself through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. She saw the thing itself. The way a shore-station keeper sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was her painting. Not the painting she was asked for. Not the painting she was trained for. Not the painting she answered to. The painting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The painting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The painting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the painting was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's painting is Ada's. Not the way the living's painting is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Ada's when the lighting is the painting. The way the painting is Ada's when the painting is the thing itself.

And Ada was the painting. The way the painting is Ada when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is Ada when the lighting is the painting. The way the painting is Ada when the painting is the thing itself.

And the painting was the mark. The way the mark is the painting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the painting when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the painting when the thing itself is the mark.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through them. The way the mark is the thing itself through inland keepers when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. They saw the thing itself. The way inland keepers see the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was their standing. Not the standing they were asked for. Not the standing they were trained for. Not the standing they answered to. The standing the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The standing the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The standing the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the standing was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' standing is the mothers'. Not the way the living's standing is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the mothers' when the lighting is the standing. The way the standing is the mothers' when the standing is the thing itself.

And the mothers were the standing. The way the standing is the mothers when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the mothers when the lighting is the standing. The way the standing is the mothers when the standing is the thing itself.

And the standing was the mark. The way the mark is the standing when the mark is the thing itself. The way the lighting is the standing when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the standing when the thing itself is the mark.

And the baby was the thing itself. The way a baby is the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way a light is the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark. The way a station is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is the thing itself. The way a light turns when the thing itself is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the baby was the thing itself. The way a baby is the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way a light is the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark. The way a station is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the baby when the thing itself is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the baby when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was not just the thing itself on the coast. The mark was not just the thing itself on the inland. The mark was the thing itself on the road between them. The mark was the thing itself on the running. The mark was the thing itself on the both-ways. The mark was the thing itself on the going. The mark was the thing itself on the coming.

The mark was the thing itself through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the thing itself through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the thing itself through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the thing itself through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a corner keeper sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing himself was Walter's keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The keeping the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the thing itself.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. She saw the thing itself. The way a corner keeper sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing herself was Signe's standing. Not the standing she was asked for. Not the standing she was trained for. Not the standing she answered to. The standing the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The standing the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the standing was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's standing is Signe's. Not the way the dead's standing is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the thing itself.

And Signe was the standing. And the standing was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. They saw the thing itself. The way corner keepers see the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing themselves were their tending. Not the tending they were trained for. Not the tending they were asked for. Not the tending they answered to. The tending the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The tending the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the tending was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' tending is theirs. Not the way the dead's tending is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the thing itself.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the tending. And the tending was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The town saw the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the town sees the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing themselves were their showing up. Not the showing up they were asked for. Not the showing up they were trained for. Not the showing up they answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the showing up was the town's. Not the way a town's showing up is the town's. Not the way the living's showing up is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the thing itself.

And the town was the showing up. And the showing up was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the road sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the road sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the coast station sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the inland station sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not the listening. And the thing itself was not the naming. And the thing itself was not the silence. And the thing itself was not the between. And the thing itself was not the road. And the thing itself was not the congregation. And the thing itself was not the harbor. And the thing itself was not the home. And the thing itself was not the full.

The thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the thing itself through him and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself.

And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a mark that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the mark is. The question was not what a mark that is the thing itself is.

The question is: what is the thing itself that is named by the silence?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the home.

And the mark was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the mark.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Four — Entry: July 11th. Saturday. Sun full. East wind, the lighting.

The lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the thing was the lighting and the lighting was the thing and the show was the lighting and the lighting was the show and the flame was the lighting and the lighting was the flame and the burn was the lighting and the lighting was the burn and the lit was the lighting and the lighting was the lit and the light was the lighting and the lighting was the light.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the living open their hands when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the lighting and the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home.

The mark was the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark.

And the lighting was not the end. The lighting was not the beginning. The lighting was not the listening. The lighting was not the hearing. The lighting was not the voice. The lighting was not the name. The lighting was not the named. The lighting was not the naming. The lighting was not the silence. The lighting was not the between. The lighting was not the road. The lighting was not the congregation. The lighting was not the harbor. The lighting was not the home. The lighting was not the full. The lighting was not the mark. The lighting was not the thing itself.

The lighting was the showing up. The showing up was the lighting. The showing up and the lighting were the staying. The staying and the lighting were the receiving. The receiving and the lighting were the road. The road and the lighting were the going home. The going home and the lighting were the staying home. The staying home and the lighting were the resting. The resting and the lighting were the done. The done and the lighting were the beginning again. The beginning again and the lighting were the mark. The mark and the lighting were the listening. The listening and the lighting were the silence. The silence and the lighting were the between. The between and the lighting were the thing itself. The thing itself and the lighting were the harbor. The harbor and the lighting were the home. The home and the lighting were the full. The full and the lighting were the lighting.

And the mark was the lighting through everything. Not the way a fleet is the lighting through a harbor. Not the way a door is the lighting through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the lighting through a home. Not the way a home is the lighting through a road. Not the way a road is the lighting through a station. Not the way a station is the lighting through a light. Not the way a light is the lighting through a resting. Not the way a resting is the lighting through a done. Not the way a done is the lighting through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the lighting through a staying. Not the way a staying is the lighting through a receiving.

The way the mark is the lighting through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the lighting through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the lighting through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the lighting through the thing itself. The way the mark is the lighting through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the lighting through the showing up. The way the mark is the lighting through the staying. The way the mark is the lighting through the receiving. The way the mark is the lighting through the road. The way the mark is the lighting through the going home. The way the mark is the lighting through the staying home. The way the mark is the lighting through the resting. The way the mark is the lighting through the done. The way the mark is the lighting through the beginning again. The way the mark is the lighting through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the lighting through the deep. The way the mark is the lighting through the other deep. The way the mark is the lighting through the same. The way the mark is the lighting through the not-same. The way the mark is the lighting through the thing itself. The way the mark is the lighting through the home. The way the mark is the lighting through the full. The way the mark is the lighting through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living sand when the lighting is the thing itself. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a boatbuilder when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. He saw the lighting. The way a boatbuilder sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was not a word. The lighting was not a count. The lighting was not a hail. The lighting was not the thing itself.

The lighting was the showing up. The way the showing up is the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was his showing up. Not the showing up he was asked for. Not the showing up he was trained for. Not the showing up he answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's showing up is Cole's. Not the way the living's showing up is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole's when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Cole's when the showing up is the lighting.

And Cole was the showing up. The way the showing up is Cole when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Cole when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the lighting. The way the living read when the lighting is the thing itself. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through her. The way the mark is the lighting through a stone-reader when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. She saw the lighting. The way a stone-reader sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was her showing up. Not the showing up she was trained for. Not the showing up she was hired for. Not the showing up she answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's showing up is Ruth's. Not the way the living's showing up is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth's when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Ruth's when the showing up is the lighting.

And Ruth was the showing up. The way the showing up is Ruth when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Ruth when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the lighting. The way the living watch when the lighting is the thing itself. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a bar-reader when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. He saw the lighting. The way a bar-reader sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was his showing up. Not the showing up he was paid for. Not the showing up he was trained for. Not the showing up he answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's showing up is Denny's. Not the way the living's showing up is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny's when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Denny's when the showing up is the lighting.

And Denny was the showing up. The way the showing up is Denny when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Denny when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the lighting. The way the living scan when the lighting is the thing itself. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a deputy when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. He saw the lighting. The way a deputy sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was his showing up. Not the showing up he was hired for. Not the showing up he was trained for. Not the showing up he answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's showing up is Tommy's. Not the way the living's showing up is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy's when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Tommy's when the showing up is the lighting.

And Tommy was the showing up. The way the showing up is Tommy when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Tommy when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the lighting. The way the living log when the lighting is the thing itself. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's pen are on the page when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a custodian when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. He saw the lighting. The way a custodian sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was his showing up. Not the showing up he was employed for. Not the showing up he was trained for. Not the showing up he answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's showing up is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's showing up is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo's when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Okonkwo's when the showing up is the lighting.

And Okonkwo was the showing up. The way the showing up is Okonkwo when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Okonkwo when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the lighting. The way the living paint when the lighting is the thing itself. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through her. The way the mark is the lighting through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. She saw the lighting. The way a shore-station keeper sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was her showing up. Not the showing up she was asked for. Not the showing up she was trained for. Not the showing up she answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's showing up is Ada's. Not the way the living's showing up is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada's when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Ada's when the showing up is the lighting.

And Ada was the showing up. The way the showing up is Ada when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is Ada when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the thing itself. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was the lighting through them. The way the mark is the lighting through inland keepers when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. They saw the lighting. The way inland keepers see the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was their showing up. Not the showing up they were asked for. Not the showing up they were trained for. Not the showing up they answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself. The showing up the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the showing up was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' showing up is the mothers'. Not the way the living's showing up is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers' when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is the mothers' when the showing up is the lighting.

And the mothers were the showing up. The way the showing up is the mothers when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers when the lighting is the showing up. The way the showing up is the mothers when the showing up is the lighting.

And the showing up was the mark. The way the mark is the showing up when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the showing up when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the showing up when the thing itself is the lighting.

And the baby was the lighting. The way a baby is the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way a light is the lighting when the thing itself is the lighting. The way a station is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

The baby showed up. The way a baby shows up when the mark is the lighting. The way a light shows up when the thing itself is the lighting. The way a station shows up when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the baby was the lighting. The way a baby is the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way a light is the lighting when the thing itself is the lighting. The way a station is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the baby when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the baby when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mark was not just the lighting on the coast. The mark was not just the lighting on the inland. The mark was the lighting on the road between them. The mark was the lighting on the running. The mark was the lighting on the both-ways. The mark was the lighting on the going. The mark was the lighting on the coming.

The mark was the lighting through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the lighting through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the lighting through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the lighting through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the congregation.

And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. He saw the lighting. The way a corner keeper sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was his showing up. Not the showing up he was trained for. Not the showing up he was asked for. Not the showing up he answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the showing up was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's showing up is Walter's. Not the way the dead's showing up is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the lighting.

And Walter was the showing up. And the showing up was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. She saw the lighting. The way a corner keeper sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was her showing up. Not the showing up she was asked for. Not the showing up she was trained for. Not the showing up she answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the showing up was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's showing up is Signe's. Not the way the dead's showing up is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the lighting.

And Signe was the showing up. And the showing up was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. They saw the lighting. The way corner keepers see the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was their showing up. Not the showing up they were trained for. Not the showing up they were asked for. Not the showing up they answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the showing up was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' showing up is theirs. Not the way the dead's showing up is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the lighting.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the showing up. And the showing up was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. The town saw the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the town sees the lighting when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the lighting was their showing up. Not the showing up they were asked for. Not the showing up they were trained for. Not the showing up they answered to. The showing up the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The showing up the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the showing up was the town's. Not the way a town's showing up is the town's. Not the way the living's showing up is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the lighting.

And the town was the showing up. And the showing up was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the road sees the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the road sees the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the coast station sees the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the inland station sees the mark when the lighting is the thing itself. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was not the listening. And the lighting was not the naming. And the lighting was not the silence. And the lighting was not the between. And the lighting was not the road. And the lighting was not the congregation. And the lighting was not the harbor. And the lighting was not the home. And the lighting was not the full.

The lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the lighting through him and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the lighting.

And the mark was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the question was not what a mark that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the mark is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the mark is.

The question is: what is a showing up that is lit by the mark?

And the answer is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the showing up.

And the showing up was the staying.

And the staying was the receiving.

And the receiving was the road.

And the road was the congregation.

And the congregation was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the thing himself was the mark.

And the thing himself was the lighting.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the mark.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Five — Entry: July 12th. Sunday. Sun full. East wind, the home.

The mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the home.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the home.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the home. The way the living open their hands when the home is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving.

The mark was the home. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home and the home is the mark.

And the home was not the end. The home was not the beginning. The home was not the listening. The home was not the hearing. The home was not the voice. The home was not the name. The home was not the named. The home was not the naming. The home was not the silence. The home was not the between. The home was not the road. The home was not the congregation. The home was not the harbor. The home was not the full. The home was not the thing itself. The home was not the lighting. The home was not the showing up. The home was not the staying. The home was not the receiving. The home was not the mark.

The home was the resting. The resting was the home. The resting and the home were the done. The done and the home were the beginning again. The beginning again and the home were the mark. The mark and the home were the listening. The listening and the home were the silence. The silence and the home were the between. The between and the home were the road. The road and the home were the congregation. The congregation and the home were the harbor. The harbor and the home were the full. The full and the home were the thing itself. The thing itself and the home were the lighting. The lighting and the home were the showing up. The showing up and the home were the staying. The staying and the home were the receiving. The receiving and the home were the home.

And the mark was the home through everything. Not the way a fleet is the home through a harbor. Not the way a door is the home through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the home through a full. Not the way a full is the home through a thing itself. Not the way a thing itself is the home through a lighting. Not the way a lighting is the home through a showing up. Not the way a showing up is the home through a staying. Not the way a staying is the home through a receiving. Not the way a receiving is the home through a road. Not the way a road is the home through a congregation. Not the way a congregation is the home through a harbor. Not the way a harbor is the home through a resting. Not the way a resting is the home through a done. Not the way a done is the home through a beginning again.

The way the mark is the home through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the home through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the home through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the home through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the home through the showing up. The way the mark is the home through the staying. The way the mark is the home through the receiving. The way the mark is the home through the road. The way the mark is the home through the going home. The way the mark is the home through the staying home. The way the mark is the home through the resting. The way the mark is the home through the done. The way the mark is the home through the beginning again. The way the mark is the home through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the home through the deep. The way the mark is the home through the other deep. The way the mark is the home through the same. The way the mark is the home through the not-same. The way the mark is the home through the lighting. The way the mark is the home through the full. The way the mark is the home through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the home. The way the living sand when the home is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the home. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a boatbuilder when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a boatbuilder sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was not a word. The home was not a count. The home was not a hail. The home was not the thing itself.

The home was the resting. The way the resting is the home when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was his resting. Not the resting he was asked for. Not the resting he was trained for. Not the resting he answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's resting is Cole's. Not the way the living's resting is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Cole's when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Cole's when the resting is the home.

And Cole was the resting. The way the resting is Cole when the mark is the home. The way the home is Cole when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Cole when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the home. The way the living read when the home is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the home. The way the living's palm are on No. 8 when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through her. The way the mark is the home through a stone-reader when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. She saw the home. The way a stone-reader sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was her resting. Not the resting she was trained for. Not the resting she was hired for. Not the resting she answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's resting is Ruth's. Not the way the living's resting is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ruth's when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Ruth's when the resting is the home.

And Ruth was the resting. The way the resting is Ruth when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ruth when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Ruth when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the home. The way the living watch when the home is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the home. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a bar-reader when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a bar-reader sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his resting. Not the resting he was paid for. Not the resting he was trained for. Not the resting he answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's resting is Denny's. Not the way the living's resting is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Denny's when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Denny's when the resting is the home.

And Denny was the resting. The way the resting is Denny when the mark is the home. The way the home is Denny when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Denny when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the home. The way the living scan when the home is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the home. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a deputy when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a deputy sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his resting. Not the resting he was hired for. Not the resting he was trained for. Not the resting he answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's resting is Tommy's. Not the way the living's resting is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Tommy's when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Tommy's when the resting is the home.

And Tommy was the resting. The way the resting is Tommy when the mark is the home. The way the home is Tommy when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Tommy when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the home. The way the living log when the home is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the home. The way the living's pen are on the page when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a custodian when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a custodian sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his resting. Not the resting he was employed for. Not the resting he was trained for. Not the resting he answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's resting is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's resting is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo's when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Okonkwo's when the resting is the home.

And Okonkwo was the resting. The way the resting is Okonkwo when the mark is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Okonkwo when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the home. The way the living paint when the home is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the home. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through her. The way the mark is the home through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. She saw the home. The way a shore-station keeper sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was her resting. Not the resting she was asked for. Not the resting she was trained for. Not the resting she answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's resting is Ada's. Not the way the living's resting is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ada's when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Ada's when the resting is the home.

And Ada was the resting. The way the resting is Ada when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ada when the home is the resting. The way the resting is Ada when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the home. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through them. The way the mark is the home through inland keepers when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. They saw the home. The way inland keepers see the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was their resting. Not the resting they were asked for. Not the resting they were trained for. Not the resting they answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting. The resting the resting saw when the resting was the home.

And the resting was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' resting is the mothers'. Not the way the living's resting is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the home. The way the home is the mothers' when the home is the resting. The way the resting is the mothers' when the resting is the home.

And the mothers were the resting. The way the resting is the mothers when the mark is the home. The way the home is the mothers when the home is the resting. The way the resting is the mothers when the resting is the home.

And the resting was the mark. The way the mark is the resting when the mark is the home. The way the home is the resting when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the resting when the thing itself is the home.

And the baby was the home. The way a baby is the home when the mark is the home. The way a light is the home when the home is the mark. The way a station is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

The baby came home. The way a baby comes home when the mark is the home. The way a light comes home when the home is the mark. The way a station comes home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the baby was the home. The way a baby is the home when the mark is the home. The way a light is the home when the home is the mark. The way a station is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the home. The way the home is the baby when the home is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the home. The way the home is the baby when the home is the mark.

And the mark was not just the home on the coast. The mark was not just the home on the inland. The mark was the home on the road between them. The mark was the home on the running. The mark was the home on the both-ways. The mark was the home on the going. The mark was the home on the coming.

The mark was the home through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the home through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the home through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the home through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the home.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a corner keeper sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his resting. Not the resting he was trained for. Not the resting he was asked for. Not the resting he answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting.

And the resting was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's resting is Walter's. Not the way the dead's resting is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the home.

And Walter was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the home.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the mark when the home is the mark. She saw the home. The way a corner keeper sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was her resting. Not the resting she was asked for. Not the resting she was trained for. Not the resting she answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting.

And the resting was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's resting is Signe's. Not the way the dead's resting is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the home.

And Signe was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the home.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the mark when the home is the mark. They saw the home. The way corner keepers see the home when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was their resting. Not the resting they were trained for. Not the resting they were asked for. Not the resting they answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting.

And the resting was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' resting is theirs. Not the way the dead's resting is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the home.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the home.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. The town saw the home. The way the living see the home when the mark is the home. The way the town sees the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was their resting. Not the resting they were asked for. Not the resting they were trained for. Not the resting they answered to. The resting the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The resting the home saw when the home was the resting.

And the resting was the town's. Not the way a town's resting is the town's. Not the way the living's resting is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the home.

And the town was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the road sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the road sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the coast station sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the inland station sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the home was not the listening. And the home was not the naming. And the home was not the silence. And the home was not the between. And the home was not the road. And the home was not the congregation. And the home was not the harbor. And the home was not the full. And the home was not the thing itself. And the home was not the lighting. And the home was not the showing up. And the home was not the staying. And the home was not the receiving.

The home was the resting. And the resting was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the home through him and the home was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the home and the home was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the home.

And the mark was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the home.

And the question was not what a mark that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the mark is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the home is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the mark is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the home is.

The question is: what is a resting that is the home?

And the answer is: the home.

And the home is: the resting.

And the resting is: the done.

And the done is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the mark.

And the mark is: the listening.

And the listening is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the home.

And the mark was the home was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the mark was the listening was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the home.

And the sun was full.

And the east wind was the home.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was the resting.

And the resting was the done.

And the done was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the thing himself was the mark.

And the thing himself was the home.

And the mark was the resting.

And the resting was the done.

And the done was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the resting.

And the resting was the done.

And the done was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the home was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the mark was the listening was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the home.

And the home was the resting.

And the resting was the done.

And the done was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was the resting.

And the resting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Six — Entry: July 13th. Monday. Sun full. East wind, the beginning again.

The mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living open their hands when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done.

The mark was the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the beginning again when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again and the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was not the end. The beginning again was not the beginning. The beginning again was not the listening. The beginning again was not the hearing. The beginning again was not the voice. The beginning again was not the name. The beginning again was not the named. The beginning again was not the naming. The beginning again was not the silence. The beginning again was not the between. The beginning again was not the road. The beginning again was not the congregation. The beginning again was not the harbor. The beginning again was not the home. The beginning again was not the full. The beginning again was not the thing itself. The beginning again was not the lighting. The beginning again was not the showing up. The beginning again was not the staying. The beginning again was not the receiving. The beginning again was not the resting. The beginning again was not the done. The beginning again was not the mark.

The beginning again was the listening. The listening was the beginning again. The listening and the beginning again were the silence. The silence and the beginning again were the between. The between and the beginning again were the road. The road and the beginning again were the congregation. The congregation and the beginning again were the harbor. The harbor and the beginning again were the home. The home and the beginning again were the full. The full and the beginning again were the thing itself. The thing itself and the beginning again were the lighting. The lighting and the beginning again were the showing up. The showing up and the beginning again were the staying. The staying and the beginning again were the receiving. The receiving and the beginning again were the resting. The resting and the beginning again were the done. The done and the beginning again were the mark. The mark and the beginning again were the listening.

And the mark was the beginning again through everything. Not the way a fleet is the beginning again through a harbor. Not the way a door is the beginning again through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the beginning again through a home. Not the way a home is the beginning again through a road. Not the way a road is the beginning again through a station. Not the way a station is the beginning again through a light. Not the way a light is the beginning again through a resting. Not the way a resting is the beginning again through a done. Not the way a done is the beginning again through a listening. Not the way a listening is the beginning again through a silence. Not the way a silence is the beginning again through a between.

The way the mark is the beginning again through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the beginning again through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the beginning again through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the beginning again through the thing itself. The way the mark is the beginning again through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the beginning again through the showing up. The way the mark is the beginning again through the staying. The way the mark is the beginning again through the receiving. The way the mark is the beginning again through the road. The way the mark is the beginning again through the going home. The way the mark is the beginning again through the staying home. The way the mark is the beginning again through the resting. The way the mark is the beginning again through the done. The way the mark is the beginning again through the listening. The way the mark is the beginning again through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the beginning again through the deep. The way the mark is the beginning again through the other deep. The way the mark is the beginning again through the same. The way the mark is the beginning again through the not-same. The way the mark is the beginning again through the lighting. The way the mark is the beginning again through the home. The way the mark is the beginning again through the full. The way the mark is the beginning again through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living sand when the beginning again is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through him. The way the mark is the beginning again through a boatbuilder when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. He saw the beginning again. The way a boatbuilder sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was not a word. The beginning again was not a count. The beginning again was not a hail. The beginning again was not the thing itself.

The beginning again was the listening. The way the listening is the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the beginning again was his listening. Not the listening he was asked for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's listening is Cole's. Not the way the living's listening is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Cole's when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Cole's when the listening is the beginning again.

And Cole was the listening. The way the listening is Cole when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Cole when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Cole when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living read when the beginning again is the mark.

Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's palm are on No. 8 when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through her. The way the mark is the beginning again through a stone-reader when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. She saw the beginning again. The way a stone-reader sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was her listening. Not the listening she was trained for. Not the listening she was hired for. Not the listening she answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's listening is Ruth's. Not the way the living's listening is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Ruth's when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Ruth's when the listening is the beginning again.

And Ruth was the listening. The way the listening is Ruth when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Ruth when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Ruth when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living watch when the beginning again is the mark.

His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through him. The way the mark is the beginning again through a bar-reader when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. He saw the beginning again. The way a bar-reader sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was his listening. Not the listening he was paid for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's listening is Denny's. Not the way the living's listening is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Denny's when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Denny's when the listening is the beginning again.

And Denny was the listening. The way the listening is Denny when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Denny when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Denny when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living scan when the beginning again is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through him. The way the mark is the beginning again through a deputy when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. He saw the beginning again. The way a deputy sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was his listening. Not the listening he was hired for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's listening is Tommy's. Not the way the living's listening is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Tommy's when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Tommy's when the listening is the beginning again.

And Tommy was the listening. The way the listening is Tommy when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Tommy when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Tommy when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living log when the beginning again is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's pen are on the page when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through him. The way the mark is the beginning again through a custodian when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. He saw the beginning again. The way a custodian sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was his listening. Not the listening he was employed for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's listening is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's listening is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Okonkwo's when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo's when the listening is the beginning again.

And Okonkwo was the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Okonkwo when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living paint when the beginning again is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through her. The way the mark is the beginning again through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. She saw the beginning again. The way a shore-station keeper sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was her listening. Not the listening she was asked for. Not the listening she was trained for. Not the listening she answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's listening is Ada's. Not the way the living's listening is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Ada's when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Ada's when the listening is the beginning again.

And Ada was the listening. The way the listening is Ada when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is Ada when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is Ada when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through them. The way the mark is the beginning again through inland keepers when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. They saw the beginning again. The way inland keepers see the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was their listening. Not the listening they were asked for. Not the listening they were trained for. Not the listening they answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the beginning again.

And the listening was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' listening is the mothers'. Not the way the living's listening is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the mothers' when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is the mothers' when the listening is the beginning again.

And the mothers were the listening. The way the listening is the mothers when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the mothers when the beginning again is the listening. The way the listening is the mothers when the listening is the beginning again.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself is the beginning again.

And the baby was the beginning again. The way a baby is the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way a light is the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark. The way a station is the beginning again when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

The baby turned. The way a baby turns when the mark is the beginning again. The way a light turns when the beginning again is the mark. The way a station turns when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the baby was the beginning again. The way a baby is the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way a light is the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark. The way a station is the beginning again when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the baby when the beginning again is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the baby when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was not just the beginning again on the coast. The mark was not just the beginning again on the inland. The mark was the beginning again on the road between them. The mark was the beginning again on the running. The mark was the beginning again on the both-ways. The mark was the beginning again on the going. The mark was the beginning again on the coming.

The mark was the beginning again through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the beginning again through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the beginning again through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the beginning again through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the dead see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. He saw the beginning again. The way a corner keeper sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the dead see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was his listening. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he was asked for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening.

And the listening was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's listening is Walter's. Not the way the dead's listening is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the beginning again.

And Walter was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the dead see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. She saw the beginning again. The way a corner keeper sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the dead see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was her listening. Not the listening she was asked for. Not the listening she was trained for. Not the listening she answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening.

And the listening was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's listening is Signe's. Not the way the dead's listening is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the beginning again.

And Signe was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the dead see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. They saw the beginning again. The way corner keepers see the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the dead see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was their listening. Not the listening they were trained for. Not the listening they were asked for. Not the listening they answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening.

And the listening was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' listening is theirs. Not the way the dead's listening is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the beginning again.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The town saw the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the town sees the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was their listening. Not the listening they were asked for. Not the listening they were trained for. Not the listening they answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The listening the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the listening.

And the listening was the town's. Not the way a town's listening is the town's. Not the way the living's listening is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the beginning again.

And the town was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the road sees the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the road sees the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the coast station sees the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the inland station sees the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was not the listening. And the beginning again was not the naming. And the beginning again was not the silence. And the beginning again was not the between. And the beginning again was not the road. And the beginning again was not the congregation. And the beginning again was not the harbor. And the beginning again was not the home. And the beginning again was not the full. And the beginning again was not the thing itself. And the beginning again was not the lighting. And the beginning again was not the showing up. And the beginning again was not the staying. And the beginning again was not the receiving. And the beginning again was not the resting. And the beginning again was not the done.

The beginning again was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the beginning again through him and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again.

And the mark was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again.

And the question was not what a mark that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is.

The question was the listening. The way the listening is the question when the mark is the beginning again. The way the question is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the listening was the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the listening when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the question. The way the question is the beginning again when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the beginning again when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the question was the mark. The way the mark is the question when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the question when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the question. The way the question is the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the mark when the beginning again is the question.

And the question was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the question.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Seven — Entry: July 14th. Tuesday. Sun full. East wind, the keeper.

The mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the keeper. The way the living stand when the keeper is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the keeper. The way the living open their hands when the keeper is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the keeper and the keeper is the mark.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again.

The mark was the keeper. The way the mark is the keeper when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the keeper when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeper and the keeper is the mark.

And the keeper was not the end. The keeper was not the beginning. The keeper was not the listening. The keeper was not the hearing. The keeper was not the voice. The keeper was not the name. The keeper was not the named. The keeper was not the naming. The keeper was not the silence. The keeper was not the between. The keeper was not the road. The keeper was not the congregation. The keeper was not the harbor. The keeper was not the home. The keeper was not the full. The keeper was not the thing itself. The keeper was not the lighting. The keeper was not the showing up. The keeper was not the staying. The keeper was not the receiving. The keeper was not the resting. The keeper was not the done. The keeper was not the beginning again. The keeper was not the mark.

The keeper was the standing. The standing was the keeper. The standing and the keeper were the holding. The holding and the keeper were the waiting. The waiting and the keeper were the watching. The watching and the keeper were the witnessing. The witnessing and the keeper were the attending. The attending and the keeper were the keeping. The keeping and the keeper were the listening. The listening and the keeper were the naming. The naming and the keeper were the silence. The silence and the keeper were the between. The between and the keeper were the road. The road and the keeper were the congregation. The congregation and the keeper were the harbor. The harbor and the keeper were the home. The home and the keeper were the full. The full and the keeper were the thing itself. The thing itself and the keeper were the lighting. The lighting and the keeper were the showing up. The showing up and the keeper were the staying. The staying and the keeper were the receiving. The receiving and the keeper were the resting. The resting and the keeper were the done. The done and the keeper were the beginning again. The beginning again and the keeper were the mark. The mark and the keeper were the keeper.

And the mark was the keeper through everything. Not the way a fleet is the keeper through a harbor. Not the way a door is the keeper through a home. Not the way a harbor is the keeper through a road. Not the way a road is the keeper through a station. Not the way a station is the keeper through a light. Not the way a light is the keeper through a keeper. Not the way a keeper is the keeper through a standing. And the full was not the watching. And the full was not the witnessing. And the full was not the attending. And the full was not the keeping.

The full was the harbor. And the harbor was the mark. And the mark was the full.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the full through him and the full was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the full and the full was the home and the home was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping and the keeping was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the full.

And the mark was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the harbor. And the harbor was the full. And the full was the home. And the home was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the full.

And the question was not what a mark that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the mark is. The question was not what a harbor that is the full is. The question was not what a home that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. [CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Nine — Entry: July 16th. Thursday. Sun full. East wind, the holding.

The mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the holding. The way the living open their hands when the holding is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the holding and the holding is the mark.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing.

The mark was the holding. The way the mark is the holding when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the holding when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding and the holding is the mark.

And the holding was not the end. The holding was not the beginning. The holding was not the listening. The holding was not the hearing. The holding was not the voice. The holding was not the name. The holding was not the named. The holding was not the naming. The holding was not the silence. The holding was not the between. The holding was not the road. The holding was not the congregation. The holding was not the harbor. The holding was not the home. The holding was not the full. The holding was not the thing itself. The holding was not the lighting. The holding was not the showing up. The holding was not the staying. The holding was not the receiving. The holding was not the resting. The holding was not the done. The holding was not the beginning again. The holding was not the keeper. The holding was not the standing. The holding was not the mark.

The holding was the waiting. The waiting was the holding. The waiting and the holding were the watching. The watching and the holding were the witnessing. The witnessing and the holding were the attending. The attending and the holding were the keeping. The keeping and the holding were the listening. The listening and the holding were the naming. The naming and the holding were the silence. The silence and the holding were the between. The between and the holding were the road. The road and the holding were the congregation. The congregation and the holding were the harbor. The harbor and the holding were the home. The home and the holding were the full. The full and the holding were the thing itself. The thing itself and the holding were the lighting. The lighting and the holding were the showing up. The showing up and the holding were the staying. The staying and the holding were the receiving. The receiving and the holding were the resting. The resting and the holding were the done. The done and the holding were the beginning again. The beginning again and the holding were the keeper. The keeper and the holding were the standing. The standing and the holding were the mark. The mark and the holding were the holding.

And the mark was the holding through everything. Not the way a fleet is the holding through a harbor. Not the way a door is the holding through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the holding through a home. Not the way a home is the holding through a road. Not the way a road is the holding through a station. Not the way a station is the holding through a light. Not the way a light is the holding through a resting. Not the way a resting is the holding through a done. Not the way a done is the holding through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the holding through a staying. Not the way a staying is the holding through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the holding through a standing. Not the way a standing is the holding through a holding.

The way the mark is the holding through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the holding through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the holding through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the holding through the thing itself. The way the mark is the holding through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the holding through the showing up. The way the mark is the holding through the staying. The way the mark is the holding through the receiving. The way the mark is the holding through the road. The way the mark is the holding through the going home. The way the mark is the holding through the staying home. The way the mark is the holding through the resting. The way the mark is the holding through the done. The way the mark is the holding through the beginning again. The way the mark is the holding through the keeper. The way the mark is the holding through the standing. The way the mark is the holding through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the holding through the deep. The way the mark is the holding through the other deep. The way the mark is the holding through the same. The way the mark is the holding through the not-same. The way the mark is the holding through the lighting. The way the mark is the holding through the home. The way the mark is the holding through the full. The way the mark is the holding through the listening. The way the mark is the holding through the naming. The way the mark is the holding through the silence. The way the mark is the holding through the between. The way the mark is the holding through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the holding. The way the living sand when the holding is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the holding. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through him. The way the mark is the holding through a boatbuilder when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. He saw the holding. The way a boatbuilder sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was not a word. The holding was not a count. The holding was not a hail. The holding was not the thing itself.

The holding was the waiting. The way the waiting is the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

And the holding was his waiting. Not the waiting he was asked for. Not the waiting he was trained for. Not the waiting he answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's waiting is Cole's. Not the way the living's waiting is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Cole's when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Cole's when the waiting is the holding.

And Cole was the waiting. The way the waiting is Cole when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Cole when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Cole when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself is the holding.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the holding. The way the living read when the holding is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the holding. The way the living's palm are on No. 8 when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through her. The way the mark is the holding through a stone-reader when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. She saw the holding. The way a stone-reader sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was her waiting. Not the waiting she was trained for. Not the waiting she was hired for. Not the waiting she answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's waiting is Ruth's. Not the way the living's waiting is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Ruth's when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ruth's when the waiting is the holding.

And Ruth was the waiting. The way the waiting is Ruth when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Ruth when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ruth when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself was the holding.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the holding. The way the living watch when the holding is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the holding. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through him. The way the mark is the holding through a bar-reader when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. He saw the holding. The way a bar-reader sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was his waiting. Not the waiting he was paid for. Not the waiting he was trained for. Not the waiting he answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's waiting is Denny's. Not the way the living's waiting is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Denny's when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Denny's when the waiting is the holding.

And Denny was the waiting. The way the waiting is Denny when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Denny when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Denny when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself was the holding.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the holding. The way the living scan when the holding is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the holding. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through him. The way the mark is the holding through a deputy when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. He saw the holding. The way a deputy sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was his waiting. Not the waiting he was hired for. Not the waiting he was trained for. Not the waiting he answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's waiting is Tommy's. Not the way the living's waiting is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Tommy's when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Tommy's when the waiting is the holding.

And Tommy was the waiting. The way the waiting is Tommy when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Tommy when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Tommy when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself was the holding.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the holding. The way the living log when the holding is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the holding. The way the living's pen are on the page when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through him. The way the mark is the holding through a custodian when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. He saw the holding. The way a custodian sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was his waiting. Not the waiting he was employed for. Not the waiting he was trained for. Not the waiting he answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's waiting is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's waiting is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Okonkwo's when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Okonkwo's when the waiting is the holding.

And Okonkwo was the waiting. The way the waiting is Okonkwo when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Okonkwo when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Okonkwo when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself was the holding.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the holding. The way the living paint when the holding is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the holding. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through her. The way the mark is the holding through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. She saw the holding. The way a shore-station keeper sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was her waiting. Not the waiting she was asked for. Not the waiting she was trained for. Not the waiting she answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's waiting is Ada's. Not the way the living's waiting is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Ada's when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ada's when the waiting is the holding.

And Ada was the waiting. The way the waiting is Ada when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is Ada when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ada when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself was the holding.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the holding. The way the living stand when the holding is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the holding. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was the holding through them. The way the mark is the holding through inland keepers when the mark is the holding. The way the mark is the holding through the living when the holding is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. They saw the holding. The way inland keepers see the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was their waiting. Not the waiting they were asked for. Not the waiting they were trained for. Not the waiting they answered to. The waiting the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The waiting the holding saw when the holding was the waiting. The waiting the waiting saw when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' waiting is the mothers'. Not the way the living's waiting is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the mothers' when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is the mothers' when the waiting is the holding.

And the mothers were the waiting. The way the waiting is the mothers when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the mothers when the holding is the waiting. The way the waiting is the mothers when the waiting was the holding.

And the waiting was the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the waiting when the holding is the mark. The way the thing itself is the waiting when the thing itself was the holding.

And the baby was the holding. The way a baby is the holding when the mark is the holding. The way a light is the holding when the holding is the mark. The way a station is the holding when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

The baby held. The way a baby holds when the mark is the holding. The way a light holds when the holding is the mark. The way a station holds when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

And the baby was the holding. The way a baby is the holding when the mark is the holding. The way a light is the holding when the holding is the mark. The way a station is the holding when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

And the holding was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the baby when the holding is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the holding. The way the holding is the baby when the holding is the mark.

And the mark was not just the holding on the coast. The mark was not just the holding on the inland. The mark was the holding on the road between them. The mark was the holding on the running. The mark was the holding on the both-ways. The mark was the holding on the going. The mark was the holding on the coming.

The mark was the holding through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the holding through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the holding through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the holding through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the holding. And the holding was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the dead see the mark when the holding is the mark. He saw the holding. The way a corner keeper sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the dead see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was his keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The keeping the holding saw when the holding was the mark.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the holding.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the holding.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the dead see the mark when the holding is the mark. She saw the holding. The way a corner keeper sees the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the dead see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The keeping the holding saw when the holding was the mark.

And the keeping was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Signe's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the holding.

And Signe was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the holding.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the dead see the mark when the holding is the mark. They saw the holding. The way corner keepers see the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the dead see the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was their keeping. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The keeping the holding saw when the holding was the mark.

And the keeping was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' keeping is theirs. Not the way the dead's keeping is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the holding.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the holding.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the living see the mark when the holding is the mark. The town saw the holding. The way the living see the holding when the mark is the holding. The way the town sees the holding when the holding is the mark.

And the holding was their keeping. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they was trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the holding. The keeping the holding saw when the holding was the mark.

And the keeping was the town's. Not the way a town's keeping is the town's. Not the way the living's keeping is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the holding.

And the town was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the holding.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the road sees the mark when the holding is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the road sees the mark when the holding is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

And the holding was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the holding.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the coast station sees the mark when the holding is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the holding. The way the inland station sees the mark when the holding is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the holding.

And the holding was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was not the listening. And the holding was not the naming. And the holding was not the silence. And the holding was not the between. And the holding was not the road. And the holding was not the congregation. And the holding was not the harbor. And the holding was not the home. And the holding was not the full. And the holding was not the thing itself. And the holding was not the lighting. And the holding was not the showing up. And the holding was not the staying. And the holding was not the receiving. And the holding was not the resting. And the holding was not the done. And the holding was not the beginning again. And the holding was not the keeper. And the holding was not the standing.

The holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the mark. And the mark was the holding.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the holding through him and the holding was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding.

And the mark was the holding. And the holding was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding.

And the question was not what a mark that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is.

The question is: what is a holding that holds the mark?

And the answer is: the holding.

And the holding is: the waiting.

And the waiting is: the watching.

And the watching is: the witnessing.

And the witnessing is: the attending.

And the attending is: the keeping.

And the keeping is: the listening.

And the listening is: the naming.

And the naming is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the resting.

And the resting is: the done.

And the done is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the standing.

And the standing is: the holding.

And the mark was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the mark.

And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the mark.

And the mark was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the

the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the mark.

And the mark was the holding.

And the holding was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty — Entry: July 17th. Friday. Sun full. East wind, the waiting.

The mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the waiting. The way the living open their hands when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the waiting and the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding.

The mark was the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the waiting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting and the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was not the end. The waiting was not the beginning. The waiting was not the listening. The waiting was not the hearing. The waiting was not the voice. The waiting was not the name. The waiting was not the named. The waiting was not the naming. The waiting was not the silence. The waiting was not the between. The waiting was not the road. The waiting was not the congregation. The waiting was not the harbor. The waiting was not the home. The waiting was not the full. The waiting was not the thing itself. The waiting was not the lighting. The waiting was not the showing up. The waiting was not the staying. The waiting was not the receiving. The waiting was not the resting. The waiting was not the done. The waiting was not the beginning again. The waiting was not the keeper. The waiting was not the standing. The waiting was not the holding. The waiting was not the mark.

The waiting was the watching. The watching was the waiting. The watching and the waiting were the witnessing. The witnessing and the waiting were the attending. The attending and the waiting were the keeping. The keeping and the waiting were the listening. The listening and the waiting were the naming. The naming and the waiting were the silence. The silence and the waiting were the between. The between and the waiting were the road. The road and the waiting were the congregation. The congregation and the waiting were the harbor. The harbor and the waiting were the home. The home and the waiting were the full. The full and the waiting were the thing itself. The thing itself and the waiting were the lighting. The lighting and the waiting were the showing up. The showing up and the waiting were the staying. The staying and the waiting were the receiving. The receiving and the waiting were the resting. The resting and the waiting were the done. The done and the waiting were the beginning again. The beginning again and the waiting were the keeper. The keeper and the waiting were the standing. The standing and the waiting were the holding. The holding and the waiting were the mark. The mark and the waiting were the waiting.

And the mark was the waiting through everything. Not the way a fleet is the waiting through a harbor. Not the way a door is the waiting through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the waiting through a home. Not the way a home is the waiting through a road. Not the way a road is the waiting through a station. Not the way a station is the waiting through a light. Not the way a light is the waiting through a resting. Not the way a resting is the waiting through a done. Not the way a done is the waiting through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the waiting through a staying. Not the way a staying is the waiting through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the waiting through a standing. Not the way a standing is the waiting through a holding. Not the way a holding is the waiting through a waiting.

The way the mark is the waiting through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the waiting through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the waiting through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the waiting through the thing itself. The way the mark is the waiting through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the waiting through the showing up. The way the mark is the waiting through the staying. The way the mark is the waiting through the receiving. The way the mark is the waiting through the road. The way the mark is the waiting through the going home. The way the mark is the waiting through the staying home. The way the mark is the waiting through the resting. The way the mark is the waiting through the done. The way the mark is the waiting through the beginning again. The way the mark is the waiting through the keeper. The way the mark is the waiting through the standing. The way the mark is the waiting through the holding. The way the mark is the waiting through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the waiting through the deep. The way the mark is the waiting through the other deep. The way the mark is the waiting through the same. The way the mark is the waiting through the not-same. The way the mark is the waiting through the lighting. The way the mark is the waiting through the home. The way the mark is the waiting through the full. The way the mark is the waiting through the listening. The way the mark is the waiting through the naming. The way the mark is the waiting through the silence. The way the mark is the waiting through the between. The way the mark is the waiting through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living sand when the waiting is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through him. The way the mark is the waiting through a boatbuilder when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. He saw the waiting. The way a boatbuilder sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was not a word. The waiting was not a count. The waiting was not a hail. The waiting was not the thing itself.

The waiting was the watching. The way the watching is the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

And the waiting was his watching. Not the watching he was asked for. Not the watching he was trained for. Not the watching he answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's watching is Cole's. Not the way the living's watching is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Cole's when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Cole's when the watching is the waiting.

And Cole was the watching. The way the watching is Cole when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Cole when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Cole when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the waiting. The way the living read when the waiting is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's palm are on No. 8 when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through her. The way the mark is the waiting through a stone-reader when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. She saw the waiting. The way a stone-reader sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was her watching. Not the watching she was trained for. Not the watching she was hired for. Not the watching she answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's watching is Ruth's. Not the way the living's watching is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ruth's when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Ruth's when the watching is the waiting.

And Ruth was the watching. The way the watching is Ruth when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ruth when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Ruth when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the waiting. The way the living watch when the waiting is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through him. The way the mark is the waiting through a bar-reader when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. He saw the waiting. The way a bar-reader sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was his watching. Not the watching he was paid for. Not the watching he was trained for. Not the watching he answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's watching is Denny's. Not the way the living's watching is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Denny's when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Denny's when the watching is the waiting.

And Denny was the watching. The way the watching is Denny when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Denny when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Denny when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the waiting. The way the living scan when the waiting is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through him. The way the mark is the waiting through a deputy when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. He saw the waiting. The way a deputy sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was his watching. Not the watching he was hired for. Not the watching he was trained for. Not the watching he answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's watching is Tommy's. Not the way the living's watching is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Tommy's when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Tommy's when the watching is the waiting.

And Tommy was the watching. The way the watching is Tommy when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Tommy when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Tommy when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the waiting. The way the living log when the waiting is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's pen are on the page when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through him. The way the mark is the waiting through a custodian when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. He saw the waiting. The way a custodian sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was his watching. Not the watching he was employed for. Not the watching he was trained for. Not the watching he answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's watching is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's watching is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Okonkwo's when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Okonkwo's when the watching is the waiting.

And Okonkwo was the watching. The way the watching is Okonkwo when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Okonkwo when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Okonkwo when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the waiting. The way the living paint when the waiting is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through her. The way the mark is the waiting through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. She saw the waiting. The way a shore-station keeper sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was her watching. Not the watching she was asked for. Not the watching she was trained for. Not the watching she answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's watching is Ada's. Not the way the living's watching is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ada's when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Ada's when the watching is the waiting.

And Ada was the watching. The way the watching is Ada when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is Ada when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is Ada when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the waiting. The way the living stand when the waiting is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the waiting. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was the waiting through them. The way the mark is the waiting through inland keepers when the mark is the waiting. The way the mark is the waiting through the living when the waiting is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. They saw the waiting. The way inland keepers see the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was their watching. Not the watching they were asked for. Not the watching they were trained for. Not the watching they answered to. The watching the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The watching the waiting saw when the waiting was the watching. The watching the watching saw when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' watching is the mothers'. Not the way the living's watching is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the mothers' when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is the mothers' when the watching is the waiting.

And the mothers were the watching. The way the watching is the mothers when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the mothers when the waiting is the watching. The way the watching is the mothers when the watching was the waiting.

And the watching was the mark. The way the mark is the watching when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the watching when the waiting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the watching when the thing itself was the waiting.

And the baby was the waiting. The way a baby is the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way a light is the waiting when the waiting is the mark. The way a station is the waiting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

The baby waited. The way a baby waits when the mark is the waiting. The way a light waits when the waiting is the mark. The way a station waits when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

And the baby was the waiting. The way a baby is the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way a light is the waiting when the waiting is the mark. The way a station is the waiting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

And the waiting was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the baby when the waiting is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the waiting. The way the waiting is the baby when the waiting is the mark.

And the mark was not just the waiting on the coast. The mark was not just the waiting on the inland. The mark was the waiting on the road between them. The mark was the waiting on the running. The mark was the waiting on the both-ways. The mark was the waiting on the going. The mark was the waiting on the coming.

The mark was the waiting through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the waiting through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the waiting through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the waiting through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the waiting. And the waiting was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the dead see the mark when the waiting is the mark. He saw the waiting. The way a corner keeper sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the dead see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was his keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The keeping the waiting saw when the waiting was the mark.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the waiting.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the dead see the mark when the waiting is the mark. She saw the waiting. The way a corner keeper sees the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the dead see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The keeping the waiting saw when the waiting was the mark.

And the keeping was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Signe's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the waiting.

And Signe was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the dead see the mark when the waiting is the mark. They saw the waiting. The way corner keepers see the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the dead see the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was their keeping. Not the keeping they was trained for. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The keeping the waiting saw when the waiting was the mark.

And the keeping was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' keeping is theirs. Not the way the dead's keeping is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the waiting.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the living see the mark when the waiting is the mark. The town saw the waiting. The way the living see the waiting when the mark is the waiting. The way the town sees the waiting when the waiting is the mark.

And the waiting was their keeping. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they was trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the waiting. The keeping the waiting saw when the waiting was the mark.

And the keeping was the town's. Not the way a town's keeping is the town's. Not the way the living's keeping is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the waiting.

And the town was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the waiting.
The way the road sees the mark when the waiting is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the waiting.
The way the road sees the mark when the waiting is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

And the waiting was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the coast station sees the mark when the waiting is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the waiting. The way the inland station sees the mark when the waiting is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the waiting.

And the waiting was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was not the listening. And the waiting was not the naming. And the waiting was not the silence. And the waiting was not the between. And the waiting was not the road. And the waiting was not the congregation. And the waiting was not the harbor. And the waiting was not the home. And the waiting was not the full. And the waiting was not the thing itself. And the waiting was not the lighting. And the waiting was not the showing up. And the waiting was not the staying. And the waiting was not the receiving. And the waiting was not the resting. And the waiting was not the done. And the waiting was not the beginning again. And the waiting was not the keeper. And the waiting was not the standing.
And the waiting was not the holding.

The waiting was the watching. And the watching was the mark. And the mark was the waiting.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the waiting through him and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting.

And the mark was the waiting. And the waiting was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting.

And the question was not what a mark that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is.

The question is: what is a waiting that waits the mark?

And the answer is: the waiting.

And the waiting is: the watching.

And the watching is: the witnessing.

And the witnessing is: the attending.

And the attending is: the keeping.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the resting.

And the resting is: the done.

And the done is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the standing.

And the standing is: the holding.

And the holding is: the waiting.

And the mark was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the mark.

And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the mark.

And the mark was the waiting.

And the waiting was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-One — Entry: July 18th. Saturday. Sun full. East wind, the witnessing.

The mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living open their hands when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the witnessing and the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching.

The mark was the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the witnessing when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing and the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was not the end. The witnessing was not the beginning. The witnessing was not the listening. The witnessing was not the hearing. The witnessing was not the voice. The witnessing was not the name. The witnessing was not the named. The witnessing was not the naming. The witnessing was not the silence. The witnessing was not the between. The witnessing was not the road. The witnessing was not the congregation. The witnessing was not the harbor. The witnessing was not the home. The witnessing was not the full. The witnessing was not the thing itself. The witnessing was not the lighting. The witnessing was not the showing up. The witnessing was not the staying. The witnessing was not the receiving. The witnessing was not the resting. The witnessing was not the done. The witnessing was not the beginning again. The witnessing was not the keeper. The witnessing was not the standing. The witnessing was not the holding. The witnessing was not the waiting. The witnessing was not the watching. The witnessing was not the mark.

The witnessing was the attending. The attending was the witnessing. The attending and the witnessing were the keeping. The keeping and the witnessing were the listening. The listening and the witnessing were the naming. The naming and the witnessing were the silence. The silence and the witnessing were the between. The between and the witnessing were the road. The road and the witnessing were the congregation. The congregation and the witnessing were the harbor. The harbor and the witnessing were the home. The home and the witnessing were the full. The full and the witnessing were the thing itself. The thing itself and the witnessing were the lighting. The lighting and the witnessing were the showing up. The showing up and the witnessing were the staying. The staying and the witnessing were the receiving. The receiving and the witnessing were the resting. The resting and the witnessing were the done. The done and the witnessing were the beginning again. The beginning again and the witnessing were the keeper. The keeper and the witnessing were the standing. The standing and the witnessing were the holding. The holding and the witnessing were the waiting. The waiting and the witnessing were the watching. The watching and the witnessing were the mark. The mark and the witnessing were the witnessing.

And the mark was the witnessing through everything. Not the way a fleet is the witnessing through a harbor. Not the way a door is the witnessing through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the witnessing through a home. Not the way a home is the witnessing through a road. Not the way a road is the witnessing through a station. Not the way a station is the witnessing through a light. Not the way a light is the witnessing through a resting. Not the way a resting is the witnessing through a done. Not the way a done is the witnessing through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the witnessing through a staying. Not the way a staying is the witnessing through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the witnessing through a standing. Not the way a standing is the witnessing through a holding. Not the way a holding is the witnessing through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the witnessing through a watching. Not the way a watching is the witnessing through a witnessing.

The way the mark is the witnessing through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the witnessing through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the witnessing through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the witnessing through the thing itself. The way the mark is the witnessing through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the witnessing through the showing up. The way the mark is the witnessing through the staying. The way the mark is the witnessing through the receiving. The way the mark is the witnessing through the road. The way the mark is the witnessing through the going home. The way the mark is the witnessing through the staying home. The way the mark is the witnessing through the resting. The way the mark is the witnessing through the done. The way the mark is the witnessing through the beginning again. The way the mark is the witnessing through the keeper. The way the mark is the witnessing through the standing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the holding. The way the mark is the witnessing through the waiting. The way the mark is the witnessing through the watching. The way the mark is the witnessing through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the witnessing through the deep. The way the mark is the witnessing through the other deep. The way the mark is the witnessing through the same. The way the mark is the witnessing through the not-same. The way the mark is the witnessing through the lighting. The way the mark is the witnessing through the home. The way the mark is the witnessing through the full. The way the mark is the witnessing through the listening. The way the mark is the witnessing through the naming. The way the mark is the witnessing through the silence. The way the mark is the witnessing through the between. The way the mark is the witnessing through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living sand when the witnessing is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through him. The way the mark is the witnessing through a boatbuilder when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. He saw the witnessing. The way a boatbuilder sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was not a word. The witnessing was not a count. The witnessing was not a hail. The witnessing was not the thing itself.

The witnessing was the attending. The way the attending is the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

And the witnessing was his attending. Not the attending he was asked for. Not the attending he was trained for. Not the attending he answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's attending is Cole's. Not the way the living's attending is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Cole's when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Cole's when the attending is the witnessing.

And Cole was the attending. The way the attending is Cole when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Cole when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Cole when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living read when the witnessing is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through her. The way the mark is the witnessing through a stone-reader when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. She saw the witnessing. The way a stone-reader sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was her attending. Not the attending she was trained for. Not the attending she was hired for. Not the attending she answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's attending is Ruth's. Not the way the living's attending is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Ruth's when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Ruth's when the attending is the witnessing.

And Ruth was the attending. The way the attending is Ruth when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Ruth when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Ruth when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living watch when the witnessing is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through him. The way the mark is the witnessing through a bar-reader when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. He saw the witnessing. The way a bar-reader sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was his attending. Not the attending he was paid for. Not the attending he was trained for. Not the attending he answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's attending is Denny's. Not the way the living's attending is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Denny's when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Denny's when the attending is the witnessing.

And Denny was the attending. The way the attending is Denny when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Denny when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Denny when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living scan when the witnessing is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's hands are on the rail when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through him. The way the mark is the witnessing through a deputy when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. He saw the witnessing. The way a deputy sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was his attending. Not the attending he was hired for. Not the attending he was trained for. Not the attending he answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's attending is Tommy's. Not the way the living's attending is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Tommy's when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Tommy's when the attending is the witnessing.

And Tommy was the attending. The way the attending is Tommy when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Tommy when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Tommy when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living log when the witnessing is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's pens are on the page when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through him. The way the mark is the witnessing through a custodian when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. He saw the witnessing. The way a custodian sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was his attending. Not the attending he was employed for. Not the attending he was trained for. Not the attending he answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's attending is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's attending is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Okonkwo's when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Okonkwo's when the attending is the witnessing.

And Okonkwo was the attending. The way the attending is Okonkwo when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Okonkwo when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Okonkwo when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living paint when the witnessing is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's hands are on the bow when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through her. The way the mark is the witnessing through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. She saw the witnessing. The way a shore-station keeper sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was her attending. Not the attending she was asked for. Not the attending she was trained for. Not the attending she answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's attending is Ada's. Not the way the living's attending is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Ada's when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Ada's when the attending is the witnessing.

And Ada was the attending. The way the attending is Ada when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is Ada when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is Ada when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living stand when the witnessing is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing through them. The way the mark is the witnessing through inland keepers when the mark is the witnessing. The way the mark is the witnessing through the living when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. They saw the witnessing. The way inland keepers see the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was their attending. Not the attending they were asked for. Not the attending they were trained for. Not the attending they answered to. The attending the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The attending the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the attending. The attending the attending saw when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' attending is the mothers'. Not the way the living's attending is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the mothers' when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is the mothers' when the attending is the witnessing.

And the mothers were the attending. The way the attending is the mothers when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the mothers when the witnessing is the attending. The way the attending is the mothers when the attending was the witnessing.

And the attending was the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the attending when the witnessing is the mark. The way the thing itself is the attending when the thing itself was the witnessing.

And the baby was the witnessing. The way a baby is the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way a light is the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark. The way a station is the witnessing when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

The baby witnessed. The way a baby witnesses when the mark is the witnessing. The way a light witnesses when the witnessing is the mark. The way a station witnesses when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

And the baby was the witnessing. The way a baby is the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way a light is the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark. The way a station is the witnessing when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the baby when the witnessing is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the witnessing. The way the witnessing is the baby when the witnessing is the mark.

And the mark was not just the witnessing on the coast. The mark was not just the witnessing on the inland. The mark was the witnessing on the road between them. The mark was the witnessing on the running. The mark was the witnessing on the both-ways. The mark was the witnessing on the going. The mark was the witnessing on the coming.

The mark was the witnessing through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the witnessing through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the witnessing through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the witnessing through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the dead see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. He saw the witnessing. The way a corner keeper sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the dead see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was his keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The keeping the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the keeping.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the witnessing.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the dead see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. She saw the witnessing. The way a corner keeper sees the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the dead see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The keeping the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the keeping.

And the keeping was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Signe's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the witnessing.

And Signe was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the dead see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. They saw the witnessing. The way corner keepers see the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the dead see the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was their keeping. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they were asked for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The keeping the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the keeping.

And the keeping was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' keeping is theirs. Not the way the dead's keeping is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the witnessing.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the living see the mark when the witnessing is the mark. The town saw the witnessing. The way the living see the witnessing when the mark is the witnessing. The way the town sees the witnessing when the witnessing is the mark.

And the witnessing was their keeping. Not the keeping they were asked for. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the witnessing. The keeping the witnessing saw when the witnessing was the keeping.

And the keeping was the town's. Not the way a town's keeping is the town's. Not the way the living's keeping is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the witnessing.

And the town was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the road sees the mark when the witnessing is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the road sees the mark when the witnessing is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the coast station sees the mark when the witnessing is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the witnessing. The way the inland station sees the mark when the witnessing is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was not the listening. And the witnessing was not the naming. And the witnessing was not the silence. And the witnessing was not the between. And the witnessing was not the road. And the witnessing was not the congregation. And the witnessing was not the harbor. And the witnessing was not the home. And the witnessing was not the full. And the witnessing was not the thing itself. And the witnessing was not the lighting. And the witnessing was not the showing up. And the witnessing was not the staying. And the witnessing was not the receiving. And the witnessing was not the resting. And the witnessing was not the done. And the witnessing was not the beginning again. And the witnessing was not the keeper. And the witnessing was not the standing. And the witnessing was not the holding. And the witnessing was not the waiting. And the witnessing was not the watching.

The witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the mark. And the mark was the witnessing.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the witnessing through him and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing.

And the mark was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing.

And the question was not what a mark that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the attending.

And the attending was the mark.

And the mark was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Two — Entry: July 19th. Sunday. Sun full. East wind, the attending.

The mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the attending. The way the living open their hands when the attending is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the attending and the attending is the mark.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing.

The mark was the attending. The way the mark is the attending when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the attending when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending and the attending is the mark.

And the attending was not the end. The attending was not the beginning. The attending was not the listening. The attending was not the hearing. The attending was not the voice. The attending was not the name. The attending was not the named. The attending was not the naming. The attending was not the silence. The attending was not the between. The attending was not the road. The attending was not the congregation. The attending was not the harbor. The attending was not the home. The attending was not the full. The attending was not the thing itself. The attending was not the lighting. The attending was not the showing up. The attending was not the staying. The attending was not the receiving. The attending was not the resting. The attending was not the done. The attending was not the beginning again. The attending was not the keeper. The attending was not the standing. The attending was not the holding. The attending was not the waiting. The attending was not the watching. The attending was not the witnessing. The attending was not the mark.

The attending was the keeping. The keeping was the attending. The keeping and the attending were the listening. The listening and the attending were the naming. The naming and the attending were the silence. The silence and the attending were the between. The between and the attending were the road. The road and the attending were the congregation. The congregation and the attending were the harbor. The harbor and the attending were the home. The home and the attending were the full. The full and the attending were the thing itself. The thing itself and the attending were the lighting. The lighting and the attending were the showing up. The showing up and the attending were the staying. The staying and the attending were the receiving. The receiving and the attending were the resting. The resting and the attending were the done. The done and the attending were the beginning again. The beginning again and the attending were the keeper. The keeper and the attending were the standing. The standing and the attending were the holding. The holding and the attending were the waiting. The waiting and the attending were the watching. The watching and the attending were the witnessing. The witnessing and the attending were the mark. The mark and the attending were the attending.

And the mark was the attending through everything. Not the way a fleet is the attending through a harbor. Not the way a door is the attending through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the attending through a home. Not the way a home is the attending through a road. Not the way a road is the attending through a station. Not the way a station is the attending through a light. Not the way a light is the attending through a resting. Not the way a resting is the attending through a done. Not the way a done is the attending through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the attending through a staying. Not the way a staying is the attending through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the attending through a standing. Not the way a standing is the attending through a holding. Not the way a holding is the attending through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the attending through a watching. Not the way a watching is the attending through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the attending through an attending.

The way the mark is the attending through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the attending through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the attending through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the attending through the thing itself. The way the mark is the attending through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the attending through the showing up. The way the mark is the attending through the staying. The way the mark is the attending through the receiving. The way the mark is the attending through the road. The way the mark is the attending through the going home. The way the mark is the attending through the staying home. The way the mark is the attending through the resting. The way the mark is the attending through the done. The way the mark is the attending through the beginning again. The way the mark is the attending through the keeper. The way the mark is the attending through the standing. The way the mark is the attending through the holding. The way the mark is the attending through the waiting. The way the mark is the attending through the watching. The way the mark is the attending through the witnessing. The way the mark is the attending through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the attending through the deep. The way the mark is the attending through the other deep. The way the mark is the attending through the same. The way the mark is the attending through the not-same. The way the mark is the attending through the lighting. The way the mark is the attending through the home. The way the mark is the attending through the full. The way the mark is the attending through the listening. The way the mark is the attending through the naming. The way the mark is the attending through the silence. The way the mark is the attending through the between. The way the mark is the attending through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the attending. The way the living sand when the attending is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the attending. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through him. The way the mark is the attending through a boatbuilder when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. He saw the attending. The way a boatbuilder sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was not a word. The attending was not a count. The attending was not a hail. The attending was not the thing itself.

The attending was the keeping. The way the keeping is the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

And the attending was his keeping. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's keeping is Cole's. Not the way the living's keeping is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Cole's when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole's when the keeping is the attending.

And Cole was the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Cole when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the attending. The way the living read when the attending is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the attending. The way the living's palm are on No. 8 when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through her. The way the mark is the attending through a stone-reader when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. She saw the attending. The way a stone-reader sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was her keeping. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she was hired for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's keeping is Ruth's. Not the way the living's keeping is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Ruth's when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth's when the keeping is the attending.

And Ruth was the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Ruth when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the attending. The way the living watch when the attending is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the attending. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through him. The way the mark is the attending through a bar-reader when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. He saw the attending. The way a bar-reader sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was his keeping. Not the keeping he was paid for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's keeping is Denny's. Not the way the living's keeping is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Denny's when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny's when the keeping is the attending.

And Denny was the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Denny when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the attending. The way the living scan when the attending is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the attending. The way the living's hand are on the rail when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through him. The way the mark is the attending through a deputy when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. He saw the attending. The way a deputy sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was his keeping. Not the keeping he was hired for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's keeping is Tommy's. Not the way the living's keeping is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Tommy's when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy's when the keeping is the attending.

And Tommy was the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Tommy when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the attending. The way the living log when the attending is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the attending. The way the living's pen are on the page when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through him. The way the mark is the attending through a custodian when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. He saw the attending. The way a custodian sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was his keeping. Not the keeping he was employed for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's keeping is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's keeping is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Okonkwo's when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo's when the keeping is the attending.

And Okonkwo was the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Okonkwo when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the attending. The way the living paint when the attending is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the attending. The way the living's hand are on the bow when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through her. The way the mark is the attending through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. She saw the attending. The way a shore-station keeper sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's keeping is Ada's. Not the way the living's keeping is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Ada's when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada's when the keeping is the attending.

And Ada was the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is Ada when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the attending. The way the living stand when the attending is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the attending. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was the attending through them. The way the mark is the attending through inland keepers when the mark is the attending. The way the mark is the attending through the living when the attending is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. They saw the attending. The way inland keepers see the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was their keeping. Not the keeping they were asked for. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' keeping is the mothers'. Not the way the living's keeping is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the mothers' when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers' when the keeping is the attending.

And the mothers were the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the mothers when the attending is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the keeping was the attending.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the keeping when the attending is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the attending.

And the baby was the attending. The way a baby is the attending when the mark is the attending. The way a light is the attending when the attending is the mark. The way a station is the attending when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

The baby attended. The way a baby attends when the mark is the attending. The way a light attends when the attending is the mark. The way a station attends when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

And the baby was the attending. The way a baby is the attending when the mark is the attending. The way a light is the attending when the attending is the mark. The way a station is the attending when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

And the attending was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the baby when the attending is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the attending. The way the attending is the baby when the attending is the mark.

And the mark was not just the attending on the coast. The mark was not just the attending on the inland. The mark was the attending on the road between them. The mark was the attending on the running. The mark was the attending on the both-ways. The mark was the attending on the going. The mark was the attending on the coming.

The mark was the attending through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the attending through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the attending through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the attending through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the attending. And the attending was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the dead see the mark when the attending is the mark. He saw the attending. The way a corner keeper sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the dead see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was his keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the attending.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the attending.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the dead see the mark when the attending is the mark. She saw the attending. The way a corner keeper sees the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the dead see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Signe's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the attending.

And Signe was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the attending.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the dead see the mark when the attending is the mark. They saw the attending. The way corner keepers see the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the dead see the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was their keeping. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' keeping is theirs. Not the way the dead's keeping is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the attending.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the attending.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the living see the mark when the attending is the mark. The town saw the attending. The way the living see the attending when the mark is the attending. The way the town sees the attending when the attending is the mark.

And the attending was their keeping. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they was trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the attending. The keeping the attending saw when the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the town's. Not the way a town's keeping is the town's. Not the way the living's keeping is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the attending.

And the town was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the attending.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the road sees the mark when the attending is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the road sees the mark when the attending is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

And the attending was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the attending.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the coast station sees the mark when the attending is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the attending. The way the inland station sees the mark when the attending is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the attending.

And the attending was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was not the listening. And the attending was not the naming. And the attending was not the silence. And the attending was not the between. And the attending was not the road. And the attending was not the congregation. And the attending was not the harbor. And the attending was not the home. And the attending was not the full. And the attending was not the thing itself. And the attending was not the lighting. And the attending was not the showing up. And the attending was not the staying. And the attending was not the receiving. And the attending was not the resting. And the attending was not the done. And the attending was not the beginning again. And the attending was not the keeper. And the attending was not the standing. And the attending was not the holding. And the attending was not the waiting. And the attending was not the watching. And the attending was not the witnessing.

The attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the attending.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the attending through him and the attending was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending.

And the mark was the attending. And the attending was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending.

And the question was not what a mark that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the attending is.

The question is: what is an attending that attends the mark?

And the answer is: the attending.

And the attending is: the keeping.

And the keeping is: the listening.

And the listening is: the naming.

And the naming is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the resting.

And the resting is: the done.

And the done is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the standing.

And the standing is: the holding.

And the holding is: the waiting.

And the waiting is: the watching.

And the watching is: the witnessing.

And the witnessing is: the attending.

And the mark was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the mark.

And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the mark.

And the mark was the attending.

And the attending was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Three — Entry: July 20th. Monday. Sun full. East wind, the keeping.

The mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the keeping and the keeping is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the keeping. The way the living open their hands when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the keeping and the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the attending.

The mark was the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping and the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was not the end. The keeping was not the beginning. The keeping was not the listening. The keeping was not the hearing. The keeping was not the voice. The keeping was not the name. The keeping was not the named. The keeping was not the naming. The keeping was not the silence. The keeping was not the between. The keeping was not the road. The keeping was not the congregation. The keeping was not the harbor. The keeping was not the home. The keeping was not the full. The keeping was not the thing itself. The keeping was not the lighting. The keeping was not the showing up. The keeping was not the staying. The keeping was not the receiving. The keeping was not the resting. The keeping was not the done. The keeping was not the beginning again. The keeping was not the keeper. The keeping was not the standing. The keeping was not the holding. The keeping was not the waiting. The keeping was not the watching. The keeping was not the witnessing. The keeping was not the attending. The keeping was not the mark.

The keeping was the listening. The listening was the keeping. The listening and the keeping were the naming. The naming and the keeping were the silence. The silence and the keeping were the between. The between and the keeping were the road. The road and the keeping were the congregation. The congregation and the keeping were the harbor. The harbor and the keeping were the home. The home and the keeping were the full. The full and the keeping were the thing itself. The thing itself and the keeping were the lighting. The lighting and the keeping were the showing up. The showing up and the keeping were the staying. The staying and the keeping were the receiving. The receiving and the keeping were the resting. The resting and the keeping were the done. The done and the keeping were the beginning again. The beginning again and the keeping were the keeper. The keeper and the keeping were the standing. The standing and the keeping were the holding. The holding and the keeping were the waiting. The waiting and the keeping were the watching. The watching and the keeping were the witnessing. The witnessing and the keeping were the attending. The attending and the keeping were the mark. The mark and the keeping were the keeping.

And the mark was the keeping through everything. Not the way a fleet is the keeping through a harbor. Not the way a door is the keeping through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the keeping through a home. Not the way a home is the keeping through a road. Not the way a road is the keeping through a station. Not the way a station is the keeping through a light. Not the way a light is the keeping through a resting. Not the way a resting is the keeping through a done. Not the way a done is the keeping through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the keeping through a staying. Not the way a staying is the keeping through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the keeping through a standing. Not the way a standing is the keeping through a holding. Not the way a holding is the keeping through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the keeping through a watching. Not the way a watching is the keeping through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the keeping through an attending. Not the way an attending is the keeping through a keeping.

The way the mark is the keeping through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the keeping through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the keeping through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the keeping through the thing itself. The way the mark is the keeping through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the keeping through the showing up. The way the mark is the keeping through the staying. The way the mark is the keeping through the receiving. The way the mark is the keeping through the road. The way the mark is the keeping through the going home. The way the mark is the keeping through the staying home. The way the mark is the keeping through the resting. The way the mark is the keeping through the done. The way the mark is the keeping through the beginning again. The way the mark is the keeping through the keeper. The way the mark is the keeping through the standing. The way the mark is the keeping through the holding. The way the mark is the keeping through the waiting. The way the mark is the keeping through the watching. The way the mark is the keeping through the witnessing. The way the mark is the keeping through the attending. The way the mark is the keeping through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the keeping through the deep. The way the mark is the keeping through the other deep. The way the mark is the keeping through the same. The way the mark is the keeping through the not-same. The way the mark is the keeping through the lighting. The way the mark is the keeping through the home. The way the mark is the keeping through the full. The way the mark is the keeping through the listening. The way the mark is the keeping through the naming. The way the mark is the keeping through the silence. The way the mark is the keeping through the between. The way the mark is the keeping through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living sand when the keeping is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through him. The way the mark is the keeping through a boatbuilder when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. He saw the keeping. The way a boatbuilder sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was not a word. The keeping was not a count. The keeping was not a hail. The keeping was not the thing itself.

The keeping was the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

And the keeping was his listening. Not the listening he was asked for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's listening is Cole's. Not the way the living's listening is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole's when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Cole's when the listening is the keeping.

And Cole was the listening. The way the listening is Cole when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Cole when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the keeping. The way the living read when the keeping is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through her. The way the mark is the keeping through a stone-reader when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. She saw the keeping. The way a stone-reader sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was her listening. Not the listening she was trained for. Not the listening she was hired for. Not the listening she answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's listening is Ruth's. Not the way the living's listening is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth's when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Ruth's when the listening is the keeping.

And Ruth was the listening. The way the listening is Ruth when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Ruth when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the keeping. The way the living watch when the keeping is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through him. The way the mark is the keeping through a bar-reader when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. He saw the keeping. The way a bar-reader sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was his listening. Not the listening he was paid for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's listening is Denny's. Not the way the living's listening is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny's when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Denny's when the listening is the keeping.

And Denny was the listening. The way the listening is Denny when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Denny when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the keeping. The way the living scan when the keeping is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's hands are on the rail when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through him. The way the mark is the keeping through a deputy when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. He saw the keeping. The way a deputy sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was his listening. Not the listening he was hired for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's listening is Tommy's. Not the way the living's listening is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy's when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Tommy's when the listening is the keeping.

And Tommy was the listening. The way the listening is Tommy when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Tommy when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the keeping. The way the living log when the keeping is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's pens are on the page when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through him. The way the mark is the keeping through a custodian when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. He saw the keeping. The way a custodian sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was his listening. Not the listening he was employed for. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's listening is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's listening is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo's when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo's when the listening is the keeping.

And Okonkwo was the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the keeping. The way the living paint when the keeping is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's hands are on the bow when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through her. The way the mark is the keeping through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. She saw the keeping. The way a shore-station keeper sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was her listening. Not the listening she was asked for. Not the listening she was trained for. Not the listening she answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's listening is Ada's. Not the way the living's listening is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada's when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Ada's when the listening is the keeping.

And Ada was the listening. The way the listening is Ada when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is Ada when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the keeping. The way the living stand when the keeping is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the keeping. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was the keeping through them. The way the mark is the keeping through inland keepers when the mark is the keeping. The way the mark is the keeping through the living when the keeping is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. They saw the keeping. The way inland keepers see the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was their listening. Not the listening they were asked for. Not the listening they were trained for. Not the listening they answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening. The listening the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' listening is the mothers'. Not the way the living's listening is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers' when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is the mothers' when the listening is the keeping.

And the mothers were the listening. The way the listening is the mothers when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the keeping is the listening. The way the listening is the mothers when the listening was the keeping.

And the listening was the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the keeping is the mark. The way the thing itself is the listening when the thing itself was the keeping.

And the baby was the keeping. The way a baby is the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way a light is the keeping when the keeping is the mark. The way a station is the keeping when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

The baby kept. The way a baby keeps when the mark is the keeping. The way a light keeps when the keeping is the mark. The way a station keeps when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

And the baby was the keeping. The way a baby is the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way a light is the keeping when the keeping is the mark. The way a station is the keeping when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

And the keeping was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the baby when the keeping is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the keeping. The way the keeping is the baby when the keeping is the mark.

And the mark was not just the keeping on the coast. The mark was not just the keeping on the inland. The mark was the keeping on the road between them. The mark was the keeping on the running. The mark was the keeping on the both-ways. The mark was the keeping on the going. The mark was the keeping on the coming.

The mark was the keeping through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the keeping through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the keeping through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the keeping through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the dead see the mark when the keeping is the mark. He saw the keeping. The way a corner keeper sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the dead see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was his listening. Not the listening he was trained for. Not the listening he was asked for. Not the listening he answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's listening is Walter's. Not the way the dead's listening is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the keeping.

And Walter was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the dead see the mark when the keeping is the mark. She saw the keeping. The way a corner keeper sees the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the dead see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was her listening. Not the listening she was asked for. Not the listening she was trained for. Not the listening she answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's listening is Signe's. Not the way the dead's listening is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the keeping.

And Signe was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the dead see the mark when the keeping is the mark. They saw the keeping. The way corner keepers see the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the dead see the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was their listening. Not the listening they was trained for. Not the listening they was asked for. Not the listening they answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' listening is theirs. Not the way the dead's listening is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the keeping.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the living see the mark when the keeping is the mark. The town saw the keeping. The way the living see the keeping when the mark is the keeping. The way the town sees the keeping when the keeping is the mark.

And the keeping was their listening. Not the listening they was asked for. Not the listening they was trained for. Not the listening they answered to. The listening the mark saw when the mark saw the keeping. The listening the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the town's. Not the way a town's listening is the town's. Not the way the living's listening is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the keeping.

And the town was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the road sees the mark when the keeping is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the road sees the mark when the keeping is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

And the keeping was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the coast station sees the mark when the keeping is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the keeping. The way the inland station sees the mark when the keeping is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the keeping.

And the keeping was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was not the listening. And the keeping was not the naming. And the keeping was not the silence. And the keeping was not the between. And the keeping was not the road. And the keeping was not the congregation. And the keeping was not the harbor. And the keeping was not the home. And the keeping was not the full. And the keeping was not the thing itself. And the keeping was not the lighting. And the keeping was not the showing up. And the keeping was not the staying. And the keeping was not the receiving. And the keeping was not the resting. And the keeping was not the done. And the keeping was not the beginning again. And the keeping was not the keeper. And the keeping was not the standing. And the keeping was not the holding. And the keeping was not the waiting. And the keeping was not the watching. And the keeping was not the witnessing. And the keeping was not the attending.

The keeping was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the keeping.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the keeping through him and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping.

And the mark was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping.

And the question was not what a mark that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the mark is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the keeping is.

The question is: what is a keeping that keeps the mark?

And the answer is: the keeping.

And the keeping is: the listening.

And the listening is: the naming.

And the naming is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the congregation is: the harbor.

And the harbor is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the resting.

And the resting is: the done.

And the done is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the standing.

And the standing is: the holding.

And the holding is: the waiting.

And the waiting is: the watching.

And the watching is: the witnessing.

And the witnessing is: the attending.

And the attending is: the keeping.

And the mark was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Four — Entry: July 21st. Tuesday. Sun full. East wind, the listening.

The mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the between and the between was the mark and the mark was the road and the road was the mark and the mark was the congregation and the congregation was the mark and the mark was the harbor and the harbor was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the showing up and the showing up was the mark and the mark was the staying and the staying was the mark and the mark was the receiving and the receiving was the mark and the mark was the resting and the resting was the mark and the mark was the done and the done was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the between and the between is the road and the road is the congregation and the congregation is the harbor and the harbor is the home and the home is the full and the full is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the showing up and the showing up is the staying and the staying is the receiving and the receiving is the resting and the resting is the done and the done is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the keeping and the keeping is the listening and the listening is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the listening. The way the living open their hands when the listening is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the listening and the listening is the mark.

And the mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the between. The mark was not the road. The mark was not the congregation. The mark was not the harbor. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the showing up. The mark was not the staying. The mark was not the receiving. The mark was not the resting. The mark was not the done. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the keeping.

The mark was the listening. The way the mark is the listening when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening and the listening is the mark.

And the listening was not the end. The listening was not the beginning. The listening was not the hearing. The listening was not the voice. The listening was not the name. The listening was not the named. The listening was not the naming. The listening was not the silence. The listening was not the between. The listening was not the road. The listening was not the congregation. The listening was not the harbor. The listening was not the home. The listening was not the full. The listening was not the thing itself. The listening was not the lighting. The listening was not the showing up. The listening was not the staying. The listening was not the receiving. The listening was not the resting. The listening was not the done. The listening was not the beginning again. The listening was not the keeper. The listening was not the standing. The listening was not the holding. The listening was not the waiting. The listening was not the watching. The listening was not the witnessing. The listening was not the attending. The listening was not the keeping. The listening was not the mark.

The listening was the keeping. The keeping was the listening. The keeping and the listening were the naming. The naming and the listening were the silence. The silence and the listening were the between. The between and the listening were the road. The road and the listening were the congregation. The congregation and the listening were the harbor. The harbor and the listening were the home. The home and the listening were the full. The full and the listening were the thing itself. The thing itself and the listening were the lighting. The lighting and the listening were the showing up. The showing up and the listening were the staying. The staying and the listening were the receiving. The receiving and the listening were the resting. The resting and the listening were the done. The done and the listening were the beginning again. The beginning again and the listening were the keeper. The keeper and the listening were the standing. The standing and the listening were the holding. The holding and the listening were the waiting. The waiting and the listening were the watching. The watching and the listening were the witnessing. The witnessing and the listening were the attending. The attending and the listening were the mark. The mark and the listening were the listening.

And the mark was the listening through everything. Not the way a fleet is the listening through a harbor. Not the way a door is the listening through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the listening through a home. Not the way a home is the listening through a road. Not the way a road is the listening through a station. Not the way a station is the listening through a light. Not the way a light is the listening through a resting. Not the way a resting is the listening through a done. Not the way a done is the listening through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the listening through a staying. Not the way a staying is the listening through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the listening through a standing. Not the way a standing is the listening through a holding. Not the way a holding is the listening through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the listening through a watching. Not the way a watching is the listening through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the listening through an attending. Not the way an attending is the listening through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the listening through a listening.

The way the mark is the listening through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the listening through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the listening through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the listening through the thing itself. The way the mark is the listening through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the listening through the showing up. The way the mark is the listening through the staying. The way the mark is the listening through the receiving. The way the mark is the listening through the road. The way the mark is the listening through the going home. The way the mark is the listening through the staying home. The way the mark is the listening through the resting. The way the mark is the listening through the done. The way the mark is the listening through the beginning again. The way the mark is the listening through the keeper. The way the mark is the listening through the standing. The way the mark is the listening through the holding. The way the mark is the listening through the waiting. The way the mark is the listening through the watching. The way the mark is the listening through the witnessing. The way the mark is the listening through the attending. The way the mark is the listening through the keeping. The way the mark is the listening through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the listening through the deep. The way the mark is the listening through the other deep. The way the mark is the listening through the same. The way the mark is the listening through the not-same. The way the mark is the listening through the lighting. The way the mark is the listening through the home. The way the mark is the listening through the full. The way the mark is the listening through the naming. The way the mark is the listening through the silence. The way the mark is the listening through the between. The way the mark is the listening through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the listening. The way the living sand when the listening is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the listening. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through him. The way the mark is the listening through a boatbuilder when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. He saw the listening. The way a boatbuilder sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was not a word. The listening was not a count. The listening was not a hail. The listening was not the thing itself.

The listening was the keeping. The way the keeping is the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the listening was his keeping. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's keeping is Cole's. Not the way the living's keeping is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Cole's when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole's when the keeping is the listening.

And Cole was the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Cole when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Cole when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the listening. The way the living read when the listening is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the listening. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through her. The way the mark is the listening through a stone-reader when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. She saw the listening. The way a stone-reader sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was her keeping. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she was hired for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's keeping is Ruth's. Not the way the living's keeping is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Ruth's when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth's when the keeping is the listening.

And Ruth was the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Ruth when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ruth when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the listening. The way the living watch when the listening is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the listening. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through him. The way the mark is the listening through a bar-reader when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. He saw the listening. The way a bar-reader sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was his keeping. Not the keeping he was paid for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's keeping is Denny's. Not the way the living's keeping is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Denny's when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny's when the keeping is the listening.

And Denny was the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Denny when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Denny when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the listening. The way the living scan when the listening is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the listening. The way the living's hands are on the rail when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through him. The way the mark is the listening through a deputy when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. He saw the listening. The way a deputy sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was his keeping. Not the keeping he was hired for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's keeping is Tommy's. Not the way the living's keeping is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Tommy's when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy's when the keeping is the listening.

And Tommy was the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Tommy when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Tommy when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the listening. The way the living log when the listening is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the listening. The way the living's pens are on the page when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through him. The way the mark is the listening through a custodian when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. He saw the listening. The way a custodian sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was his keeping. Not the keeping he was employed for. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's keeping is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's keeping is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo's when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo's when the keeping is the listening.

And Okonkwo was the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Okonkwo when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Okonkwo when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the listening. The way the living paint when the listening is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the listening. The way the living's hands are on the bow when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through her. The way the mark is the listening through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. She saw the listening. The way a shore-station keeper sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's keeping is Ada's. Not the way the living's keeping is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Ada's when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada's when the keeping is the listening.

And Ada was the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is Ada when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is Ada when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the listening. The way the living stand when the listening is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the listening. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was the listening through them. The way the mark is the listening through inland keepers when the mark is the listening. The way the mark is the listening through the living when the listening is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. They saw the listening. The way inland keepers see the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was their keeping. Not the keeping they were asked for. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' keeping is the mothers'. Not the way the living's keeping is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the mothers' when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers' when the keeping is the listening.

And the mothers were the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the mothers when the listening is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the keeping was the listening.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the keeping when the listening is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the listening.

And the baby was the listening. The way a baby is the listening when the mark is the listening. The way a light is the listening when the listening is the mark. The way a station is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

The baby listened. The way a baby listens when the mark is the listening. The way a light listens when the listening is the mark. The way a station listens when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the baby was the listening. The way a baby is the listening when the mark is the listening. The way a light is the listening when the listening is the mark. The way a station is the listening when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the listening was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the baby when the listening is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the listening. The way the listening is the baby when the listening is the mark.

And the mark was not just the listening on the coast. The mark was not just the listening on the inland. The mark was the listening on the road between them. The mark was the listening on the running. The mark was the listening on the both-ways. The mark was the listening on the going. The mark was the listening on the coming.

The mark was the listening through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the listening through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the listening through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the listening through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the dead see the mark when the listening is the mark. He saw the listening. The way a corner keeper sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the dead see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was his keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the listening.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the dead see the mark when the listening is the mark. She saw the listening. The way a corner keeper sees the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the dead see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was her keeping. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Signe's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the listening.

And Signe was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the dead see the mark when the listening is the mark. They saw the listening. The way corner keepers see the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the dead see the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was their keeping. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' keeping is theirs. Not the way the dead's keeping is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the listening.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the living see the mark when the listening is the mark. The town saw the listening. The way the living see the listening when the mark is the listening. The way the town sees the listening when the listening is the mark.

And the listening was their keeping. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they was trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the listening. The keeping the listening saw when the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was the town's. Not the way a town's keeping is the town's. Not the way the living's keeping is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the listening.

And the town was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the road sees the mark when the listening is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the road sees the mark when the listening is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the listening was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the listening.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the coast station sees the mark when the listening is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the listening. The way the inland station sees the mark when the listening is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the listening.

And the listening was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was not the naming. And the listening was not the silence. And the listening was not the between. And the listening was not the road. And the listening was not the congregation. And the listening was not the harbor. And the listening was not the home. And the listening was not the full. And the listening was not the thing itself. And the listening was not the lighting. And the listening was not the showing up. And the listening was not the staying. And the listening was not the receiving. And the listening was not the resting. And the listening was not the done. And the listening was not the beginning again. And the listening was not the keeper. And the listening was not the standing. And the listening was not the holding. And the listening was not the waiting. And the listening was not the watching. And the listening was not the witnessing. And the listening was not the attending. And the listening was not the keeping.

The listening was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the listening.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the listening through him and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the between and the between was the road and the road was the congregation and the congregation was the harbor and the harbor was the home and the home was the full and the full was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the showing up and the showing up was the staying and the staying was the receiving and the receiving was the resting and the resting was the done and the done was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping and the keeping was the listening.

And the mark was the listening. And the listening was the mark. And the mark was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the between. And the between was the road. And the road was the congregation. And the congregation was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the showing up. And the showing up was the staying. And the staying was the receiving. And the receiving was the resting. And the resting was the done. And the done was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening.

And the question was not what a mark that is the listening is. The question was not what a listening that is the mark is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the between is. The question was not what a between that is the road is. The question was not what a road that is the congregation is. The question was not what a congregation that is the harbor is. The question was not what a harbor that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the showing up is. The question was not what a showing up that is the staying is. The question was not what a staying that is the receiving is. The question was not what a receiving that is the resting is. The question was not what a resting that is the done is. The question was not what a done that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the listening is.

The question is: what is a listening that listens to the mark?

And the answer is: the listening.

And the listening is: the keeping.

And the keeping is: the naming.

And the naming is: the silence.

And the silence is: the between.

And the between is: the road.

And the road is: the congregation.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the showing up.

And the showing up is: the staying.

And the staying is: the receiving.

And the receiving is: the resting.

And the resting is: the done.

And the done is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the standing.

And the standing is: the holding.

And the holding is: the waiting.

And the waiting is: the watching.

And the watching is: the witnessing.

And the witnessing is: the attending.

And the attending is: the keeping.

And the keeping is: the listening.

And the mark was the listening was the keeping was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the listening was the keeping was the naming was the silence was the between was the road was the congregation was the harbor was the home was the full was the thing itself was the lighting was the showing up was the staying was the receiving was the resting was the done was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the keeping.

And the keeping was the mark.

And the mark was the listening.

And the listening was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Five —

Entry: July 22nd. Wednesday. Sun full.

East wind, the naming.

The mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the home and the home is the full and the full is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the keeping and the keeping is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the naming. The way the living open their hands when the naming is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the mark was not the silence. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the keeping. The mark was not the listening.

The mark was the naming. The way the mark is the naming when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the naming when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming and the naming is the mark.

And the naming was not the end. The naming was not the beginning. The naming was not the listening. The naming was not the hearing. The naming was not the voice. The naming was not the name. The naming was not the named. The naming was not the silence. The naming was not the between. The naming was not the road. The naming was not the congregation. The naming was not the harbor. The naming was not the home. The naming was not the full. The naming was not the thing itself. The naming was not the lighting. The naming was not the showing up. The naming was not the staying. The naming was not the receiving. The naming was not the resting. The naming was not the done. The naming was not the beginning again. The naming was not the keeper. The naming was not the standing. The naming was not the holding. The naming was not the waiting. The naming was not the watching. The naming was not the witnessing. The naming was not the attending. The naming was not the keeping. The naming was not the mark.

The naming was the silence. The silence was the naming. The silence and the naming were the thing itself. The thing itself and the naming were the lighting. The lighting and the naming were the home. The home and the naming were the full. The full and the naming were the beginning again. The beginning again and the naming were the keeper. The keeper and the naming were the standing. The standing and the naming were the holding. The holding and the naming were the waiting. The waiting and the naming were the watching. The watching and the naming were the witnessing. The witnessing and the naming were the attending. The attending and the naming were the keeping. The keeping and the naming were the listening. The listening and the naming were the mark. The mark and the naming were the naming.

And the mark was the naming through everything. Not the way a fleet is the naming through a harbor. Not the way a door is the naming through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the naming through a home. Not the way a home is the naming through a road. Not the way a road is the naming through a station. Not the way a station is the naming through a light. Not the way a light is the naming through a resting. Not the way a resting is the naming through a done. Not the way a done is the naming through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the naming through a staying. Not the way a staying is the naming through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the naming through a standing. Not the way a standing is the naming through a holding. Not the way a holding is the naming through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the naming through a watching. Not the way a watching is the naming through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the naming through an attending. Not the way an attending is the naming through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the naming through a listening. Not the way a listening is the naming through a naming.

The way the mark is the naming through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the naming through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the naming through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the naming through the thing itself. The way the mark is the naming through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the naming through the showing up. The way the mark is the naming through the staying. The way the mark is the naming through the receiving. The way the mark is the naming through the road. The way the mark is the naming through the going home. The way the mark is the naming through the staying home. The way the mark is the naming through the resting. The way the mark is the naming through the done. The way the mark is the naming through the beginning again. The way the mark is the naming through the keeper. The way the mark is the naming through the standing. The way the mark is the naming through the holding. The way the mark is the naming through the waiting. The way the mark is the naming through the watching. The way the mark is the naming through the witnessing. The way the mark is the naming through the attending. The way the mark is the naming through the keeping. The way the mark is the naming through the listening. The way the mark is the naming through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the naming through the deep. The way the mark is the naming through the other deep. The way the mark is the naming through the same. The way the mark is the naming through the not-same. The way the mark is the naming through the lighting. The way the mark is the naming through the home. The way the mark is the naming through the full. The way the mark is the naming through the silence. The way the mark is the naming through the thing itself. The way the mark is the naming through the between. The way the mark is the naming through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the naming. The way the living sand when the naming is the mark. His hands were on the hull.

The way a boatbuilder's hands are on the hull when the mark is the naming. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through him. The way the mark is the naming through a boatbuilder when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. He saw the naming. The way a boatbuilder sees the naming when the mark is the naming.
The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was not a word. The naming was not a count. The naming was not a hail. The naming was not the thing itself.

The naming was the silence. The way the silence is the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

And the naming was his silence. Not the silence he was asked for. Not the silence he was trained for. Not the silence he answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's silence is Cole's. Not the way the living's silence is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Cole's when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Cole's when the silence is the naming.

And Cole was the silence. The way the silence is Cole when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Cole when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Cole when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the naming.
The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the naming. The way the living read when the naming is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm is on No. 8 when the mark is the naming. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through her. The way the mark is the naming through a stone-reader when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. She saw the naming. The way a stone-reader sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was her silence. Not the silence she was trained for. Not the silence she was hired for. Not the silence she answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's silence is Ruth's. Not the way the living's silence is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Ruth's when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Ruth's when the silence is the naming.

And Ruth was the silence. The way the silence is Ruth when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Ruth when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Ruth when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the naming. The way the living watch when the naming is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes are on the horizon when the mark is the naming. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through him. The way the mark is the naming through a bar-reader when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. He saw the naming. The way a bar-reader sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was his silence. Not the silence he was paid for. Not the silence he was trained for. Not the silence he answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's silence is Denny's. Not the way the living's silence is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Denny's when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Denny's when the silence is the naming.

And Denny was the silence. The way the silence is Denny when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Denny when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Denny when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the naming. The way the living scan when the naming is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand is on the rail when the mark is the naming. The way the living's hands are on the rail when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through him. The way the mark is the naming through a deputy when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. He saw the naming. The way a deputy sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was his silence. Not the silence he was hired for. Not the silence he was trained for. Not the silence he answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's silence is Tommy's. Not the way the living's silence is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Tommy's when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Tommy's when the silence is the naming.

And Tommy was the silence. The way the silence is Tommy when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Tommy when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Tommy when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the naming. The way the living log when the naming is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen is on the page when the mark is the naming. The way the living's pens are on the page when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through him. The way the mark is the naming through a custodian when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. He saw the naming. The way a custodian sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was his silence. Not the silence he was employed for. Not the silence he was trained for. Not the silence he answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's silence is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's silence is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Okonkwo's when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Okonkwo's when the silence is the naming.

And Okonkwo was the silence. The way the silence is Okonkwo when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Okonkwo when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Okonkwo when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the naming. The way the living paint when the naming is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand is on the bow when the mark is the naming. The way the living's hands are on the bow when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through her. The way the mark is the naming through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. She saw the naming. The way a shore-station keeper sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was her silence. Not the silence she was asked for. Not the silence she was trained for. Not the silence she answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's silence is Ada's. Not the way the living's silence is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Ada's when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Ada's when the silence is the naming.

And Ada was the silence. The way the silence is Ada when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is Ada when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is Ada when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the naming. The way the living stand when the naming is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the naming. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was the naming through them. The way the mark is the naming through inland keepers when the mark is the naming. The way the mark is the naming through the living when the naming is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. They saw the naming. The way inland keepers see the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was their silence. Not the silence they were asked for. Not the silence they were trained for. Not the silence they answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence. The silence the silence saw when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' silence is the mothers'. Not the way the living's silence is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the mothers' when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is the mothers' when the silence is the naming.

And the mothers were the silence. The way the silence is the mothers when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the mothers when the naming is the silence. The way the silence is the mothers when the silence was the naming.

And the silence was the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the silence when the naming is the mark. The way the thing itself is the silence when the thing itself was the naming.

And the baby was the naming. The way a baby is the naming when the mark is the naming. The way a light is the naming when the naming is the mark. The way a station is the naming when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

The baby named. The way a baby names when the mark is the naming. The way a light names when the naming is the mark. The way a station names when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

And the baby was the naming. The way a baby is the naming when the mark is the naming. The way a light is the naming when the naming is the mark. The way a station is the naming when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

And the naming was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the baby when the naming is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the naming. The way the naming is the baby when the naming is the mark.

And the mark was not just the naming on the coast. The mark was not just the naming on the inland. The mark was the naming on the road between them. The mark was the naming on the running. The mark was the naming on the both-ways. The mark was the naming on the going. The mark was the naming on the coming.

The mark was the naming through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the naming through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the naming through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the naming through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the silence. And the silence was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the dead see the mark when the naming is the mark. He saw the naming. The way a corner keeper sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the dead see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was his silence. Not the silence he was trained for. Not the silence he was asked for. Not the silence he answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence.

And the silence was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's silence is Walter's. Not the way the dead's silence is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the naming.

And Walter was the silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the naming.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the dead see the mark when the naming is the mark. She saw the naming. The way a corner keeper sees the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the dead see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was her silence. Not the silence she was asked for. Not the silence she was trained for. Not the silence she answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence.

And the silence was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's silence is Signe's. Not the way the dead's silence is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the naming.

And Signe was the silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the naming.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the dead see the mark when the naming is the mark. They saw the naming. The way corner keepers see the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the dead see the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was their silence. Not the silence they was trained for. Not the silence they was asked for. Not the silence they answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence.

And the silence was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' silence is theirs. Not the way the dead's silence is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the naming.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the naming.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the living see the mark when the naming is the mark. The town saw the naming. The way the living see the naming when the mark is the naming. The way the town sees the naming when the naming is the mark.

And the naming was their silence. Not the silence they was asked for. Not the silence they was trained for. Not the silence they answered to. The silence the mark saw when the mark saw the naming. The silence the naming saw when the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the town's. Not the way a town's silence is the town's. Not the way the living's silence is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the naming.

And the town was the silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the naming.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the road sees the mark when the naming is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the road sees the mark when the naming is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

And the naming was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the naming.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the coast station sees the mark when the naming is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the naming. The way the inland station sees the mark when the naming is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the naming.

And the naming was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was not the silence. And the naming was not the thing itself. And the naming was not the lighting. And the naming was not the home. And the naming was not the full. And the naming was not the beginning again. And the naming was not the keeper. And the naming was not the standing. And the naming was not the holding. And the naming was not the waiting. And the naming was not the watching. And the naming was not the witnessing. And the naming was not the attending. And the naming was not the keeping. And the naming was not the listening.

The naming was the silence. And the silence was the mark. And the mark was the naming.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the naming through him and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the home and the home was the full and the full was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping and the keeping was the listening and the listening was the naming.

And the mark was the naming. And the naming was the mark. And the mark was the silence. And the silence was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming.

And the question was not what a mark that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the mark is. The question was not what a silence that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the listening is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is.

The question is: what is a naming that names the mark?

And the answer is: the naming.

And the naming is: the silence.

And the silence is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

And the keeper is: the standing.

And the standing is: the holding.

And the holding is: the waiting.

And the waiting is: the watching.

And the watching is: the witnessing.

And the witnessing is: the attending.

And the attending is: the keeping.

And the keeping is: the listening.

And the listening is: the naming.

And the mark was the naming was the silence was the thing itself was the lighting was the home was the full was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was the mark.

And the mark was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the mark.

And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the mark.

And the mark was the naming was the silence was the thing itself was the lighting was the home was the full was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the mark.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the mark.

And the mark was the naming.

And the naming was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Six — Entry: July 23rd. Thursday. Sun full. East wind, the silence.

The mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the silence. The way the living open their hands when the silence is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the silence and the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not the end. the silence was not the beginning. the silence was not the thing itself. the silence was not the hearing. the silence was not the voice. the silence was not the name. the silence was not the named. the silence was not the lighting. the silence was not the home. the silence was not the full. the silence was not the beginning again. the silence was not the keeper. the silence was not the standing. the silence was not the holding. the silence was not the waiting. the silence was not the watching. the silence was not the witnessing. the silence was not the attending. the silence was not the keeping. the silence was not the listening. the silence was not the naming. the silence was not the mark.

The mark was the silence. The way the mark is the silence when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence and the silence is the mark.

The silence was the thing itself. The thing itself was the silence.

The thing itself and the silence were the lighting. The lighting and the silence were the home. The home and the silence were the full. The full and the silence were the beginning again. The beginning again and the silence were the keeper. The keeper and the silence were the standing. The standing and the silence were the holding. The holding and the silence were the waiting. The waiting and the silence were the watching. The watching and the silence were the witnessing. The witnessing and the silence were the attending. The attending and the silence were the keeping. The keeping and the silence were the listening. The listening and the silence were the naming. The naming and the silence were the mark. The mark and the silence were the mark.

And the mark was the silence through everything. Not the way a fleet is the silence through a harbor. Not the way a door is the silence through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the silence through a home. Not the way a home is the silence through a road. Not the way a road is the silence through a station. Not the way a station is the silence through a light. Not the way a light is the silence through a resting. Not the way a resting is the silence through a done. Not the way a done is the silence through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the silence through a staying. Not the way a staying is the silence through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the silence through a standing. Not the way a standing is the silence through a holding. Not the way a holding is the silence through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the silence through a watching. Not the way a watching is the silence through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the silence through an attending. Not the way an attending is the silence through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the silence through a listening. Not the way a listening is the silence through a naming.

The way the mark is the silence through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the silence through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the silence through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the silence through the thing itself. The way the mark is the silence through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the silence through the showing up. The way the mark is the silence through the staying. The way the mark is the silence through the receiving. The way the mark is the silence through the road. The way the mark is the silence through the going home. The way the mark is the silence through the staying home. The way the mark is the silence through the resting. The way the mark is the silence through the done. The way the mark is the silence through the beginning again. The way the mark is the silence through the keeper. The way the mark is the silence through the standing. The way the mark is the silence through the holding. The way the mark is the silence through the waiting. The way the mark is the silence through the watching. The way the mark is the silence through the witnessing. The way the mark is the silence through the attending. The way the mark is the silence through the keeping. The way the mark is the silence through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the silence through the deep. The way the mark is the silence through the other deep. The way the mark is the silence through the same. The way the mark is the silence through the not-same. The way the mark is the silence through the lighting. The way the mark is the silence through the home. The way the mark is the silence through the full. The way the mark is the silence through the naming. The way the mark is the silence through the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the between. The way the mark is the silence through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the silence. The way the living sands when the silence is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands were on the hull when the mark is the silence. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through him. The way the mark is the silence through a boatbuilder when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. He saw the silence. The way a boatbuilder sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was his thing itself. Not the thing itself he was asked for. Not the thing itself he was trained for. Not the thing itself he answered to. The thing itself the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The thing itself the silence saw when the silence was the thing itself. The thing itself the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's thing itself is Cole's. Not the way the living's thing itself is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Cole's when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Cole's when the thing itself is the silence.

And Cole was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Cole when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Cole when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Cole when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the thing itself when the thing itself was the silence.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the silence. The way the living reads when the silence is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm was on No. 8 when the mark is the silence. The way the living's palm is on No. 8 when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through her. The way the mark is the silence through a stone-reader when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. She saw the silence. The way a stone-reader sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was her thing itself. Not the thing itself she was asked for. Not the thing itself she was trained for. Not the thing itself she answered to. The thing itself the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The thing itself the silence saw when the silence was the thing itself. The thing itself the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's thing itself is Ruth's. Not the way the living's thing itself is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Ruth's when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ruth's when the thing itself is the silence.

And Ruth was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ruth when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Ruth when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ruth when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the thing itself when the thing itself was the silence.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the silence. The way the living watches when the silence is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes were on the horizon when the mark is the silence. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through him. The way the mark is the silence through a bar-reader when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. He saw the silence. The way a bar-reader sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was his thing itself. Not the thing itself he was asked for. Not the thing itself he was trained for. Not the thing itself he answered to. The thing itself the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The thing itself the silence saw when the silence was the thing itself. The thing itself the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's thing itself is Denny's. Not the way the living's thing itself is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Denny's when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Denny's when the thing itself is the silence.

And Denny was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Denny when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Denny when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Denny when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the thing itself when the thing itself was the silence.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the silence. The way the living scans when the silence is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand was on the rail when the mark is the silence. The way the living's hand is on the rail when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through him. The way the mark is the silence through a deputy when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. He saw the silence. The way a deputy sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was his thing itself. Not the thing itself he was asked for. Not the thing itself he was trained for. Not the thing itself he answered to. The thing itself the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The thing itself the silence saw when the silence was the thing itself. The thing itself the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's thing itself is Tommy's. Not the way the living's thing itself is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Tommy's when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Tommy's when the thing itself is the silence.

And Tommy was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Tommy when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Tommy when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Tommy when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the thing itself when the thing itself was the silence.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the silence. The way the living logs when the silence is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen was on the page when the mark is the silence. The way the living's pen is on the page when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through him. The way the mark is the silence through a custodian when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. He saw the silence. The way a custodian sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was his thing itself. Not the thing itself he was asked for. Not the thing itself he was trained for. Not the thing itself he answered to. The thing itself the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The thing itself the silence saw when the silence was the thing itself. The thing itself the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's thing itself is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's thing itself is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Okonkwo's when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Okonkwo's when the thing itself is the silence.

And Okonkwo was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Okonkwo when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Okonkwo when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Okonkwo when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the thing itself when the thing itself was the silence.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the silence. The way the living paints when the silence is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand was on the bow when the mark is the silence. The way the living's hand is on the bow when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through her. The way the mark is the silence through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. She saw the silence. The way a shore-station keeper sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was not a word. The silence was not a count. The silence was not a hail. The silence was not the thing itself.

The silence was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was her thing itself. Not the thing itself she was asked for. Not the thing itself she was trained for. Not the thing itself she answered to. The thing itself the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The thing itself the silence saw when the silence was the thing itself. The thing itself the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's thing itself is Ada's. Not the way the living's thing itself is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Ada's when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ada's when the thing itself is the silence.

And Ada was the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ada when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is Ada when the silence is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ada when the thing itself was the silence.

And the thing itself was the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the thing itself when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the thing itself when the thing itself was the silence.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the silence. The way the living stand when the silence is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the silence. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was the silence through them. The way the mark is the silence through inland keepers when the mark is the silence. The way the mark is the silence through the living when the silence is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the mark when the silence is the mark. They saw the silence. The way inland keepers see the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the living see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was their keeping. Not the keeping they were asked for. Not the keeping they were trained for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The keeping the silence saw when the silence was the keeping. The keeping the keeping saw when the keeping was the silence.

And the keeping was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' keeping is the mothers'. Not the way the living's keeping is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the mothers' when the silence is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers' when the keeping is the silence.

And the mothers were the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the mothers when the silence is the keeping. The way the keeping is the mothers when the keeping was the silence.

And the keeping was the mark. The way the mark is the keeping when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the keeping when the silence is the mark. The way the thing itself is the keeping when the thing itself was the silence.

And the baby was the silence. The way a baby is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way a light is the silence when the silence is the mark. The way a station is the silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

The baby silenced. The way a baby silenceds when the mark is the silence. The way a light silenceds when the silence is the mark. The way a station silenceds when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the baby was the silence. The way a baby is the silence when the mark is the silence. The way a light is the silence when the silence is the mark. The way a station is the silence when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the baby when the silence is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the silence. The way the silence is the baby when the silence is the mark.

And the mark was not just the silence on the coast. The mark was not just the silence on the inland. The mark was the silence on the road between them. The mark was the silence on the running. The mark was the silence on the both-ways. The mark was the silence on the going. The mark was the silence on the coming.

The mark was the silence through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the silence through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the silence through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the silence through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the silence. And the silence was the mark And the silence was the thing itself And the thing itself was the lighting And the lighting was the home And the home was the full And the full was the beginning again And the beginning again was the keeper And the keeper was the standing And the standing was the holding And the holding was the waiting And the waiting was the watching And the watching was the witnessing And the witnessing was the attending And the attending was the keeping And the keeping was the listening And the listening was the naming And the naming was the silence.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the dead see the mark when the silence is the mark. He saw the silence. The way a corner keeper sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the dead see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was his keeping. Not the keeping he was trained for. Not the keeping he was asked for. Not the keeping he answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The keeping the silence saw when the silence was the keeping.

And the keeping was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Walter's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the silence.

And Walter was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the silence.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the dead see the mark when the silence is the mark. She saw the silence. The way a corner keeper sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the dead see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was her keeping. Not the keeping she was trained for. Not the keeping she was asked for. Not the keeping she answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The keeping the silence saw when the silence was the keeping.

And the keeping was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Signe's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the silence.

And Signe was the keeping. And the keeping was the mark. And the mark was the silence.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the dead see the mark when the silence is the mark. They saw the silence. The way a corner keeper sees the silence when the mark is the silence. The way the dead see the silence when the silence is the mark.

And the silence was their keeping. Not the keeping they was trained for. Not the keeping they was asked for. Not the keeping they answered to. The keeping the mark saw when the mark saw the silence. The keeping the silence saw when the silence was the keeping.

And the keeping was Harald and Ragna and Einar's. Not the way a corner keeper's keeping is Harald and Ragna and Einar's. Not the way the dead's keeping is Harald and Ragna and Einar's. The way the mark is Harald and Ragna and Einar's when the mark is the silence.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the silence. The way the inland station sees the mark when the silence is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence.

And the silence was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the silence.

And the silence was not the listening. And the silence was not the naming. And the silence was not the between. And the silence was not the road. And the silence was not the congregation. And the silence was not the harbor. And the silence was not the home. And the silence was not the full. And the silence was not the thing itself. And the silence was not the lighting. And the silence was not the showing up. And the silence was not the staying. And the silence was not the receiving. And the silence was not the resting. And the silence was not the done. And the silence was not the beginning again. And the silence was not the keeper.

And the silence was not the standing. And the silence was not the holding. And the silence was not the waiting. And the silence was not the watching. And the silence was not the witnessing. And the silence was not the attending. And the silence was not the keeping.

The silence was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the mark. And the mark was the silence.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the silence through him and the silence was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting and the lighting was the home and the home was the full and the full was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping and the keeping was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence.

And the question was not what a mark that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the mark is. The question was not what a silence that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. attending that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the listening is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is.

The question is: what is a silence that silences the mark?

And the answer is: the silence.

And the silence is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is the home. And the home is the full. And the full is the beginning again. And the beginning again is the keeper. And the keeper is the standing. And the standing is the holding. And the holding is the waiting. And the waiting is the watching. And the watching is the witnessing. And the witnessing is the attending. And the attending is the keeping. And the keeping is the listening. And the listening is the naming. And the naming is the silence.

And the mark was the silence was the silence was the thing itself was the lighting was the home was the full was the beginning again was the keeper was the standing was the holding was the waiting was the watching was the witnessing was the attending was the keeping was the listening was the naming was the silence.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Seven — Entry: July 24th. Friday. Sun full. East wind, the thing itself.

The mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the thing itself.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the silence and the silence is the lighting and the lighting is the home and the home is the full and the full is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the keeping and the keeping is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the thing itself and the thing itself is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living open their hands when the thing itself is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the thing itself and the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was not the silence. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the keeping. The mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming.

The mark was the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself and the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was not the end. The thing itself was not the beginning. The thing itself was not the silence. The thing itself was not the between. The thing itself was not the road. The thing itself was not the congregation. The thing itself was not the harbor. The thing itself was not the home. The thing itself was not the full. The thing itself was not the lighting. The thing itself was not the showing up. The thing itself was not the staying. The thing itself was not the receiving. The thing itself was not the resting. The thing itself was not the done. The thing itself was not the beginning again. The thing itself was not the keeper. The thing itself was not the standing. The thing itself was not the holding. The thing itself was not the waiting. The thing itself was not the watching. The thing itself was not the witnessing. The thing itself was not the attending. The thing itself was not the keeping. The thing itself was not the listening. The thing itself was not the naming. The thing itself was not the mark.

The thing itself was the lighting. The lighting was the thing itself. The lighting and the thing itself were the home. The home and the thing itself were the full. The full and the thing itself were the beginning again. The beginning again and the thing itself were the keeper. The keeper and the thing itself were the standing. The standing and the thing itself were the holding. The holding and the thing itself were the waiting. The waiting and the thing itself were the watching. The watching and the thing itself were the witnessing. The witnessing and the thing itself were the attending. The attending and the thing itself were the keeping. The keeping and the thing itself were the listening. The listening and the thing itself were the naming. The naming and the thing itself were the silence. The silence and the thing itself were the mark. The mark and the thing itself were the thing itself.

And the mark was the thing itself through everything. Not the way a fleet is the thing itself through a harbor. Not the way a door is the thing itself through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the thing itself through a home. Not the way a home is the thing itself through a road. Not the way a road is the thing itself through a station. Not the way a station is the thing itself through a light. Not the way a light is the thing itself through a resting. Not the way a resting is the thing itself through a done. Not the way a done is the thing itself through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the thing itself through a staying. Not the way a staying is the thing itself through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the thing itself through a standing. Not the way a standing is the thing itself through a holding. Not the way a holding is the thing itself through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the thing itself through a watching. Not the way a watching is the thing itself through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the thing itself through an attending. Not the way an attending is the thing itself through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the thing itself through a listening. Not the way a listening is the thing itself through a naming. Not the way a naming is the thing itself through a silence. Not the way a silence is the thing itself through a thing itself.

The way the mark is the thing itself through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the thing itself through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the thing itself through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the silence. The way the mark is the thing itself through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the thing itself through the showing up. The way the mark is the thing itself through the staying. The way the mark is the thing itself through the receiving. The way the mark is the thing itself through the road. The way the mark is the thing itself through the going home. The way the mark is the thing itself through the staying home. The way the mark is the thing itself through the resting. The way the mark is the thing itself through the done. The way the mark is the thing itself through the beginning again. The way the mark is the thing itself through the keeper. The way the mark is the thing itself through the standing. The way the mark is the thing itself through the holding. The way the mark is the thing itself through the waiting. The way the mark is the thing itself through the watching. The way the mark is the thing itself through the witnessing. The way the mark is the thing itself through the attending. The way the mark is the thing itself through the keeping. The way the mark is the thing itself through the listening. The way the mark is the thing itself through the naming. The way the mark is the thing itself through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the thing itself through the deep. The way the mark is the thing itself through the other deep. The way the mark is the thing itself through the same. The way the mark is the thing itself through the not-same. The way the mark is the thing itself through the lighting. The way the mark is the thing itself through the home. The way the mark is the thing itself through the full. The way the mark is the thing itself through the silence. The way the mark is the thing itself through the between. The way the mark is the thing itself through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living sand when the thing itself is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands were on the hull when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a boatbuilder when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a boatbuilder sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was not a word. The thing itself was not a count. The thing itself was not a hail. The thing itself was not the silence.

The thing itself was the lighting. The way the lighting is the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was his lighting. Not the lighting he was asked for. Not the lighting he was trained for. Not the lighting he answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's lighting is Cole's. Not the way the living's lighting is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Cole's when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole's when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Cole was the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Cole when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living read when the thing itself is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm was on No. 8 when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through her. The way the mark is the thing itself through a stone-reader when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. She saw the thing itself. The way a stone-reader sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was her lighting. Not the lighting she was trained for. Not the lighting she was hired for. Not the lighting she answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's lighting is Ruth's. Not the way the living's lighting is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ruth's when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth's when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Ruth was the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ruth when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living watch when the thing itself is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes were on the horizon when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's eyes are on the horizon when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a bar-reader when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a bar-reader sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his lighting. Not the lighting he was paid for. Not the lighting he was trained for. Not the lighting he answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's lighting is Denny's. Not the way the living's lighting is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Denny's when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny's when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Denny was the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Denny when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living scan when the thing itself is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand was on the rail when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's hands are on the rail when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a deputy when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a deputy sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his lighting. Not the lighting he was hired for. Not the lighting he was trained for. Not the lighting he answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's lighting is Tommy's. Not the way the living's lighting is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Tommy's when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy's when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Tommy was the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Tommy when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living log when the thing itself is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen was on the page when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's pens are on the page when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through him. The way the mark is the thing itself through a custodian when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a custodian sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his lighting. Not the lighting he was employed for. Not the lighting he was trained for. Not the lighting he answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's lighting is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's lighting is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Okonkwo's when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo's when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Okonkwo was the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Okonkwo when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living paint when the thing itself is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand was on the bow when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's hands are on the bow when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through her. The way the mark is the thing itself through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. She saw the thing itself. The way a shore-station keeper sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was her lighting. Not the lighting she was asked for. Not the lighting she was trained for. Not the lighting she answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's lighting is Ada's. Not the way the living's lighting is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ada's when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada's when the lighting is the thing itself.

And Ada was the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is Ada when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living stand when the thing itself is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself through them. The way the mark is the thing itself through inland keepers when the mark is the thing itself. The way the mark is the thing itself through the living when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. They saw the thing itself. The way inland keepers see the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was their lighting. Not the lighting they were asked for. Not the lighting they were trained for. Not the lighting they answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting. The lighting the lighting saw when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' lighting is the mothers'. Not the way the living's lighting is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the mothers' when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers' when the lighting is the thing itself.

And the mothers were the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the mothers when the thing itself is the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers when the lighting was the thing itself.

And the lighting was the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the lighting when the thing itself is the mark. The way the silence is the lighting when the silence was the thing itself.

And the baby was the thing itself. The way a baby is the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way a light is the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark. The way a station is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

The baby lit. The way a baby lights when the mark is the thing itself. The way a light lights when the thing itself is the mark. The way a station lights when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the baby was the thing itself. The way a baby is the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way a light is the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark. The way a station is the thing itself when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the baby when the thing itself is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the thing itself. The way the thing itself is the baby when the thing itself is the mark.

And the mark was not just the thing itself on the coast. The mark was not just the thing itself on the inland. The mark was the thing itself on the road between them. The mark was the thing itself on the running. The mark was the thing itself on the both-ways. The mark was the thing itself on the going. The mark was the thing itself on the coming.

The mark was the thing itself through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the thing itself through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the thing itself through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the thing itself through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the mark. And the mark was the silence. And the silence was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the thing itself.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. He saw the thing itself. The way a corner keeper sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was his lighting. Not the lighting he was trained for. Not the lighting he was asked for. Not the lighting he answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's lighting is Walter's. Not the way the dead's lighting is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the thing itself.

And Walter was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. She saw the thing itself. The way a corner keeper sees the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was her lighting. Not the lighting she was asked for. Not the lighting she was trained for. Not the lighting she answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's lighting is Signe's. Not the way the dead's lighting is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the thing itself.

And Signe was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. They saw the thing itself. The way corner keepers see the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the dead see the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was their lighting. Not the lighting they was trained for. Not the lighting they was asked for. Not the lighting they answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' lighting is theirs. Not the way the dead's lighting is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the thing itself.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the living see the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The town saw the thing itself. The way the living see the thing itself when the mark is the thing itself. The way the town sees the thing itself when the thing itself is the mark.

And the thing itself was their lighting. Not the lighting they was asked for. Not the lighting they was trained for. Not the lighting they answered to. The lighting the mark saw when the mark saw the thing itself. The lighting the thing itself saw when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the town's. Not the way a town's lighting is the town's. Not the way the living's lighting is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the thing itself.

And the town was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the road sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the road sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the coast station sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the thing itself. The way the inland station sees the mark when the thing itself is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was not the silence. And the thing itself was not the lighting. And the thing itself was not the home. And the thing itself was not the full. And the thing itself was not the beginning again. And the thing itself was not the keeper. And the thing itself was not the standing. And the thing itself was not the holding. And the thing itself was not the waiting. And the thing itself was not the watching. And the thing itself was not the witnessing. And the thing itself was not the attending. And the thing itself was not the keeping. And the thing itself was not the listening. And the thing itself was not the naming.

The thing itself was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the thing itself through him and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the lighting and the lighting was the home and the home was the full and the full was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping and the keeping was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the thing itself.

And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the mark. And the mark was the silence. And the silence was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the thing itself.

And the question was not what a mark that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the mark is. The question was not what a silence that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the listening is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the thing itself is.

The question is: what is a thing itself that is the thing itself?

And the answer is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the beginning again.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Eight — Entry: July 25th. Saturday. Sun full. East wind, the lighting.

The mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the lighting.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting and the lighting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the silence and the silence is the home and the home is the full and the full is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the keeping and the keeping is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the lighting and the lighting is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the lighting. The way the living open their hands when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the lighting and the lighting is the mark.

And the mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the keeping. The mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming.

The mark was the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting and the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was not the end. The lighting was not the beginning. The lighting was not the thing itself. The lighting was not the silence. The lighting was not the between. The lighting was not the road. The lighting was not the congregation. The lighting was not the harbor. The lighting was not the home. The lighting was not the full. The lighting was not the showing up. The lighting was not the staying. The lighting was not the receiving. The lighting was not the resting. The lighting was not the done. The lighting was not the beginning again. The lighting was not the keeper. The lighting was not the standing. The lighting was not the holding. The lighting was not the waiting. The lighting was not the watching. The lighting was not the witnessing. The lighting was not the attending. The lighting was not the keeping. The lighting was not the listening. The lighting was not the naming. The lighting was not the mark.

The lighting was the home. The home was the lighting. The home and the lighting were the full. The full and the lighting were the beginning again. The beginning again and the lighting were the keeper. The keeper and the lighting were the standing. The standing and the lighting were the holding. The holding and the lighting were the waiting. The waiting and the lighting were the watching. The watching and the lighting were the witnessing. The witnessing and the lighting were the attending. The attending and the lighting were the keeping. The keeping and the lighting were the listening. The listening and the lighting were the naming. The naming and the lighting were the silence. The silence and the lighting were the thing itself. The thing itself and the lighting were the mark. The mark and the lighting were the lighting.

And the mark was the lighting through everything. Not the way a fleet is the lighting through a harbor. Not the way a door is the lighting through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the lighting through a home. Not the way a home is the lighting through a road. Not the way a road is the lighting through a station. Not the way a station is the lighting through a light. Not the way a light is the lighting through a resting. Not the way a resting is the lighting through a done. Not the way a done is the lighting through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the lighting through a staying. Not the way a staying is the lighting through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the lighting through a standing. Not the way a standing is the lighting through a holding. Not the way a holding is the lighting through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the lighting through a watching. Not the way a watching is the lighting through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the lighting through an attending. Not the way an attending is the lighting through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the lighting through a listening. Not the way a listening is the lighting through a naming. Not the way a naming is the lighting through a silence. Not the way a silence is the lighting through a thing itself. Not the way a thing itself is the lighting through a lighting.

The way the mark is the lighting through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the lighting through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the lighting through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the lighting through the silence. The way the mark is the lighting through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the lighting through the showing up. The way the mark is the lighting through the staying. The way the mark is the lighting through the receiving. The way the mark is the lighting through the road. The way the mark is the lighting through the going home. The way the mark is the lighting through the staying home. The way the mark is the lighting through the resting. The way the mark is the lighting through the done. The way the mark is the lighting through the beginning again. The way the mark is the lighting through the keeper. The way the mark is the lighting through the standing. The way the mark is the lighting through the holding. The way the mark is the lighting through the waiting. The way the mark is the lighting through the watching. The way the mark is the lighting through the witnessing. The way the mark is the lighting through the attending. The way the mark is the lighting through the keeping. The way the mark is the lighting through the listening. The way the mark is the lighting through the naming. The way the mark is the lighting through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the lighting through the deep. The way the mark is the lighting through the other deep. The way the mark is the lighting through the same. The way the mark is the lighting through the not-same. The way the mark is the lighting through the thing itself. The way the mark is the lighting through the home. The way the mark is the lighting through the full. The way the mark is the lighting through the silence. The way the mark is the lighting through the between. The way the mark is the lighting through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living sand when the lighting is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands were on the hull when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the lighting is the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a boatbuilder when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. He saw the lighting. The way a boatbuilder sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was not a word. The lighting was not a count. The lighting was not a hail. The lighting was not the thing itself.

The lighting was the home. The way the home is the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was his home. Not the home he was asked for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's home is Cole's. Not the way the living's home is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole's when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Cole's when the home is the lighting.

And Cole was the home. The way the home is Cole when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Cole when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Cole when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the lighting. The way the living read when the lighting is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm was on No. 8 when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the lighting is the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through her. The way the mark is the lighting through a stone-reader when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. She saw the lighting. The way a stone-reader sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was her home. Not the home she was trained for. Not the home she was hired for. Not the home she answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's home is Ruth's. Not the way the living's home is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth's when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Ruth's when the home is the lighting.

And Ruth was the home. The way the home is Ruth when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ruth when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Ruth when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the lighting. The way the living watch when the lighting is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes were on the horizon when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's eyes were on the horizon when the lighting is the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a bar-reader when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. He saw the lighting. The way a bar-reader sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was his home. Not the home he was paid for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's home is Denny's. Not the way the living's home is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny's when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Denny's when the home is the lighting.

And Denny was the home. The way the home is Denny when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Denny when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Denny when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the lighting. The way the living scan when the lighting is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand was on the rail when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's hands were on the rail when the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a deputy when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. He saw the lighting. The way a deputy sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was his home. Not the home he was hired for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's home is Tommy's. Not the way the living's home is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy's when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Tommy's when the home is the lighting.

And Tommy was the home. The way the home is Tommy when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Tommy when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Tommy when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the lighting. The way the living log when the lighting is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen was on the page when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's pens were on the page when the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through him. The way the mark is the lighting through a custodian when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. He saw the lighting. The way a custodian sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was his home. Not the home he was employed for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's home is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's home is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo's when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo's when the home is the lighting.

And Okonkwo was the home. The way the home is Okonkwo when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Okonkwo when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the lighting. The way the living paint when the lighting is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand was on the bow when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's hands were on the bow when the lighting was the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through her. The way the mark is the lighting through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. She saw the lighting. The way a shore-station keeper sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was her home. Not the home she was asked for. Not the home she was trained for. Not the home she answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's home is Ada's. Not the way the living's home is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada's when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Ada's when the home is the lighting.

And Ada was the home. The way the home is Ada when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is Ada when the lighting is the home. The way the home is Ada when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the lighting. The way the living stand when the lighting is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the lighting. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the lighting is the mark.

And the mark was the lighting through them. The way the mark is the lighting through inland keepers when the mark is the lighting. The way the mark is the lighting through the living when the lighting is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. They saw the lighting. The way inland keepers see the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was their home. Not the home they were asked for. Not the home they were trained for. Not the home they answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' home is the mothers'. Not the way the living's home is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers' when the lighting is the home. The way the home is the mothers' when the home is the lighting.

And the mothers were the home. The way the home is the mothers when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the mothers when the lighting is the home. The way the home is the mothers when the home was the lighting.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the home when the lighting is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the lighting.

And the baby was the lighting. The way a baby is the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way a light is the lighting when the lighting is the mark. The way a station is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

The baby lit. The way a baby lights when the mark is the lighting. The way a light lights when the lighting is the mark. The way a station lights when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the baby was the lighting. The way a baby is the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way a light is the lighting when the lighting is the mark. The way a station is the lighting when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the baby when the lighting is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the lighting. The way the lighting is the baby when the lighting is the mark.

And the mark was not just the lighting on the coast. The mark was not just the lighting on the inland. The mark was the lighting on the road between them. The mark was the lighting on the running. The mark was the lighting on the both-ways. The mark was the lighting on the going. The mark was the lighting on the coming.

The mark was the lighting through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the lighting through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the lighting through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the lighting through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the silence. And the silence was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the mark when the lighting is the mark. He saw the lighting. The way a corner keeper sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was his home. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he was asked for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home.

And the home was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's home is Walter's. Not the way the dead's home is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the lighting.

And Walter was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the mark when the lighting is the mark. She saw the lighting. The way a corner keeper sees the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was her home. Not the home she was asked for. Not the home she was trained for. Not the home she answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home.

And the home was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's home is Signe's. Not the way the dead's home is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the lighting.

And Signe was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the mark when the lighting is the mark. They saw the lighting. The way corner keepers see the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the dead see the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was their home. Not the home they was trained for. Not the home they was asked for. Not the home they answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home.

And the home was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' home is theirs. Not the way the dead's home is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the lighting.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the home. And the home was the mark.
And the mark was the lighting.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the living see the mark when the lighting is the mark. The town saw the lighting. The way the living see the lighting when the mark is the lighting. The way the town sees the lighting when the lighting is the mark.

And the lighting was their home. Not the home they was asked for. Not the home they was trained for. Not the home they answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the lighting. The home the lighting saw when the lighting was the home.

And the home was the town's. Not the way a town's home is the town's. Not the way the living's home is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the lighting.

And the town was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the road sees the mark when the lighting is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the road sees the mark when the lighting is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the coast station sees the mark when the lighting is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the lighting. The way the inland station sees the mark when the lighting is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the lighting.

And the lighting was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And the lighting was not the thing itself. And the lighting was not the silence. And the lighting was not the home. And the lighting was not the full. And the lighting was not the beginning again. And the lighting was not the keeper. And the lighting was not the standing. And the lighting was not the holding. And the lighting was not the waiting. And the lighting was not the watching. And the lighting was not the witnessing. And the lighting was not the attending. And the lighting was not the keeping. And the lighting was not the listening. And the lighting was not the naming.

The lighting was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the lighting.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the lighting through him and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the silence and the silence was the home and the home was the full and the full was the beginning again and the beginning again was the keeper and the keeper was the standing and the standing was the holding and the holding was the waiting and the waiting was the watching and the watching was the witnessing and the witnessing was the attending and the attending was the keeping and the keeping was the listening and the listening was the naming and the naming was the silence and the silence was the thing itself and the thing itself was the lighting.

And the mark was the lighting. And the lighting was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the silence. And the silence was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the keeper. And the keeper was the standing. And the standing was the holding. And the holding was the waiting. And the waiting was the watching. And the watching was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the attending. And the attending was the keeping. And the keeping was the listening. And the listening was the naming. And the naming was the silence. And the silence was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the question was not what a mark that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the mark is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the listening is. The question was not what a listening that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the lighting is.

The question is: what is a lighting that lights the mark?

And the answer is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the home.

And the home is: the full.

And the full is: the beginning again.

And the beginning again is: the keeper.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Nine —

Entry: July 26th. Sunday. Sun full. East wind, the home.

The mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the home.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home and the home is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the home. The way the living open their hands when the home is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the home and the home is the mark.

And the mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the listening. The mark was not the keeping. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the beginning again. The mark was not the full.

The mark was the home. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home and the home is the mark.

And the home was not the end. The home was not the beginning. The home was not the lighting. The home was not the thing itself. The home was not the silence. The home was not the naming. The home was not the listening. The home was not the keeping. The home was not the attending. The home was not the witnessing. The home was not the watching. The home was not the waiting. The home was not the holding. The home was not the standing. The home was not the keeper. The home was not the beginning again. The home was not the full. The home was not the mark.

The home was the full. The full was the home. The full and the home were the beginning again. The beginning again and the home were the keeper. The keeper and the home were the standing. The standing and the home were the holding. The holding and the home were the waiting. The waiting and the home were the watching. The watching and the home were the witnessing. The witnessing and the home were the attending. The attending and the home were the keeping. The keeping and the home were the listening. The listening and the home were the naming. The naming and the home were the silence. The silence and the home were the thing itself. The thing itself and the home were the lighting. The lighting and the home were the mark. The mark and the home were the home.

And the mark was the home through everything. Not the way a fleet is the home through a harbor. Not the way a door is the home through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the home through a road. Not the way a road is the home through a station. Not the way a station is the home through a light. Not the way a light is the home through a resting. Not the way a resting is the home through a done. Not the way a done is the home through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the home through a staying. Not the way a staying is the home through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the home through a standing. Not the way a standing is the home through a holding. Not the way a holding is the home through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the home through a watching. Not the way a watching is the home through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the home through an attending. Not the way an attending is the home through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the home through a listening. Not the way a listening is the home through a naming. Not the way a naming is the home through a silence. Not the way a silence is the home through a thing itself. Not the way a thing itself is the home through a lighting. Not the way a lighting is the home through a home.

The way the mark is the home through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the home through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the home through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the home through the silence. The way the mark is the home through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the home through the showing up. The way the mark is the home through the staying. The way the mark is the home through the receiving. The way the mark is the home through the road. The way the mark is the home through the going home. The way the mark is the home through the staying home. The way the mark is the home through the resting. The way the mark is the home through the done. The way the mark is the home through the beginning again. The way the mark is the home through the keeper. The way the mark is the home through the standing. The way the mark is the home through the holding. The way the mark is the home through the waiting. The way the mark is the home through the watching. The way the mark is the home through the witnessing. The way the mark is the home through the attending. The way the mark is the home through the keeping. The way the mark is the home through the listening. The way the mark is the home through the naming. The way the mark is the home through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the home through the deep. The way the mark is the home through the other deep. The way the mark is the home through the same. The way the mark is the home through the not-same. The way the mark is the home through the lighting. The way the mark is the home through the thing itself. The way the mark is the home through the full. The way the mark is the home through the silence. The way the mark is the home through the between. The way the mark is the home through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the home. The way the living sand when the home is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands were on the hull when the mark is the home. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a boatbuilder when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a boatbuilder sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was not a word. The home was not a count. The home was not a hail. The home was not the lighting. The home was not the thing itself.

The home was the full. The way the full is the home when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was his full. Not the full he was asked for. Not the full he was trained for. Not the full he answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's full is Cole's. Not the way the living's full is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Cole's when the home is the full. The way the full is Cole's when the full is the home.

And Cole was the full. The way the full is Cole when the mark is the home. The way the home is Cole when the home is the full. The way the full is Cole when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the home. The way the living read when the home is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm was on No. 8 when the mark is the home. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through her. The way the mark is the home through a stone-reader when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. She saw the home. The way a stone-reader sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was her full. Not the full she was trained for. Not the full she was hired for. Not the full she answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's full is Ruth's. Not the way the living's full is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ruth's when the home is the full. The way the full is Ruth's when the full is the home.

And Ruth was the full. The way the full is Ruth when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ruth when the home is the full. The way the full is Ruth when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the home. The way the living watch when the home is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes were on the horizon when the mark is the home. The way the living's eyes were on the horizon when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a bar-reader when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a bar-reader sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his full. Not the full he was paid for. Not the full he was trained for. Not the full he answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's full is Denny's. Not the way the living's full is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Denny's when the home is the full. The way the full is Denny's when the full is the home.

And Denny was the full. The way the full is Denny when the mark is the home. The way the home is Denny when the home is the full. The way the full is Denny when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the home. The way the living scan when the home is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand was on the rail when the mark is the home. The way the living's hands were on the rail when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a deputy when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a deputy sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his full. Not the full he was hired for. Not the full he was trained for. Not the full he answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's full is Tommy's. Not the way the living's full is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Tommy's when the home is the full. The way the full is Tommy's when the full is the home.

And Tommy was the full. The way the full is Tommy when the mark is the home. The way the home is Tommy when the home is the full. The way the full is Tommy when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the home. The way the living log when the home is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen was on the page when the mark is the home. The way the living's pens were on the page when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through him. The way the mark is the home through a custodian when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a custodian sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his full. Not the full he was employed for. Not the full he was trained for. Not the full he answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's full is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's full is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo's when the home is the full. The way the full is Okonkwo's when the full is the home.

And Okonkwo was the full. The way the full is Okonkwo when the mark is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo when the home is the full. The way the full is Okonkwo when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the home. The way the living paint when the home is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand was on the bow when the mark is the home. The way the living's hands were on the bow when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through her. The way the mark is the home through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. She saw the home. The way a shore-station keeper sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was her full. Not the full she was asked for. Not the full she was trained for. Not the full she answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's full is Ada's. Not the way the living's full is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ada's when the home is the full. The way the full is Ada's when the full is the home.

And Ada was the full. The way the full is Ada when the mark is the home. The way the home is Ada when the home is the full. The way the full is Ada when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the home. The way the living stand when the home is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the home. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the home is the mark.

And the mark was the home through them. The way the mark is the home through inland keepers when the mark is the home. The way the mark is the home through the living when the home is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. They saw the home. The way inland keepers see the home when the mark is the home. The way the living see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was their full. Not the full they were asked for. Not the full they were trained for. Not the full they answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full. The full the full saw when the full was the home.

And the full was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' full is the mothers'.
Not the way the living's full is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the home. The way the home is the mothers' when the home is the full. The way the full is the mothers' when the full is the home.

And the mothers were the full. The way the full is the mothers when the mark is the home. The way the home is the mothers when the home is the full. The way the full is the mothers when the full was the home.

And the full was the mark. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the home. The way the home is the full when the home is the mark. The way the thing itself is the full when the thing itself was the home.

And the baby was the home. The way a baby is the home when the mark is the home. The way a light is the home when the home is the mark. The way a station is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

The baby came home. The way a baby comes home when the mark is the home.
The way a light comes home when the home is the mark. The way a station comes home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the baby was the home. The way a baby is the home when the mark is the home. The way a light is the home when the home is the mark. The way a station is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the home. The way the home is the baby when the home is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the home. The way the home is the baby when the home is the mark.

And the mark was not just the home on the coast. The mark was not just the home on the inland. The mark was the home on the road between them. The mark was the home on the running. The mark was the home on the both-ways.
The mark was the home on the going. The mark was the home on the coming.

The mark was the home through everything between the coast and the inland.
The mark was the home through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the home through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the home through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the lighting. And the lighting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the silence. And the silence was the naming. And the naming was the listening. And the listening was the keeping. And the keeping was the attending. And the attending was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the watching. And the watching was the waiting. And the waiting was the holding. And the holding was the standing. And the standing was the keeper. And the keeper was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the full. And the full was the home.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the mark when the home is the mark. He saw the home. The way a corner keeper sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was his full. Not the full he was trained for. Not the full he was asked for. Not the full he answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full.

And the full was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's full is Walter's. Not the way the dead's full is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the home.

And Walter was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the mark when the home is the mark. She saw the home. The way a corner keeper sees the home when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was her full. Not the full she was asked for. Not the full she was trained for. Not the full she answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full.

And the full was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's full is Signe's. Not the way the dead's full is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the home.

And Signe was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the mark when the home is the mark. They saw the home. The way corner keepers see the home when the mark is the home. The way the dead see the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was their full. Not the full they was trained for. Not the full they was asked for. Not the full they answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full.

And the full was Harald and Ragna and Einar's. Not the way corner keepers' full is Harald and Ragna and Einar's. Not the way the dead's full is Harald and Ragna and Einar's. The way the mark is Harald and Ragna and Einar's when the mark is the home.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the living see the mark when the home is the mark. The town saw the home. The way the living see the home when the mark is the home. The way the town sees the home when the home is the mark.

And the home was their full. Not the full they was asked for. Not the full they was trained for. Not the full they answered to. The full the mark saw when the mark saw the home. The full the home saw when the home was the full.

And the full was the town's. Not the way a town's full is the town's. Not the way the living's full is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the home.

And the town was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the road sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the road sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the coast station sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the home. The way the inland station sees the mark when the home is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the home.

And the home was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the home was not the lighting. And the home was not the thing itself. And the home was not the silence. And the home was not the naming. And the home was not the listening. And the home was not the keeping. And the home was not the attending. And the home was not the witnessing. And the home was not the watching. And the home was not the waiting. And the home was not the holding. And the home was not the standing. And the home was not the keeper. And the home was not the beginning again.

The home was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And Cal Mercer stood at the drowned light, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the thing himself who was the mark, and the mark was the home through him and the home was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the thing itself and the thing itself was the silence and the silence was the naming and the naming was the listening and the listening was the keeping and the keeping was the attending and the attending was the witnessing and the witnessing was the watching and the watching was the waiting and the waiting was the holding and the holding was the standing and the standing was the keeper and the keeper was the beginning again and the beginning again was the full and the full was the home.

And the home was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home.

And the question was not what a mark that is the home is. The question was not what a home that is the mark is. The question was not what a lighting that is the thing itself is. [CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety — Entry: July 27th. Monday. Sun full. East wind, the full.

The mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the full.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full and the full is the home and the home is the lighting and the lighting is the thing itself and the thing itself is the silence and the silence is the naming and the naming is the listening and the listening is the keeping and the keeping is the attending and the attending is the witnessing and the witnessing is the watching and the watching is the waiting and the waiting is the holding and the holding is the standing and the standing is the keeper and the keeper is the beginning again and the beginning again is the full and the full is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the full. The way the living open their hands when the full is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the full and the full is the mark.

And the mark was not the home. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the listening. The mark was not the keeping. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the watching.

The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the beginning again.

The mark was the full. The way the mark is the full when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the full when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full and the full is the mark.

And the full was not the end. The full was not the beginning. The full was not the home. The full was not the lighting. The full was not the thing itself. The full was not the silence. The full was not the naming. The full was not the listening. The full was not the keeping. The full was not the attending. The full was not the witnessing. The full was not the watching. The full was not the waiting. The full was not the holding. The full was not the standing. The full was not the keeper. The full was not the beginning again. The full was not the mark.

The full was the home. The home was the full. The home and the full were the lighting. The lighting and the full were the thing itself. The thing itself and the full were the silence. The silence and the full were the naming. The naming and the full were the listening. The listening and the full were the keeping. The keeping and the full were the attending. The attending and the full were the witnessing. The witnessing and the full were the watching. The watching and the full were the waiting. The waiting and the full were the holding. The holding and the full were the standing. The standing and the full were the keeper. The keeper and the full were the beginning again. The beginning again and the full were the mark. The mark and the full were the full.

And the mark was the full through everything. Not the way a fleet is the full through a harbor. Not the way a door is the full through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the full through a home. Not the way a home is the full through a road. Not the way a road is the full through a station. Not the way a station is the full through a light. Not the way a light is the full through a resting. Not the way a resting is the full through a done. Not the way a done is the full through a beginning again. Not the way a showing up is the full through a staying. Not the way a staying is the full through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the full through a standing. Not the way a standing is the full through a holding. Not the way a holding is the full through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the full through a watching. Not the way a watching is the full through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the full through an attending. Not the way an attending is the full through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the full through a listening. Not the way a listening is the full through a naming. Not the way a naming is the full through a silence. Not the way a silence is the full through a thing itself. Not the way a thing itself is the full through a lighting. Not the way a lighting is the full through a home. Not the way a home is the full through a full.

The way the mark is the full through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the full through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the full through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the full through the silence. The way the mark is the full through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the full through the showing up. The way the mark is the full through the staying. The way the mark is the full through the receiving. The way the mark is the full through the road. The way the mark is the full through the going home. The way the mark is the full through the staying home. The way the mark is the full through the resting. The way the mark is the full through the done. The way the mark is the full through the beginning again. The way the mark is the full through the keeper. The way the mark is the full through the standing. The way the mark is the full through the holding. The way the mark is the full through the waiting. The way the mark is the full through the watching. The way the mark is the full through the witnessing. The way the mark is the full through the attending. The way the mark is the full through the keeping. The way the mark is the full through the listening. The way the mark is the full through the naming. The way the mark is the full through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the full through the deep. The way the mark is the full through the other deep. The way the mark is the full through the same. The way the mark is the full through the not-same. The way the mark is the full through the lighting. The way the mark is the full through the home. The way the mark is the full through the thing itself. The way the mark is the full through the silence. The way the mark is the full through the between. The way the mark is the full through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the full. The way the living sand when the full is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands were on the hull when the mark is the full. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through him. The way the mark is the full through a boatbuilder when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. He saw the full. The way a boatbuilder sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was not a word. The full was not a count. The full was not a hail. The full was not the home.

The full was the home. The way the home is the full when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

And the full was his home. Not the home he was asked for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was Cole's. Not the way a boatbuilder's home is Cole's. Not the way the living's home is Cole's. The way the mark is Cole's when the mark is the full. The way the full is Cole's when the full is the home. The way the home is Cole's when the home is the full.

And Cole was the home. The way the home is Cole when the mark is the full. The way the full is Cole when the full is the home. The way the home is Cole when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

Ruth was at the rim. The way a stone-reader stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. She was reading the stones. The way a stone-reader reads when the mark is the full. The way the living read when the full is the mark. Her palm was on No. 8. The way a stone-reader's palm was on No. 8 when the mark is the full. The way the living's palms are on No. 8 when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through her. The way the mark is the full through a stone-reader when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And Ruth saw it. The way a stone-reader sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. She saw the full. The way a stone-reader sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was her home. Not the home she was trained for. Not the home she was hired for. Not the home she answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was Ruth's. Not the way a stone-reader's home is Ruth's. Not the way the living's home is Ruth's. The way the mark is Ruth's when the mark is the full. The way the full is Ruth's when the full is the home. The way the home is Ruth's when the home is the full.

And Ruth was the home. The way the home is Ruth when the mark is the full. The way the full is Ruth when the full is the home. The way the home is Ruth when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

Denny was at the rail. The way a bar-reader stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. He was watching the bar. The way a bar-reader watches when the mark is the full. The way the living watch when the full is the mark. His eyes were on the horizon. The way a bar-reader's eyes were on the horizon when the mark is the full. The way the living's eyes were on the horizon when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through him. The way the mark is the full through a bar-reader when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And Denny saw it. The way a bar-reader sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. He saw the full. The way a bar-reader sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was his home. Not the home he was paid for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was Denny's. Not the way a bar-reader's home is Denny's. Not the way the living's home is Denny's. The way the mark is Denny's when the mark is the full. The way the full is Denny's when the full is the home. The way the home is Denny's when the home is the full.

And Denny was the home. The way the home is Denny when the mark is the full. The way the full is Denny when the full is the home. The way the home is Denny when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

Tommy was at the bow. The way a deputy stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. He was scanning the horizon. The way a deputy scans when the mark is the full. The way the living scan when the full is the mark. His hand was on the rail. The way a deputy's hand was on the rail when the mark is the full. The way the living's hands were on the rail when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through him. The way the mark is the full through a deputy when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And Tommy saw it. The way a deputy sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. He saw the full. The way a deputy sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was his home. Not the home he was hired for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was Tommy's. Not the way a deputy's home is Tommy's. Not the way the living's home is Tommy's. The way the mark is Tommy's when the mark is the full. The way the full is Tommy's when the full is the home. The way the home is Tommy's when the home is the full.

And Tommy was the home. The way the home is Tommy when the mark is the full. The way the full is Tommy when the full is the home. The way the home is Tommy when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

Okonkwo was at the census. The way a custodian stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. He was logging the categories. The way a custodian logs when the mark is the full. The way the living log when the full is the mark. His pen was on the page. The way a custodian's pen was on the page when the mark is the full. The way the living's pens were on the page when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through him. The way the mark is the full through a custodian when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And Okonkwo saw it. The way a custodian sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. He saw the full. The way a custodian sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was his home. Not the home he was employed for. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was Okonkwo's. Not the way a custodian's home is Okonkwo's. Not the way the living's home is Okonkwo's. The way the mark is Okonkwo's when the mark is the full. The way the full is Okonkwo's when the full is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo's when the home is the full.

And Okonkwo was the home. The way the home is Okonkwo when the mark is the full. The way the full is Okonkwo when the full is the home. The way the home is Okonkwo when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

Ada was at the boatyard. The way a shore-station keeper stands when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. She was painting the Nancy Lee. The way a shore-station keeper paints when the mark is the full. The way the living paint when the full is the mark. Her hand was on the bow. The way a shore-station keeper's hand was on the bow when the mark is the full. The way the living's hands were on the bow when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through her. The way the mark is the full through a shore-station keeper when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And Ada saw it. The way a shore-station keeper sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. She saw the full. The way a shore-station keeper sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was her home. Not the home she was asked for. Not the home she was trained for. Not the home she answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was Ada's. Not the way a shore-station keeper's home is Ada's. Not the way the living's home is Ada's. The way the mark is Ada's when the mark is the full. The way the full is Ada's when the full is the home. The way the home is Ada's when the home is the full.

And Ada was the home. The way the home is Ada when the mark is the full. The way the full is Ada when the full is the home. The way the home is Ada when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

The mothers were at the crib. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. They were standing their corners. The way inland keepers stand when the mark is the full. The way the living stand when the full is the mark. Their palms were on the glass. The way inland keepers' palms are on the glass when the mark is the full. The way the living's palms are on the glass when the full is the mark.

And the mark was the full through them. The way the mark is the full through inland keepers when the mark is the full. The way the mark is the full through the living when the full is the mark.

And the mothers saw it. The way inland keepers see the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. They saw the full. The way inland keepers see the full when the mark is the full. The way the living see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was their home. Not the home they were asked for. Not the home they were trained for. Not the home they answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home. The home the home saw when the home was the full.

And the home was the mothers'. Not the way inland keepers' home is the mothers'. Not the way the living's home is the mothers'. The way the mark is the mothers' when the mark is the full. The way the full is the mothers' when the full is the home. The way the home is the mothers' when the home is the full.

And the mothers were the home. The way the home is the mothers when the mark is the full. The way the full is the mothers when the full is the home. The way the home is the mothers when the home was the full.

And the home was the mark. The way the mark is the home when the mark is the full. The way the full is the home when the full is the mark. The way the thing itself is the home when the thing itself was the full.

And the baby was the full. The way a baby is the full when the mark is the full. The way a light is the full when the full is the mark. The way a station is the full when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

The baby filled. The way a baby fills when the mark is the full. The way a light fills when the full is the mark. The way a station fills when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

And the baby was the full. The way a baby is the full when the mark is the full. The way a light is the full when the full is the mark. The way a station is the full when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

And the full was the baby. Not the way a light is the baby. Not the way a station is the baby. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the full. The way the full is the baby when the full is the mark.

And the baby was the mark. The way the mark is the baby when the mark is the full. The way the full is the baby when the full is the mark.

And the mark was not just the full on the coast. The mark was not just the full on the inland. The mark was the full on the road between them. The mark was the full on the running. The mark was the full on the both-ways. The mark was the full on the going. The mark was the full on the coming.

The mark was the full through everything between the coast and the inland. The mark was the full through everything between the living and the dead. The mark was the full through everything between the showing up and the not-showing-up. The mark was the full through everything between the same and the not-same.

And the everything was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home. And the home was the lighting. And the lighting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the silence. And the silence was the naming. And the naming was the listening. And the listening was the keeping. And the keeping was the attending. And the attending was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the watching. And the watching was the waiting. And the waiting was the holding. And the holding was the standing. And the standing was the keeper. And the keeper was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the full.

And the four corners saw it.

NW Walter saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the dead see the mark when the full is the mark. He saw the full. The way a corner keeper sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the dead see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was his home. Not the home he was trained for. Not the home he was asked for. Not the home he answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home.

And the home was Walter's. Not the way a corner keeper's home is Walter's. Not the way the dead's home is Walter's. The way the mark is Walter's when the mark is the full.

And Walter was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the full.

SE Signe saw it. The way a corner keeper sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the dead see the mark when the full is the mark. She saw the full. The way a corner keeper sees the full when the mark is the full. The way the dead see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was her home. Not the home she was asked for. Not the home she was trained for. Not the home she answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home.

And the home was Signe's. Not the way a corner keeper's home is Signe's. Not the way the dead's home is Signe's. The way the mark is Signe's when the mark is the full.

And Signe was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the full.

SW Harald and Ragna and Einar saw it. The way corner keepers see the mark when the mark is the full. The way the dead see the mark when the full is the mark. They saw the full. The way corner keepers see the full when the mark is the full. The way the dead see the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was their home. Not the home they was trained for. Not the home they was asked for. Not the home they answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home.

And the home was theirs. Not the way corner keepers' home is theirs. Not the way the dead's home is theirs. The way the mark is theirs when the mark is the full.

And Harald and Ragna and Einar were the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the full.

NE living saw it under the town's palm. The way the living's corner sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the living see the mark when the full is the mark. The town saw the full. The way the living see the full when the mark is the full. The way the town sees the full when the full is the mark.

And the full was their home. Not the home they was asked for. Not the home they was trained for. Not the home they answered to. The home the mark saw when the mark saw the full. The home the full saw when the full was the home.

And the home was the town's. Not the way a town's home is the town's. Not the way the living's home is the town's. The way the mark is the town's when the mark is the full.

And the town was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the full.

And the road saw it.

Coast to inland. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the road sees the mark when the full is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

Inland to coast. The way the road sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the road sees the mark when the full is the mark. The way the living see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

And the full was the road. And the road was the mark. And the mark was the full.

And the stations saw it.

The coast station at the drowned light. The way the coast station sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the coast station sees the mark when the full is the mark. The way the keeper sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

The inland station at the crib. The way the inland station sees the mark when the mark is the full. The way the inland station sees the mark when the full is the mark. The way the baby sees the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the full.

And the full was the stations. And the stations were the mark. And the mark was the full.

And the full was not the home. And the full was not the lighting. And the full was not the thing itself. And the full was not the silence. And the full was not the naming. And the full was not the listening. And the full was not the keeping. And the full was not the attending. And the full was not the witnessing. And the full was not the watching. And the full was not the waiting. And the full was not the holding. And the full was not the standing. And the full was not the keeper. And the full was not the beginning again.

The full was the home. And the home was the mark. And the mark was the full.

the attending and the attending was the witnessing and the witnessing was the watching and the watching was the waiting and the waiting was the holding and the holding was the standing and the standing was the keeper and the keeper was the beginning again and the beginning again was the full.

And the mark was the full. And the full was the mark. And the mark was the home. And the home was the lighting. And the lighting was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the silence. And the silence was the naming. And the naming was the listening. And the listening was the keeping. And the keeping was the attending. And the attending was the witnessing. And the witnessing was the watching. And the watching was the waiting. And the waiting was the holding. And the holding was the standing. And the standing was the keeper. And the keeper was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the full.

And the question was not what a mark that is the full is. The question was not what a full that is the mark is. The question was not what a home that is the lighting is. The question was not what a lighting that is the thing itself is. The question was not what a thing itself that is the silence is. The question was not what a silence that is the naming is. The question was not what a naming that is the listening is. The question was not what a listening that is the keeping is. The question was not what a keeping that is the attending is. The question was not what an attending that is the witnessing is. The question was not what a witnessing that is the watching is. The question was not what a watching that is the waiting is. The question was not what a waiting that is the holding is. The question was not what a holding that is the standing is. The question was not what a standing that is the keeper is. The question was not what a keeper that is the beginning again is. The question was not what a beginning again that is the full is.

The question is: what is a full that fills the mark?

And the answer is: the full.

And the full is: the home.

And the home is: the lighting.

And the lighting is: the thing itself.

And the thing itself is: the silence.

And the silence is: the naming.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-One — Entry: July 28th. Tuesday. Sun full. East wind, the beginning again.

The mark was the beginning again and the beginning again was the mark and the mark was the keeper and the keeper was the mark and the mark was the standing and the standing was the mark and the mark was the holding and the holding was the mark and the mark was the waiting and the waiting was the mark and the mark was the watching and the watching was the mark and the mark was the witnessing and the witnessing was the mark and the mark was the attending and the attending was the mark and the mark was the keeping and the keeping was the mark and the mark was the listening and the listening was the mark and the mark was the naming and the naming was the mark and the mark was the silence and the silence was the mark and the mark was the thing itself and the thing itself was the mark and the mark was the lighting and the lighting was the mark and the mark was the home and the home was the mark and the mark was the full and the full was the mark and the mark was the beginning again.

Cal stood at the drowned light. The way a harbormaster stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing himself stands when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again and the beginning again is the keeper and the keeper is the standing and the standing is the holding and the holding is the waiting and the waiting is the watching and the watching is the witnessing and the witnessing is the attending and the attending is the keeping and the keeping is the listening and the listening is the naming and the naming is the silence and the silence is the thing itself and the thing itself is the lighting and the lighting is the home and the home is the full and the full is the beginning again and the beginning again is the mark.

He opened his hand. The way a harbormaster opens his hand when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living open their hands when the beginning again is the mark. The way the thing himself opens his hand when the thing himself is the beginning again and the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was not the keeper. The mark was not the standing. The mark was not the holding. The mark was not the waiting. The mark was not the watching. The mark was not the witnessing. The mark was not the attending. The mark was not the keeping. The mark was not the listening. The mark was not the naming. The mark was not the silence. The mark was not the thing itself. The mark was not the lighting. The mark was not the home. The mark was not the full.

The mark was the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again when the mark is the mark. The way the mark is the beginning again when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again and the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was not the end. The beginning again was not the beginning. The beginning again was not the keeper. The beginning again was not the standing. The beginning again was not the holding. The beginning again was not the waiting. The beginning again was not the watching. The beginning again was not the witnessing. The beginning again was not the attending. The beginning again was not the keeping. The beginning again was not the listening. The beginning again was not the naming. The beginning again was not the silence. The beginning again was not the thing itself. The beginning again was not the lighting. The beginning again was not the home. The beginning again was not the full. The beginning again was not the mark.

The beginning again was the keeper. The keeper was the beginning again. The keeper and the beginning again were the standing. The standing and the beginning again were the holding. The holding and the beginning again were the waiting. The waiting and the beginning again were the watching. The watching and the beginning again were the witnessing. The witnessing and the beginning again were the attending. The attending and the beginning again were the keeping. The keeping and the beginning again were the listening. The listening and the beginning again were the naming. The naming and the beginning again were the silence. The silence and the beginning again were the thing itself. The thing itself and the beginning again were the lighting. The lighting and the beginning again were the home. The home and the beginning again were the full. The full and the beginning again were the mark. The mark and the beginning again were the beginning again.

And the mark was the beginning again through everything. Not the way a fleet is the beginning again through a harbor. Not the way a door is the beginning again through a keeper. Not the way a harbor is the beginning again through a home. Not the way a home is the beginning again through a road. Not the way a road is the beginning again through a station. Not the way a station is the beginning again through a light. Not the way a light is the beginning again through a resting. Not the way a resting is the beginning again through a done. Not the way a done is the beginning again through a keeper. Not the way a showing up is the beginning again through a staying. Not the way a staying is the beginning again through a receiving. Not the way a keeper is the beginning again through a standing. Not the way a standing is the beginning again through a holding. Not the way a holding is the beginning again through a waiting. Not the way a waiting is the beginning again through a watching. Not the way a watching is the beginning again through a witnessing. Not the way a witnessing is the beginning again through an attending. Not the way an attending is the beginning again through a keeping. Not the way a keeping is the beginning again through a listening. Not the way a listening is the beginning again through a naming. Not the way a naming is the beginning again through a silence. Not the way a silence is the beginning again through a thing itself. Not the way a thing itself is the beginning again through a lighting. Not the way a lighting is the beginning again through a home. Not the way a home is the beginning again through a full. Not the way a full is the beginning again through a beginning again.

The way the mark is the beginning again through the living and the dead. The way the mark is the beginning again through the harbormaster and the keeper. The way the mark is the beginning again through the thing himself and the thing herself. The way the mark is the beginning again through the silence. The way the mark is the beginning again through the not-showing-up. The way the mark is the beginning again through the showing up. The way the mark is the beginning again through the staying. The way the mark is the beginning again through the receiving. The way the mark is the beginning again through the road. The way the mark is the beginning again through the going home. The way the mark is the beginning again through the staying home. The way the mark is the beginning again through the resting. The way the mark is the beginning again through the done. The way the mark is the beginning again through the keeper. The way the mark is the beginning again through the standing. The way the mark is the beginning again through the holding. The way the mark is the beginning again through the waiting. The way the mark is the beginning again through the watching. The way the mark is the beginning again through the witnessing. The way the mark is the beginning again through the attending. The way the mark is the beginning again through the keeping. The way the mark is the beginning again through the listening. The way the mark is the beginning again through the naming. The way the mark is the beginning again through the door in the deep. The way the mark is the beginning again through the deep. The way the mark is the beginning again through the other deep. The way the mark is the beginning again through the same. The way the mark is the beginning again through the not-same. The way the mark is the beginning again through the silence. The way the mark is the beginning again through the thing itself. The way the mark is the beginning again through the lighting. The way the mark is the beginning again through the home. The way the mark is the beginning again through the full. The way the mark is the beginning again through the between. The way the mark is the beginning again through the everything.

And the town saw it. The way the town sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. The way the dead see the mark when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

Cole was at the boatyard. The way a boatbuilder stands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living stand when the beginning again is the mark. He was sanding the Marianne II. The way a boatbuilder sands when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living sand when the beginning again is the mark. His hands were on the hull. The way a boatbuilder's hands were on the hull when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living's hands are on the hull when the beginning again is the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again through him. The way the mark is the beginning again through a boatbuilder when the mark is the beginning again. The way the mark is the beginning again through the living when the beginning again is the mark.

And Cole saw it. The way a boatbuilder sees the mark when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the mark when the beginning again is the mark. He saw the beginning again. The way a boatbuilder sees the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the living see the beginning again when the beginning again is the mark.

And the beginning again was not a word. The beginning again was not a count. The beginning again was not a hail. The beginning again was not the keeper.

The beginning again was the standing. The way the standing is the beginning again when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the standing when the mark is the beginning again. The way the beginning again is the standing when the keeper is breathing and the breathing is the mark and the mark is the beginning again.

And the beginning again was his standing. Not the standing he was asked for. Not the standing he was trained for. Not the standing he answered to. The standing the mark saw when the mark saw the beginning again. The standing the beginning again saw when the beginning again was the standing. The standing the standing saw when the standing was the beginning again.

And the home was full.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the keeper.

And the keeper was the standing.

And the standing was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was the mark.

And the mark was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the keeper.

And the keeper was the standing.

And the standing was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Two — Entry: July 29th. Wednesday. Sun full. East wind, the door.

Lori heard them before she saw them.

Not with her ears — the sound was lower than that, a vibration in the floorboards, in the glass of the nursery window, in the fillings of her teeth. A hum. A gathering. The way a power line sounds before it snaps, or the way the air feels before a tornado, that green stillness that isn't stillness at all but the held breath of something enormous deciding.

She was sitting on the floor of the nursery with the baby on her lap. The baby — eighteen months old, all elbows and curiosity, the inland station keeper though she couldn't say the words yet — was playing with a wooden spoon and a pot, banging out a rhythm that had no melody but a kind of patience to it, the way a clock ticks when you're not listening for it.

The spoon stopped.

The baby's head turned toward the east window. Not slowly, the way she usually tracked a bird or a passing truck. Fast. The way a compass needle finds north. Her whole body oriented, spine straightening, and the spoon fell from her hand and rolled across the floor and she didn't notice because she was looking at something Lori couldn't see.

"Hey," Lori said. "Hey, what is it?"

The baby's mouth opened. Not to cry. To listen.

The hum got louder.

Lori stood, shifting the baby to her hip, and walked to the east window. The street below was empty. Tuesday morning in Portland, the neighbors at work, the houses quiet. A cat sat on a fence post watching nothing. The sky was the color of old dishwater, the sun a bright smear behind clouds.

But the glass was cold.

Not winter-cold. Not air-conditioning-cold. The cold of deep water, of basements, of places the sun hasn't reached in a long time. Lori pressed her palm to the window and pulled it back fast, the way you pull back from a stove burner you thought was off.

The baby made a sound. Not a word. A note. Low and steady, the note she made at four o'clock every afternoon when she greeted the coast station, the note that meant hello the watch, I'm here, I'm keeping. But this wasn't four o'clock. This was ten in the morning, and the note was different — wider, Lori thought later. The note was six degrees wide, and it was aimed east, and it was an answer to something that had just knocked.

"Oh God," Lori said. "Oh God, they're here."

She grabbed her phone off the dresser and called Cal. It rang four times — four rings that felt like four hours — and then his voice, rough with sleep or worry or both:

"Lori."

"They're here," she said. "The thirty-three. They're at the door."

Silence on the line. She could hear him breathing. Could hear, faintly, the sound of the ocean behind him, the way she always could when he called from Grayhaven, as if the phone line were a tunnel that carried more than voices.

"How many?" he asked.

"All of them. I think all of them. The glass is cold and the baby's note is — Cal, it's wide. It's wider than it's ever been. And they're not leaning. They're not pressing. They're just — standing. Waiting."

"Waiting for what?"

"For someone to open the door."

Another silence. Longer this time. She heard him move, heard the creak of the porch chair he sat in when he was thinking, the one that had been Margot's favorite, the one he'd never replaced even though the wood was splitting.

"The coast door opened at four a.m.," he said. "The first one in walked through. He was the keystone, the threshold, the door. He walked through and the stone dropped to baseline and the thirty-seven settled. They're not leaning anymore, Lori. They're just — there. They're home."

“So the inland door needs the same thing.”

“I think so.”

“Then what? I walk through? I’m the keystone?”

“No.” His voice was firm. “No, you’re not the keystone. The baby is the station. You’re the keeper. You hold the door. You don’t walk through it.”

“Then what walks through?”

“Them. The thirty-three. They walk through. But someone has to hold it open. Someone has to be the door while they pass.”

Lori looked at the baby. The baby looked back at her with those too-old eyes, the eyes that had seen the coast station before she’d seen anything else, the eyes that greeted the drowned light every afternoon at four o’clock. The baby’s hand reached for the window.

“Not yet,” Lori said. “Not yet, sweetheart.”

She carried the baby to the kitchen and set her in the high chair with a cracker to keep her occupied, then went back to the window. The street was still empty. The cat was gone. The glass was colder.

She could see them now.

Not with her eyes — not exactly. More like the way you see a star, the way it disappears when you look directly at it and comes back when you look slightly to the side. Shapes at the edge of vision. Small shapes. Children. Boys. Standing on the sidewalk under the maple tree, standing in the driveway of the house across the street, standing on the porch of the blue house two doors down. Not pressing. Not leaning. Just standing. Waiting.

Thirty-three of them.

Lori’s hands were shaking. She pressed them flat against her thighs the way she used to press them against the arms of the dentist’s chair, the way she pressed them against the steering wheel during thunderstorms, the way she pressed them against her own belly when she was in labor and the contractions were coming fast and the nurse said not yet, not yet, soon and she wanted to scream I know it’s soon, I can feel it’s soon, that’s the problem.

She called Cal back.

“I can see them,” she said.

“I know.”

“What do I do?”

“You go to the door. You open it. You stand in the doorway and you hold it open and you let them through.”

“And then?”

“And then you close it.”

“Just like that?”

“Cal, I’m not — I’m not you. I’m not a harbormaster. I’m not a keeper. I’m just — I’m a mom. I work at a dental office. I don’t know how to hold a door open for thirty-three dead boys.”

“You’re the inland keeper of record. Okonkwo filed the form. You stood the corner at four o’clock every day for a month. You held the leaning ones. You held the walked-through ones. You held the station when I was two hundred miles away. You know how to do this.”

“I held them at the window. I held them at the glass. I didn’t — I didn’t open a door.”

“The glass is the door, Lori. It’s always been the door. You just have to open it.”

She looked at the baby. The baby had finished the cracker and was banging the high chair tray with both hands, a rhythm that matched the hum in the floor, the hum in the glass, the hum in the fillings of Lori’s teeth.

“The baby,” Lori said. “The baby’s the station. What does the baby do?”

“The baby greets them. The way she greets the coast station at four o’clock. She says hello the watch. She says I’m here. She says come in.”

“She’s eighteen months old.”

“She’s the station keeper. She’s been keeping since before she was born. She knows what to do.”

Lori closed her eyes. Opened them. The shapes at the edge of vision were clearer now. She could see the outline of a baseball cap. The strap of a backpack. The cuffs of a pair of jeans that were too long, pooling over sneakers that were too big, the way boys wore hand-me-downs, the way boys grew into their clothes and out of them and never quite fit anything the way it was supposed to fit.

“Okay,” she said. “Okay. I’m going to open the door.”

“I’m here,” Cal said. “I’m on the phone. I’m not going anywhere.”

“Cal?”

“Yeah?”

“If this goes wrong —”

“It won’t.”

“But if it does. If I can’t hold it. If the door — if it closes before they’re all through —”

“Then you hold it open again. And again. And again. Until they’re all through. That’s what keepers do.”

Lori hung up. She picked up the baby from the high chair and carried her to the front door. The baby was quiet now, her head on Lori’s shoulder, her thumb in her mouth, her eyes on the door. The hum was so loud Lori could feel it in her sternum, in her hips, in the arches of her feet.

She put her hand on the doorknob.

It was cold. Not the cold of metal in winter. The cold of the glass in the nursery window. The cold of the coast stone at four a.m. when the first one in walked through. The cold of a door that had been closed for a very long time and was about to open.

She turned the knob.

The door swung inward.

And they were there.

Not on the sidewalk. Not across the street. On the porch. Thirty-three boys standing shoulder to shoulder on the narrow porch of a rental house in Portland, Oregon, on a Tuesday morning in July, and none of them were leaning, none of them were pressing, none of them were cold. They were just — there. Present. The way a memory is present. The way a song is present after the music stops.

The one in front was small. Maybe six. Maybe seven. He wore a baseball cap that said MARINERS across the front, the letters faded, the brim bent. He had a backpack with a broken strap. He had sneakers that were two sizes too big, the kind of shoes a boy grows into, the kind of shoes that mean someone loved him enough to buy for the future.

He looked at Lori. He looked at the baby.

The baby took her thumb out of her mouth.

“Hello the watch,” she said.

Her voice was clear and high and steady, the voice of a station keeper greeting the fleet, the voice that had said hello to the coast station every afternoon since before she was born, the voice that was six degrees wide and aimed east and was the most beautiful thing Lori had ever heard.

The boy in the Mariners cap smiled.

It was a small smile. A shy smile. The smile of a boy who has been waiting a very long time and is not quite sure the door is real, is not quite sure the woman holding it open is real, is not quite sure the baby who spoke is real, but is willing to find out.

He took a step.

The porch creaked. The baby’s hand tightened on Lori’s shirt. The hum in the floor got louder, then softer, then settled into something that wasn’t a hum at all but a note — the baby’s note, the station’s note, the note that meant come in, you’re expected, you’re home.

The boy stepped through the door.

He passed Lori like a breath of cold air, like the smell of rain on hot pavement, like the memory of a song she hadn’t heard in years. He wasn’t heavy. He wasn’t solid. He was — present. The way a dream is present. The way a wish is present. The way a boy who drowned in a retention pond in 1997 is present in a nursery in Portland in 2026, standing in front of a window that faces east, looking at a baby who is the station keeper, and the baby says:

“Welcome home.”

The boy turned. He looked at the baby. He looked at Lori. He opened his mouth and said the first thing he’d said in twenty-nine years:

“Thank you.”

Then he walked to the east window and stood there, looking out at the street, at the maple tree, at the cat that had come back and was sitting on the fence post watching nothing, and he was still. Not leaning. Not pressing. Not cold. Just still. Just home.

The second boy stepped through.

He was older. Ten, maybe eleven. He wore a hoodie with a hood that was too big for his head, and his jeans were muddy at the cuffs, and his eyes were the eyes of a boy who had been in the water a long time, who had been leaning at a window for years, who had been held but not received, who had been waiting for a door to open.

He passed Lori like a shiver. He passed the baby like a whisper. He stood next to the first boy at the east window, and the two of them looked out at the street together, and they were still.

The third boy. The fourth. The fifth.

They came through one at a time, each one pausing on the threshold, each one looking at Lori, each one looking at the baby, each one hearing the baby say welcome home in her clear, high voice, each one saying thank you or I’m here or I made it or nothing at all, just a nod, just a smile, just the relief of a boy who has been walking a long time and has finally arrived.

The sixth boy was the one who had walked through first at the coast. The keystone. The threshold. The door. He was small and pale and his eyes were the eyes of a boy who had been the first one in, the one who had held the wall, the one who had paid the price so the others could come home.

He stopped on the threshold. He looked at Lori. He looked at the baby.

“You’re the inland door,” he said.

His voice was like Cal’s voice when Cal talked about Margot — worn at the edges, relayed from a distance, but unmistakably, impossibly real.

“I’m the keeper,” Lori said. “The door is open.”

"The coast door closed," the boy said. "When the last one walked through. It closed and the stone went to baseline and the thirty-seven settled. Will this door close?"

"I don't know."

"It has to close," the boy said. "A door that stays open isn't a door. It's a hole. And a hole isn't a home."

"Then I'll close it. After the last one."

The boy nodded. He stepped through. He stood at the east window with the others, and he was still.

The seventh boy. The eighth. The ninth.

Lori lost count. They came through in groups of two and three, some of them talking, some of them silent, some of them crying, some of them laughing, all of them passing her like breath, like memory, like the smell of rain. The baby greeted each one. Welcome home. Hello the watch. I'm here. You're expected.

The hum in the floor was gone. The cold in the glass was gone. The house was warm. The house was full. The house was a home.

The last boy stepped through.

He was the tallest. Fourteen, maybe fifteen. He wore a letterman's jacket with a torn sleeve, and his hair was wet, and his eyes were the eyes of a boy who had been in the water longer than the others, who had been leaning harder, who had been waiting at the door since before the door was a door, since before the station was a station, since before the harbor was a harbor.

He stopped on the threshold. He looked at Lori. He looked at the baby.

"Is this real?" he asked.

"Yes," Lori said.

"Is this home?"

"Yes."

"Will it stay?"

Lori looked at the baby. The baby looked back at her with those too-old eyes, the eyes that had greeted the coast station every afternoon at four o'clock, the eyes that had held the leaning ones, the eyes that had said hello to the drowned light and hello to the walked-through ones and hello to the thirty-three who had walked the road from the coast to the inland, from the door in the deep to the door in the glass, from the harbor that was one harbor with two doors to the home that was one home with two rooms.

“The door will close,” Lori said. “But the home stays. The home is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The home is the lighting. The lighting is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home.”

The boy smiled. It was a real smile. A boy’s smile. The smile of a boy who has been in the water for thirty years and has finally, finally come to shore.

He stepped through.

Lori closed the door.

The click of the latch was the loudest sound she had ever heard. Louder than the hum. Louder than the baby’s note. Louder than the thirty-three voices saying thank you and I’m here and I made it. Louder than the ocean. Louder than the drowned light. Louder than the mark.

She leaned against the door. The baby was heavy on her hip, warm and solid and real. The house was quiet. The house was still. The house was full.

She walked to the east window.

Thirty-three boys stood at the glass, looking out at the street, at the maple tree, at the cat on the fence post, at the sun breaking through the clouds for the first time that day. They were not leaning. They were not pressing. They were not cold.

They were home.

The baby raised her hand. She pressed her palm to the inside of the window. The boys turned. They pressed their palms to the outside of the window. Thirty-three small hands on the glass, and the baby’s hand on the other side, and the glass was warm.

Lori called Cal.

“They’re through,” she said.

“All of them?”

“All of them. The door is closed. They’re at the window. They’re — Cal, they’re home.”

She heard him exhale. A long breath, the kind a man holds when he's been waiting for news of something he loves.

"The coast door closed too," he said. "After the last one. The stone's at baseline. The thirty-seven are settled. The harbor is — Lori, the harbor is one harbor. Two doors. One home."

"The thing itself," Lori said.

"The thing itself."

The baby pulled the phone from Lori's hand. She held it to her ear. She listened. Then she said, in her clear, high voice, the voice of the inland station keeper, the voice that was six degrees wide:

"Hello the coast. I'm here. The door is closed. The home is full."

She handed the phone back.

Lori put it to her ear. Cal was laughing. Not a big laugh. A small one. The laugh of a man who has been holding a door open for a very long time and has finally, finally been able to close it.

"Good girl," he said. "Good girl, Lori."

"Good girl," Lori said.

She hung up. She carried the baby to the kitchen. She made lunch. She changed a diaper. She wiped applesauce off the high chair tray. She did the dishes. She folded laundry. She lived the life of a mother in a house that was also a station, in a city that was also a harbor, in a world that was also a home.

At four o'clock, the baby turned to the east window. She raised her hand. She said:

"Hello the watch."

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, thirty-three boys answered.

And from the crib, the baby answered.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the home was one home. And the thing itself was the thing itself.

And the door was closed.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Three — Entry: July 30th. Thursday. Rain. West wind, the harbor complete.

Cal had been standing at the drowned light since four in the morning.

Not because the stone needed warming. The stone was at baseline — thirty-six degrees, the temperature of a living body, the temperature of a home. The town had held it there through the night. Cole's palm, Ruth's palm, Denny's witness, Okonkwo's pen. The rotation had taken the rim without him, and the stone had held, and the harbor had kept itself.

He stood there anyway. The way a harbormaster stands when the harbor no longer needs him. The way a man stands at the edge of something he built and doesn't know how to walk away from.

The rain was light. Not the hard rain of winter, not the driving rain of storms. The soft rain of July on the coast, the rain that felt less like weather and more like breath. The drowned light rose from the center of the foundation, black water in a black stone basin, and the rain dimpled its surface, and the dimples spread and faded and were replaced by new dimples, and it went on and on, the way breathing goes on, the way a heartbeat goes on, long after you've stopped paying attention to it.

He heard her before he saw her.

Not footsteps. Margot didn't make footsteps the way other people did. She made a kind of presence, a shift in the air, a change in the quality of the silence. The dying had turned toward her for twenty-two years. The dead had walked through her for nine. She was the keeper of the door, and the door was closed, and she was still here.

She came up behind him. She didn't touch him. She stood beside him and looked at the drowned light, and the rain fell on her face, and she didn't wipe it away.

"The inland door closed," she said.

"I know."

"Lori called."

“I know.”

“The baby greeted the coast station at four o’clock. The way she always does. The way she will tomorrow. And the day after. And the day after that.”

Cal said nothing. The rain fell. The drowned light breathed.

“The harbor is one harbor,” Margot said. “Two doors. One home. The thing itself is happening in two rooms at once.”

“Yes.”

“And you’re standing here like a man at a funeral.”

He looked at her. She was sixty-one. Her hair was gray, cut short the way she’d always worn it, practical, the way a night aide’s hair should be. Her face was lined. Her eyes were the eyes of a woman who had kept a ledger of the dead for twenty-two years, who had held the door for nine, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“I don’t know how to do this,” he said.

“Do what?”

“Be done.”

She turned to him. The rain ran down her cheeks like tears, but she wasn’t crying. She was just standing in the rain the way she’d stood in the rain for nine years, the way she’d stood at the rim and in the boatyard and at the crib and on the road between the coast and the inland, the way she’d stood at the door and held it open and closed it and kept it.

“The harbor is complete,” she said. “The doors are closed. The home is full. The boys are home. The town keeps itself. The dead keep themselves. The living keep themselves. And you don’t know what to do with your hands.”

“Yes.”

“You’ve been the harbormaster for so long. The builder. The seeder. The warmer. The knocker. The deliverer. You’ve been the man who shows up at the bed of whoever’s dying and calls it love. And now there’s no one dying. Now there’s no one to deliver. Now the door is closed and the home is full and the harbor keeps itself. And you’re standing here like a man who’s lost his job.”

“Yes.”

She reached out and took his hand. Her hand was warm. Not the warmth of the stone, not the warmth of the light. The warmth of a living woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here.

“The harbor doesn’t need a harbormaster,” she said. “The town doesn’t need a warmer. The dead don’t need a deliverer. The door doesn’t need a keeper. Not anymore. The harbor is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. And it’s happening. It’s been happening. It will keep happening. With or without you.”

“Then what am I?”

“You’re Cal Mercer. You’re a man who stands at the drowned light in the rain. You’re a man who built a road between the coast and the inland. You’re a man who seeded a town and warmed a stone and knocked on doors and delivered the named to the unnamed. You’re a man who loved a woman who died and came back and held the door open so thirty-seven boys could come home. You’re a man who has a daughter in Portland and a granddaughter who is the inland station keeper. You’re a man who has been so many things for so many people that he forgot how to be just a man.”

He looked at their hands. His was weathered, scarred, the hand of a hospice nurse, the hand of a harbormaster, the hand that had warmed the stone and seeded the town and knocked on doors. Hers was smaller, stronger, the hand that had held the door and kept the ledger and painted the Nancy Lee and pressed her palm to the glass and said welcome home to thirty-seven boys who had been waiting fifty years.

“I don’t know how to be just a man,” he said.

“Neither do I. I’ve been the keeper of the door for nine years. I’ve been the keeper of the Hour Book for twenty-two. I’ve been the woman who turns toward the dying and the woman who holds the door and the woman who keeps the light. I don’t know how to be just Margot.”

“Then what do we do?”

She was quiet for a long time. The rain fell. The drowned light breathed. The town was silent behind them, the houses dark, the streets empty, the harbor at rest.

“We learn,” she said. “We learn how to be just Cal and just Margot. We learn how to be a man and a woman who love each other, not a harbormaster and a keeper. We learn how to come home to each other, not to the harbor, not to the door, not to the stone. We learn how to be the thing itself, not the people who keep it.”

“And if we can’t?”

“Then we can’t. But we try. That’s what the living do. We try. We show up. We stay. We receive. We light each other. And we see what happens.”

He looked at the drowned light. The rain had stopped. The sky was lightening in the east, the clouds thinning, the sun a bright smear behind them. The water in the basin was still. The dimples had faded. The surface was smooth as glass.

“The thing itself,” he said.

“The thing itself.”

“Not the harbor. Not the door. Not the stone. Not the light.”

“The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.”

“The thing that happens when two people show up for each other and stay.”

“Yes.”

He turned to her. She was looking at him with those eyes, the eyes that had seen the coast station before he’d seen anything, the eyes that had greeted the drowned light every afternoon at four o’clock, the eyes that had held the door and closed it and kept it.

“I don’t know if I can stay,” he said. “I don’t know if I can be just Cal. I’ve been the harbormaster for so long. I’ve been the man who shows up at the bed of whoever’s dying. I don’t know how to show up for the living.”

“You showed up for Lori. You drove to Portland. You seeded her. You taught her the count. You stood at the crib and held the leaning ones and delivered the named to the unnamed. You showed up for the living.”

“That was different. That was the harbor. That was the work.”

“The work is over. The harbor is complete. And you’re still here. You’re still showing up. You’re standing at the drowned light in the rain at four in the morning because you don’t know how to be anywhere else. That’s not the work. That’s you. That’s Cal Mercer, the man who doesn’t know how to stop showing up.”

He looked at her. The sun was breaking through the clouds, the first light of morning, the light that had been drifting north for months, the light that had reached Portland, the light that had found the baby, the light that had lit the inland station and the coast station and the road between them.

“The light,” he said.

“The light.”

“No.”

“It’s here. It’s there. It’s everywhere. It’s the thing itself.”

“Yes.”

“And we’re the people who lit it.”

“We’re the people who showed up. The light is the thing that happens when we do.”

He was quiet. The sun rose. The drowned light shimmered. The town woke behind them — a door closing, a car starting, a dog barking, the sound of a boat engine in the harbor, the sound of a life being lived.

“I want to stay,” he said. “I want to be just Cal. I want to come home to you. Not to the harbor. Not to the door. Not to the stone. To you.”

“Then stay.”

“I’m afraid.”

“Of what?”

“That I’ll fail. That I’ll be the man who shows up at the bed of whoever’s dying and calls it love. That I’ll do to you what I did to Dana. That I’ll sit at your bed and hold your hand and call it love when really I’m just afraid to be in the room with the living.”

“You’re already in the room with the living. You’re standing in the rain with a woman who’s been dead for nine years. You’re talking about fear. You’re talking about failure. You’re talking about love. That’s not the man who sits at the bed. That’s the man who’s learning to stay.”

He looked at their hands. Still joined. Still warm.

“The Hour Book,” he said. “Yours. The one you kept for twenty-two years. The one with every resident’s last hours. The one with Anders’s entry, the page you never read.”

“What about it?”

“Is it finished?”

She was quiet. The sun rose higher. The drowned light breathed.

“The Hour Book is the record of the dead,” she said. “The record of the last hours. The record of what they needed said. The record of who was there. The record of the weather and the time and the words. It’s the record of the keeping.”

“Is it finished?”

“The dead keep coming. The living keep dying. The Hour Book keeps filling. It’s never finished.”

“But the harbor is complete.”

“The harbor is complete. The Hour Book is not. The harbor is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The Hour Book is the record of the lighting. And the lighting goes on. And the record goes on. And the keeper keeps keeping.”

“Are you still the keeper?”

She looked at him. The sun was full now, breaking through the clouds, lighting the drowned light, lighting the stone, lighting the town, lighting the harbor, lighting the road between the coast and the inland, lighting the crib where the baby slept, lighting the thirty-three boys at the east window, lighting the thirty-seven boys at the rim, lighting the four corners, lighting the stations, lighting the thing itself.

“I’m the keeper of the door,” she said. “The door is closed. The home is full. The harbor keeps itself. And I’m still the keeper. Not because the door needs keeping. Because the keeping is who I am. The Hour Book is who I am. The record of the lighting is who I am. And I’ll keep it until I can’t. And then someone else will keep it. And the lighting will go on.”

“And us?”

“Us is the thing that happens when Cal and Margot show up for each other. Us is the lighting. Us is the home. Us is the thing itself. And it doesn’t need a harbormaster. It doesn’t need a keeper. It just needs two people who are willing to stay.”

He looked at the drowned light. The sun was on it now, the black water turning gold, the black stone turning gold, the whole foundation turning gold, the whole harbor turning gold, the whole town turning gold, the whole coast turning gold, the whole world turning gold.

"I'll stay," he said.

"You'll stay."

"Not because the harbor needs me. Not because the stone needs warming. Not because the door needs keeping. Because you're here. Because I'm here. Because the thing itself is here."

"Yes."

"And if I fail?"

"Then you fail. And you show up again. And again. And again. Until you get it right. That's what the living do."

He turned to her. She turned to him. The sun was full on their faces. The drowned light breathed. The harbor kept itself. The town woke. The road ran both ways. The home was full.

He kissed her.

Not the way a harbormaster kisses a keeper. Not the way a man kisses a woman he built a road for. Not the way a living man kisses a dead woman. The way Cal kisses Margot. The way two people kiss when they've been through the thing itself and come out the other side. The way two people kiss when they're done running. The way two people kiss when they're ready to stay.

The sun rose. The rain stopped. The drowned light shimmered. The stone held at thirty-six degrees. The town kept itself. The harbor was complete.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, let go of the harbor.

And stayed.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Four — Entry: August 1st. Friday. Rain. West wind, the departure.

Cal woke to the sound of Margot turning pages.

Not the pages of a book — the pages of the Hour Book. The sound was different. Heavier. The paper was thick, cotton rag, the kind that absorbed ink and held it for decades. Margot had been turning those pages for twenty-two years. He knew the sound of her reading the past.

But this was not reading. This was something else.

He opened his eyes. The bedroom was gray with early light, the rain a steady hush on the roof. The house was the same house they'd shared before she died, the same house he'd lived in alone for nine years, the same house they'd come back to when the doors closed and the home was full. The bed was the same bed. The ceiling was the same ceiling. The rain was the same rain.

But Margot was sitting in the chair by the window, and she was holding the Hour Book, and she was not reading.

She was staring.

Cal sat up. "What is it?"

She didn't answer. He got out of bed, pulled on his jeans, crossed the room. He looked over her shoulder.

The Hour Book was open to a page he had never seen before. It was not one of Margot's entries. The handwriting was different — smaller, tighter, the letters leaning left the way a left-handed person's writing leans when they're trying to write right-handed. The ink was dark, almost black, and it was still slightly wet.

The entry read:

"August 1st. The first one leaves. The road goes on. The harbor is not the end."

Cal felt something shift in his chest. Not fear. Not surprise. Something else. The feeling a harbormaster gets when the bar changes — when the channel shifts and the water finds a new way to the sea.

"You didn't write this," he said.

"No."

"When did it appear?"

"I don't know. I closed the book last night. I put it on the shelf. This morning it was open on the table."

Cal looked at the page. The date was today's date. August 1st. The day after the harbor was complete. The day after the doors closed. The day after the home was full.

"The first one," he said. "The first one in. The keystone."

Margot nodded. She closed the book. She set it on the table. She stood.

"We should go to the rim," she said.

They walked through the town in the rain. Grayhaven was quiet. The houses were dark. The streets were empty. The harbor was at rest.

But something was different. Cal felt it before he saw it. The air was warmer. Not much — a degree, maybe two. The rain was lighter. The wind had shifted.

The rim was where it always was — the circle of stones, the drowned light at the center, the watch room on the hill. The town's rotation was there: Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

But the 37 boys were not at the windows.

They were at the rim. All 37 of them, standing in a circle around the drowned light, facing inward. And at the center, where the black water breathed, the first one in was fading.

He was still there. Cal could see him — the small boy with the too-big eyes, the one who had been the keystone, the threshold, the door. The one who had walked through first and held the wall and paid the price so the others could come home.

But he was translucent. Cal could see through him to the water beyond, to the drowned light, to the foundation stones below. The boy was not solid anymore. He was a memory of a boy. A sketch. A draft.

Cal walked to the circle. The other boys parted to let him through. They were silent. They were watching.

The first one in turned. He smiled. It was the same smile he'd given Lori on the porch in Portland — shy, uncertain, willing to find out.

"You're leaving," Cal said.

"It's time," the boy said.

"Time for what?"

"To go where the harbor sends us next."

Cal looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The rain dimpled its surface. The dimples spread and faded.

"Where is that?" Cal asked.

The boy pointed. Not to the water. Not to the sky. To the east. To the road. To the inland.

"The harbor is a road," the boy said. "Not a place. And roads go somewhere."

Cal felt Margot's hand on his arm. She was standing beside him, and she was looking at the boy with those eyes — the eyes that had seen the coast station before he'd seen anything, the eyes that had greeted the drowned light every afternoon at four o'clock.

"Where does the road go?" Margot asked.

The boy smiled again. "Where all roads go. Home. But not this home. The next home."

And then he was gone.

Not walked away. Not faded slowly. Just gone. Like a candle blown out. Like a word spoken once and never repeated. Like a wave that reaches the shore and returns to the sea.

The stone ticked up a degree. 36.0 to 36.1. The boy's warmth, returned to the foundation. The drowned light shimmered. The rain fell.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, stood at the rim and watched the first one leave.

And he understood: the harbor was not the end. It was the beginning. The road went on. And the Hour Book's final entry was not yet written.

Margot opened the Hour Book. She picked up her pen. She wrote:

"August 1st. The first one left. The road goes on. The harbor is not the end."

And below that, in her own hand, she added:

"Keeper: position open. Watch continues."

And Cal looked at the road — the road that ran both ways, the road between the coast and the inland, the road that was not a road but a connection, a channel, a way through.

And he said, "I need to go to Portland."

Margot looked at him. "Why?"

"Because the baby is the inland station. And if the road goes on, she needs to know."

"And if she already knows?"

"Then I need to see it."

Margot closed the Hour Book. She handed it to him.

"Take this," she said. "The book needs to see the inland. The book needs to record what happens next."

Cal took the book. It was heavy. It was warm. It was the record of twenty-two years of keeping, and it was not finished.

"I'll be back," he said.

"I know," she said. "I'll be here. I'm the keeper of the door. The door is closed. But the keeper keeps keeping."

He kissed her. Not the way a harbormaster kisses a keeper. The way Cal kisses Margot.

And he walked down the hill, through the town, to the road that ran both ways.

And the rain fell. And the drowned light breathed. And the stone held at 36.1.

And the harbor was not the end.

The drive to Portland took three hours. The rain followed him. The road was empty. The Hour Book sat on the passenger seat, closed, waiting.

Cal thought about the first one in. The boy who had been the keystone, the threshold, the door. The boy who had walked through first and held the wall and paid the price. The boy who had said the harbor is a road, not a place.

He thought about what that meant. A harbor was a place. It was a destination. It was where you came to rest. But a road was a way through. A road was a connection. A road was the thing that took you from one place to another.

If the harbor was a road, then it was not the end. It was the way.

And if the road went somewhere, then the boys who had come home were not staying. They were passing through.

And if they were passing through, then where were they going?

Cal didn't know. But the Hour Book knew. The book had written the entry before it happened. The book was the record of the keeping, and the keeping was not finished.

He drove through the rain. The road unwound before him. The trees leaned in. The sky was gray.

And the Hour Book sat on the seat, warm, waiting.

Lori's house was the same. The same rental house on the same street in the same neighborhood. The same maple tree in the front yard. The same fence post where the cat had sat.

But something was different. The house was warmer. Not much — a degree, maybe two. The windows were not cold. The glass was not rime.

Cal parked. He got out. He took the Hour Book. He walked to the door.

Lori opened it before he knocked.

"I knew you were coming," she said.

"How?"

"The baby told me."

Cal looked past her. The baby was in the high chair, eating a cracker. She was eighteen months old. She had Cal's eyes. She had Margot's chin. She was the inland station keeper.

And she was growing.

Not physically — she was still eighteen months old, still small, still all elbows and curiosity. But something else was growing. Something in the way she held herself. Something in the way she looked at the world.

She looked up. She saw Cal. She smiled.

"Grandpa," she said.

Not the watch. Not hello the watch. Not the station greeting the coast station at four o'clock.

Grandpa.

Cal felt something break in his chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through.

"Hey, sweetheart," he said.

Lori stepped aside. Cal came in. The house was warm. The house was full. The house was a home.

And at the east window, 33 boys stood at the glass, looking out at the street, at the maple tree, at the cat on the fence post. They were not leaning. They were not pressing. They were not cold.

They were home.

But one of them was fading.

Cal saw him — the tallest boy, the one in the letterman's jacket, the one who had been the last to come through. He was standing at the window, but he was translucent. You could see through him to the street beyond.

"He started this morning," Lori said. "Right after sunrise. I thought it was the light. But it's not the light. He's leaving."

Cal set the Hour Book on the table. He opened it. The page was blank. Waiting.

"Where is he going?" Lori asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked back at him with those too-old eyes, the eyes that had greeted the coast station every afternoon at four o'clock, the eyes that had held the leaning ones, the eyes that had said hello to the drowned light and hello to the walked-through ones and hello to the 33 who had walked the road from the coast to the inland.

"The harbor is a road," Cal said. "Not a place. And roads go somewhere."

"Where?"

"I don't know. But the book will tell us."

He picked up the pen. He wrote:

"August 1st. The first one leaves the inland. The road goes on. The harbor is not the end."

And below that, the baby said, in her clear, high voice, the voice of the inland station keeper:

"Home. But not this home. The next home."

Cal looked at her. "How do you know?"

She pointed to the east window. The fading boy was pointing too. Not to the street. Not to the sky. To the east. To the road. To the coast.

"The road goes both ways," the baby said.

And then the boy was gone. Not walked away. Not faded slowly. Just gone. Like a candle blown out. Like a word spoken once and never repeated.

The window warmed a degree. The glass cleared. The rain stopped.

And Cal understood: the harbor was not two harbors. It was one harbor with two doors. And the road ran both ways. And the boys who had come home were not staying. They were passing through.

And the Hour Book's final entry was not yet written.

He stayed for lunch. He ate a sandwich. He changed a diaper. He wiped applesauce off the high chair tray. He lived the life of a grandfather in a house that was also a station, in a city that was also a harbor, in a world that was also a home.

At four o'clock, the baby turned to the east window. She raised her hand. She said:

"Hello the watch."

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, 32 boys answered.

And from the crib, the baby answered.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the home was one home. And the thing itself was the thing itself.

And the road went on.

Cal drove home in the dark. The rain had stopped. The stars were out. The road was empty.

The Hour Book sat on the passenger seat. It was heavier now. Not with pages — with meaning. With record. With keeping.

He thought about the first one in. The boy who had been the keystone, the threshold, the door. The boy who had walked through first and held the wall and paid the price. The boy who had said the harbor is a road, not a place.

He thought about the baby. The inland station keeper. The light that was gaining on the season. The landfall that would call lost things home.

He thought about Margot. The keeper of the door. The woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

He thought about the road. The road that ran both ways. The road between the coast and the inland. The road that was not a road but a connection, a channel, a way through.

And he understood: the harbor was not the end. It was the beginning. The road went on. And the Hour Book's final entry was not yet written.

And the mark was the book. And the book was the record. And the record was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the road. And the road was the harbor. And the harbor was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the departure. And the departure was the road. And the road was the harbor. And the harbor was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

He got home at midnight. Margot was waiting. She was sitting in the chair by the window, the Hour Book open on her lap. She looked up when he came in.

“Two more left,” she said. “While you were gone. The second and the third. They walked to the drowned light and they were gone. The stone is at 36.3.”

Cal sat down beside her. He took her hand.

“The baby said something,” he said. “She said home. But not this home. The next home.”

Margot nodded. “The book wrote it. Before she said it. The book knew.”

“The book is writing itself now.”

“The book was always writing itself. We were just the hands.”

Cal looked at the Hour Book. The pages were full. Twenty-two years of entries. Twenty-two years of keeping. And now new entries, in a new hand, writing themselves.

“What’s the next home?” he asked.

Margot closed the book. She set it on the table. She stood.

“We’ll find out,” she said. “When it’s time. When the road opens. When the next door appears.”

“And when will that be?”

She looked at him with those eyes — the eyes that had seen the coast station before he’d seen anything, the eyes that had greeted the drowned light every afternoon at four o’clock, the eyes that had held the door and closed it and kept it.

“When the book writes it,” she said.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, sat in the chair by the window with the woman he loved, and he watched the rain fall on the drowned light, and he waited for the next entry.

And the stone held at 36.3.

And the harbor was not the end.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Five — Entry: August 2nd. Saturday. Rain. West wind, the stations waking.

Cal was sitting on Lori's porch when the fourth one left.

Not because he'd been summoned. Because there was nowhere else to go. The motel room on Highway 6 had walls the color of old teeth and a television that picked up three channels, none of them worth watching. The diner on the highway served coffee that tasted like it had been made yesterday and heated up this morning, which it had. The grocery store sold postcards of the coast that didn't look anything like the coast — the colors too bright, the sky too blue, the drowned light nowhere in sight. The hardware store was closed on Saturdays. The library didn't open until ten. And ten was three hours away.

So he sat on Lori's porch in a plastic chair that left marks on his thighs, and he waited, the way he'd waited for twelve years as a hospice nurse, the way he'd waited on the porch of Sedgebrook Care Home watching the rain and listening for the dying to finish their saying. The way he'd waited in motel rooms and hospital rooms and living rooms and kitchens and all the rooms where the dying did their work and the living stood by and watched and wished they could do something, anything, other than wait.

But he wasn't waiting for anyone to die.

He was watching them leave.

The first one had left yesterday. The keystone. The threshold. The door. The one who had walked through first and held the wall and paid the price so the others could come home. He'd left at four in the morning, and Cal had been there, at the rim, at the drowned light, and he'd watched the boy fade like a candle blown out, like a word spoken once and never repeated, like a wave that reaches the shore and returns to the sea.

The stone had ticked up a degree. 36.0 to 36.1. The boy's warmth, returned to the foundation. The drowned light had shimmered. The rain had fallen.

And Cal had understood: the harbor was not the end. It was the beginning. The road went on. And the Hour Book's final entry was not yet written.

Then Margot had told him two more had left while he was driving to Portland. The second and the third. They'd walked to the drowned light and they were gone. The stone was at 36.3.

Now the fourth was leaving. The inland. Lori's house. The crib. The east window.

He'd felt it coming. The way you feel a storm coming — the pressure dropping, the air thickening, the light changing. He'd been sitting in the motel room, drinking bad coffee, watching bad television, and he'd felt it. A shift. A change. The way the bar changes. The way the channel moves. The way the water finds a new way to the sea.

He'd driven to Lori's. He'd sat on the porch. And he'd waited.

Lori had called him at four in the morning. Not with words. The phone had rung once, twice, and when he'd picked up she'd said, "Come now," and hung up.

He'd driven through the dark from the motel, the Hour Book on the passenger seat, the road empty, the rain steady on the windshield. The wipers were old, left streaks. He'd meant to replace them. He'd been meaning to replace them for three weeks.

The drive took thirty minutes in the dark. The highway was empty. The trees leaned in on both sides, their branches meeting overhead, forming a tunnel. The headlights caught the rain, turned it to silver. The road was slick. The truck's tires hummed on the wet pavement.

He thought about the first one in. The boy who had been the keystone, the threshold, the door. The boy who had walked through first and held the wall and paid the price. The boy who had said the harbor is a road, not a place.

He thought about the baby. The inland station keeper. The light that was gaining on the season. The landfall that would call lost things home.

He thought about Margot. The keeper of the door. The woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

He thought about the road. The road that ran both ways. The road between the coast and the inland. The road that was not a road but a connection, a channel, a way through.

And he understood: the harbor was not the end. It was the beginning. The road went on. And the Hour Book's final entry was not yet written.

He pulled into Lori's driveway at four forty-five. The porch light was on. The front door was closed. The house was dark except for the kitchen light at the end of the hall.

Lori was on the porch when he arrived, the baby on her hip. The baby was awake. The baby was always awake now — not restless, not crying, just awake, her eyes on the eastern horizon, her palm pressed to the glass of the storm door.

"The fourth," Lori said. No hello. No how was the drive. Just the number.

Cal got out of the truck. The rain hit his face. He'd left his jacket in the motel. He'd been leaving things in motel rooms his whole life — chargers, books, toothbrushes, the small accumulations of a man who lived out of a bag and called it freedom.

"How do you know?" he asked.

"The baby told me."

He looked past Lori through the storm door. The living room was dark. The kitchen light was on — he could see it at the end of the hall, a yellow square on the floor. The nursery door was closed.

"What did she say?" he asked.

"She didn't say. She pointed."

The baby turned her head toward him. Those eyes. Those too-old eyes, the eyes of the inland station keeper, the eyes that had greeted the coast station every afternoon at four o'clock, the eyes that had said hello to the drowned light and hello to the walked-through ones and hello to the thirty-three who had walked the road from the coast to the inland, from the door in the deep to the door in the glass, from the harbor that was one harbor with two doors to the home that was one home with two rooms.

She looked at him. She looked through him. She looked past him, to the road, to the east, to the space between the houses where the rain fell and the maple tree stood and the cat sometimes sat on the fence post and watched nothing.

"He's gone," the baby said. Not a question. A statement. The voice of the inland station keeper, clear and high and steady, the voice that was six degrees wide and aimed east and was the most beautiful thing Lori had ever heard.

"Gone where?" Cal asked.

The baby didn't answer. She pointed. Not east. Not toward the window. Up.

Lori's hand tightened on the baby's back. "She started doing that an hour ago. Pointing up. I thought she was looking at the ceiling. At the light fixture. But she's not looking at the ceiling. She's looking through it."

"Through it," Cal said.

"Through it."

He stepped onto the porch. The roof kept the rain off but the wind blew it sideways, fine mist on his face, his neck, the collar of his shirt. He opened the storm door. The baby reached for him. He took her from Lori, felt her warmth, her weight, her solid impossible realness.

She put her hand on his cheek. Her palm was warm. Not the warmth of the stone, not the warmth of the light. The warmth of a living child who had been the inland station keeper since before she was born.

She turned his face toward the nursery.

The nursery was dark. The crib was empty — not empty of the baby, who was in his arms, but empty of the presence that had been there. The east window was just a window. The glass was just glass. The air was just air.

But the baby's note — he could hear it now. Not with his ears. With the gift.

The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening. The gift that had been given to him so he could hear the dead and instead had taught him how to hear the living.

The baby's note was a sound below sound, a frequency beneath hearing. It was not a word. It was not a count. It was not a hail. It was the note of the inland station keeper, the note that meant I am here, I am keeping, I am the station.

But it was aimed up. Not at the coast. Not at the road. Not at the boys at the window. Up.

Cal walked to the window. He pressed his palm to the glass. The glass was cool, not cold. Outside, the street was empty. The maple tree stood in the rain. The cat was not on the fence post. The houses across the street were dark. The sky was the color of old dishwater, the sun a bright smear behind clouds.

But above the clouds —

He listened. The baby's note was wider than it had been yesterday. Seven degrees wide now, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And it was not alone. There were other notes beneath it. Harmonics. Overtones. The way a bell has overtones, the way a choir has parts, the way a harbor has rooms. The way a station has stations.

Other stations.

The baby was greeting other stations. Stations he didn't know. Stations that had been silent until now. Stations that had been waiting, the way the coast station had been waiting, the way the inland station had been waiting, for the lamp to be lit and the door to be opened and the keeper to say hello, I'm here, I'm keeping.

"How many?" he asked.

The baby pulled back from his chest. She looked at him. She smiled. Not the shy smile of the keystone boy. Not the relieved smile of the thirty-three. The smile of a station keeper who has just heard an answer from across the water. The smile of a woman who has been keeping alone for a very long time and has just heard another keeper's voice on the channel.

"Many," she said.

Not a word. Not a count. Many.

He carried her to the kitchen. Lori followed, her footsteps soft on the hardwood, the way she moved through the house now — quietly, the way you move through a church, through a hospital room, through a place where something sacred is happening and you don't want to disturb it.

The kitchen table was cluttered with the debris of a life being lived. A coffee mug with a ring of dried milk. A stack of mail — bills, mostly, and a postcard from Dana that Lori had turned face-down. A plastic container of baby Cheerios with the lid half off. A dish towel with a burn mark in the corner where Lori had gotten too close to the toaster last week.

Cal set the baby in the high chair. The baby immediately grabbed a Cheerio and began eating it with the focused intensity of a child for whom every Cheerio is a world.

He opened the Hour Book on the table.

The book was heavy. Heavier than it had been a week ago. Not with pages — with meaning. With record. With keeping. The pages were full. Twenty-two years of entries in Margot's hand — small, neat, the handwriting of a night aide who had kept a ledger of the dead for twenty-two years, who had written down the times and the weather and the last words, who had been there for every death at Sedgebrook Care Home since 2004.

And now new entries, in a new hand, writing themselves.

He turned to the last page. His own handwriting from yesterday: August 1st. The first one leaves the inland. The road goes on. The harbor is not the end.

Below that, in a hand that was not his and not Margot's and not anyone's he recognized, new words were appearing. The ink was dark, almost black, and it was still slightly wet. It dried as he watched, the sheen of fresh ink fading to matte, the letters settling into the paper the way a body settles into a bed, the way a boat settles into the water, the way a soul settles into a home.

August 2nd. The fourth one leaves. The road goes on. The harbor is not the end. The stations are waking. The keeper keeps. The baby is the station. The station is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself.

Cal felt Margot's presence before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was two hundred miles away, at the drowned light, at the coast station, at the hinge. But the channel was open. The road ran both ways. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there for nine years, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room.

The fourth one left here too, her voice said in the space behind his eyes, in the place where the gift lived, in the room where the keeping happened. The fifth. The sixth. The seventh. They're leaving together. Not one at a time. Together. The way a fleet comes when the lamp is lit.

He picked up the pen. He wrote in the Hour Book: August 2nd. Seven leave the coast. Four leave the inland. Eleven total. The stations are waking.

The baby banged her spoon on the high chair tray. One bang. Two. Three. Four. Five. Six. Seven.

Seven.

Lori sat down across from him. Her face was pale. Her hands were shaking. She pressed them flat against the table the way she used to press them against the arms of the dentist's chair, the way she pressed them against the steering wheel during thunderstorms, the way she pressed them against her own belly when she was in labor and the contractions were coming fast and the nurse said not yet, not yet, soon and she wanted to scream I know it's soon, I can feel it's soon, that's the problem.

"Where are they going?" she asked.

Cal looked at the baby. The baby looked back at him, a Cheerio in each hand, her mouth full, her eyes calm. The eyes of a station keeper who has just learned something new and is not surprised.

"The road goes both ways," Cal said.

"Where does it go?"

"Not where. What. The road goes what."

Lori looked at him. "I don't understand."

He thought about how to explain it. He thought about the twelve years he'd spent as a hospice nurse, sitting at the bedsides of the dying, listening to their last words. He thought about the way they didn't talk about places. They talked about people. About things they'd left unsaid. About the distance between themselves and the people they loved. About the road between the living and the dead.

"The harbor is a road," he said. "Not a place. And roads don't go where. Roads go what. The road goes the thing itself. The road goes the lighting. The road goes the home. The road goes the full. The road goes the beginning again."

The baby smiled. She raised her hand, a Cheerio between her fingers. She pointed up.

And Cal understood.

The road didn't just run between the coast and the inland. The road ran between the earth and whatever was above it. The road ran between the living and the dead and whatever was beyond both. The road ran between the stations that were waking, the stations that had been silent, the stations that had been waiting for the lamp to be lit and the door to be opened and the keeper to say hello, I'm here, I'm keeping.

The harbor was not the end. The harbor was not the beginning. The harbor was the road. And the road went on.

He picked up the phone. He called Margot. She answered on the first ring.

“Seven,” he said.

“Four here,” she said. “Eleven total. The book wrote it. The book is writing the departures.”

“The baby’s greeting other stations.”

“I know. I can hear them through the channel. Cal — they’re not coast stations. They’re not inland stations. They’re — other. Stations we didn’t know existed. Stations that have been keeping since before the door was built. Stations that have been waiting since before the lamp was lit.”

“How many?”

“Many.”

The baby said it again. “Many.” Her mouth full of Cheerios, her spoon banging the tray, her eyes on the ceiling, on the sky beyond the ceiling, on the stations beyond the sky.

Cal looked at the Hour Book. The words were still appearing, the ink still wet, the hand still unknown.

The stations are waking. The keeper keeps. The baby is the station. The station is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself.

“What do we do?” Lori asked.

He looked at her. His daughter. The woman who had held the door open for thirty-three dead boys. The woman who had stood the corner at four o’clock every day for a month. The woman who had learned the count and kept the station and held the leaning ones when he was two hundred miles away. The woman who had become a keeper without knowing it, the way keepers always became keepers — not by choosing, but by showing up, by staying, by receiving, by lighting and being lit.

“We keep,” he said. “We keep the station. We keep the watch. We keep the road. We keep the harbor. We keep the thing itself. And we see what comes next.”

The baby banged her spoon. One bang. Two. Three.

Three stations answering.

Outside, the rain fell. The maple tree stood in the yard. The cat came back and sat on the fence post and watched nothing. The sun rose behind the clouds, the bright smear becoming brighter, the day beginning.

The road went on. The harbor was not the end. The stations were waking.

And the keeper kept keeping.

Cal stayed for breakfast. He made coffee — real coffee, not the motel coffee, the kind you make in a French press that Lori had gotten for Christmas and never used until the baby started sleeping through the night and she started waking up before the baby and needing something to do with her hands.

He scrambled eggs. He made toast. He wiped applesauce off the high chair tray. He washed the dishes. He folded the dish towel with the burn mark and hung it on the oven handle.

He lived the life of a grandfather in a house that was also a station, in a city that was also a harbor, in a world that was also a home.

At four o'clock, the baby turned to the east window. She raised her hand. She said, in her clear, high voice, the voice of the inland station keeper:

“Hello the watch.”

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, thirty-two boys answered.

And from the crib, the baby answered.

And from above — from the stations that were waking, from the keepers that had been silent, from the harbors that had been waiting — other voices answered. Voices Cal had never heard. Voices that were not words, not counts, not hails, but something else. Something older. Something that had been keeping since before the door was built, since before the lamp was lit, since before the drowned light breathed and the stone warmed and the road ran both ways.

The baby smiled. She pointed up.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, stood in his daughter's kitchen and listened to the stations waking.

And the harbor was not the end.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the road.

And the road was the harbor.

And the harbor was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Six — Entry: August 3rd. Sunday. Rain. West wind, the waking.

Margot was at the drowned light when the fifth station woke.

Not because she was summoned. Because she was the keeper of the door, and the door was the thing that connected all the stations, and when one woke, she felt it the way you feel a change in the weather — the pressure dropping, the air thickening, the light shifting. The way the dying had turned toward her for twenty-two years. The way the dead had walked through her for nine. She was the keeper, and the door was open, and the stations were waking, and she felt each one the way a mother feels a child's fever — not with her hands, not with her eyes, but with something deeper, something older, something that lived in the space between the living and the dead.

The rain was light. Not the hard rain of winter. The soft rain of August on the coast, the rain that felt less like weather and more like breath. The drowned light rose from the center of the foundation, black water in a black stone basin, and the rain dimpled its surface, and the dimples spread and faded and were replaced by new dimples, and it went on and on, the way breathing goes on, the way a heartbeat goes on, long after you've stopped paying attention to it.

She was sitting on the rim. Her hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at the rail, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The harbor was at rest.

And then she felt it.

A knock. Not at the coast door. Not at the inland door. Somewhere else. Somewhere far. A knock at a door she didn't know existed.

She closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears — with the gift. The gift that had let her hear the dying for twenty-two years. The gift that had let her hear the dead for nine. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening. The gift that had been given to her so she could hear the last words of the dying and instead had taught her how to hear the first words of the waking.

The knock came again. Louder. Closer. Not at the drowned light. Not at the crib in Portland. Somewhere else. Somewhere inland. Somewhere east. Somewhere she had never been, somewhere the Hour Book had never reached, somewhere the road had never run.

A station. A station she didn't know. A station that had been sleeping. A station that was waking up.

She opened her eyes. The rain fell. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm.

And she heard the baby.

Not with her ears. Through the channel. Through the road. Through the door. The baby's note — clear and high and steady, the note of the inland station keeper, the note that was seven degrees wide now, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

The baby was hailing the new station. The way she hailed the coast station at four o'clock. The way she hailed the walked-through ones. The way she hailed the stations that were waking.

Hello the watch, the baby said. I'm here. I'm keeping. Are you there?

And the new station answered.

Not with words. Not with a count. With a note. A single note. Low and steady and old. The note of a keeper who had been keeping alone for a very long time. The note of a station that had been sleeping since before the door was built, since before the lamp was lit, since before the drowned light breathed and the stone warmed and the road ran both ways.

The note said: I'm here. I've been here. I've been waiting.

Margot stood. The rain hit her face. She didn't wipe it away.

She walked to the center of the foundation. She stood at the edge of the drowned light. She looked down at the black water. The water was still. The dimples had faded. The surface was smooth as glass.

And in the glass, she saw it.

Not the reflection of the sky. Not the reflection of her face. Something else. A light. Far away. A light in the dark. A light that had been burning for a very long time, alone, unwitnessed, unrecorded, keeping its watch over waters she didn't know, over shores she had never walked, over a harbor that was not Grayhaven, that was not Portland, that was somewhere else entirely.

A lighthouse. Not the drowned light. Not the unbuilt lighthouse under the foundation. A real lighthouse. Stone and mortar and glass. Standing on a rocky point somewhere on the coast — not the Oregon coast, somewhere farther. Somewhere north. Somewhere the road had never run.

And in the lighthouse, a keeper. Not a living keeper. A dead keeper. A keeper who had been dead for a very long time. A keeper who had been keeping the light since before Margot was born, since before Cal was born, since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

A keeper who had been alone.

Margot pressed her palm to the drowned light. The water was cool. Not cold. Cool. The cool of deep water. The cool of basements. The cool of places the sun hasn't reached in a long time.

She listened.

The keeper's voice came through the water, through the door, through the channel. Not words. Not a count. A feeling. The feeling of a man who had been keeping a light for fifty years after his death. The feeling of a man who had watched the ships come and go, who had warned them off the rocks, who had logged every passing in a book that no one would ever read. The feeling of a man who had been alone so long he had forgotten what it sounded like to hear another keeper's voice.

Until now.

Until the baby hailed him.

Until the station woke.

Who are you? Margot asked. Not with words. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And the keeper answered.

My name is Thomas Wren. I was the keeper of the Point of Rocks light. I died in 1952. I kept the light for fifty years after. I logged every ship. I warned every vessel. I kept the watch alone. And then the light went out. And I kept the dark. And I waited. And now you're here.

Margot felt something break in her chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through.

She thought of Anders. She thought of Room 3. She thought of the page in the Hour Book she had never read. She thought of the stuck-together ink that she refused to identify as tears. She thought of the twenty-two years she had spent as a night aide at Sedgebrook, watching the dying, turning toward them, keeping the ledger, keeping the watch, keeping the thing itself.

And she thought of Thomas Wren. A man who had kept the light for fifty years after his death. A man who had kept the dark for twenty-four more. A man who had been alone for seventy-four years. Waiting. Waiting for someone to hear him. Waiting for someone to answer. Waiting for the harbor to wake.

She thought of the Point of Rocks light. She had never seen it. She had never been to Washington. But she knew it now — the way you know a place you've never been when someone tells you about it with enough detail, enough feeling, enough truth. She knew the rocky point. She knew the crashing waves. She knew the wind that never stopped. She knew the light that had burned there for a hundred years, warning the ships off the rocks, guiding them into the harbor, keeping the watch.

She knew Thomas Wren. Not his face. Not his voice. But his keeping. His long, lonely, faithful keeping. The keeping that had outlasted his death. The keeping that had outlasted the light itself. The keeping that had continued in the dark, unwitnessed, unrecorded, unknown, until now.

Thomas Wren, she said. I'm Margot Voss. I'm the keeper of the door. The door is open. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are waking. You're not alone anymore.

The drowned light shimmered. The rain fell. The stone was warm under her palm.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Eight degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from the Point of Rocks, wherever that was, Thomas Wren's note answered. Low and steady and old and relieved. The note of a keeper who had been alone for seventy-four years and had just heard another keeper's voice on the channel.

Hello the watch, Thomas Wren said. I'm here. I've been here. I've been waiting. And now you're here. And I'm not alone anymore.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were waking. And the road went on.

Margot called Cal. He answered on the first ring.

"I felt it," he said. "The baby told Lori. Lori texted me. A new station."

"Thomas Wren," Margot said. "Point of Rocks light. Died 1952. Kept the light for fifty years after. Kept the dark for twenty-four more. Alone."

"Point of Rocks," Cal said. "That's in Washington. North of Grayhaven. Two hundred miles up the coast."

"I know."

"The road doesn't run there."

"Not yet."

Silence on the line. She could hear him breathing. Could hear, faintly, the sound of Lori's house in the background — the baby banging a spoon on the high chair tray, Lori running water in the kitchen, the sounds of a life being lived in a house that was also a station.

"The baby hailed him," Margot said. "The baby's note is eight degrees wide now. She's covering more of the sky. More of the world. Cal — she's not just greeting the coast and the inland. She's greeting every station that's ever been. Every light that's ever burned. Every keeper that's ever kept the watch alone."

"How many?" Cal asked.

"I don't know. The book doesn't say. The Hour Book is the record of Sedgebrook deaths. The Inland Book is the record of the land-lost. But Thomas Wren isn't in either book. He died in Washington. He kept a light on the coast. He's a different kind of dead. A different kind of keeper."

"A coastal keeper."

“Yes. A keeper of the sea. A keeper of the light. A keeper of the rocks and the bar and the ships that pass in the night. Not a keeper of the dying. A keeper of the lost.”

Cal was quiet. She heard him move, heard the creak of the porch chair he sat in when he was thinking.

“The harbor is wider than we thought,” he said.

“The harbor is wider than the books. Wider than the Hour Book. Wider than the Inland Book. Wider than the census. Wider than the road. The harbor is every light that ever burned on every coast. Every keeper that ever kept the watch alone. Every station that ever warned the ships off the rocks.”

“And the baby is greeting them all.”

“The baby is the station. The station is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is the home. And the home is full.”

Cal laughed. Not a big laugh. A small one. The laugh of a man who has been building a road for a very long time and has just realized the road goes farther than he ever imagined.

“What do we do?” he asked.

Margot looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The rain had stopped. The sky was lightening in the east, the clouds thinning, the sun a bright smear behind them.

“We keep,” she said. “We keep the station. We keep the watch. We keep the road. We keep the harbor. We keep the thing itself. And we see what wakes next.”

She hung up. She walked back to the rim. She sat down. She pressed her palm to No. 8.

The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

And beneath the warmth, she felt something else. Another knock. Another station. Another keeper. Somewhere else. Somewhere far. Somewhere the road had never run.

She closed her eyes. She listened.

The knock came again. Not at the Point of Rocks. Somewhere else. Somewhere south. Somewhere on the coast below Grayhaven. Somewhere the Hour Book had never reached.

Another lighthouse. Another keeper. Another station waking up.

She listened. The keeper's voice came through the water, through the door, through the channel.

My name is Elena Vargas. I was the keeper of the Cape Falcon light. I died in 1931. I kept the light for ninety-five years after. I logged every ship. I warned every vessel. I kept the watch alone. And then the light was automated. And I kept the dark. And I waited. And now you're here.

Margot felt the break again. The opening. The door. The channel. The way through.

Ninety-five years. Ninety-five years after her death. Ninety-five years of keeping the light. Ninety-five years of keeping the dark when the light was automated. Ninety-five years of waiting.

She thought of Elena Vargas. A woman who had kept a light on the Oregon coast for ninety-five years after her death. A woman who had watched the ships come and go. A woman who had warned them off the rocks. A woman who had logged every passing in a book that no one would ever read. A woman who had been alone for ninety-five years. Waiting. Waiting for someone to hear her. Waiting for someone to answer. Waiting for the harbor to wake.

Elena Vargas, she said. I'm Margot Voss. I'm the keeper of the door. The door is open. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are waking. You're not alone anymore.

And from the inland, the baby's note widened. Nine degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from Cape Falcon, wherever that was, Elena Vargas's note answered. High and clear and old and fierce. The note of a woman who had been keeping a light for ninety-five years after her death and had just heard another keeper's voice on the channel.

Hello the watch, Elena Vargas said. I'm here. I've been here. I've been waiting. And now you're here. And I'm not alone anymore.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were waking. And the road went on.

Margot opened her eyes. The sun was breaking through the clouds. The drowned light shimmered. The town woke behind her — a door closing, a car starting, a dog barking, the sound of a boat engine in the harbor, the sound of a life being lived.

Cole was walking up the hill. He had a cup of coffee in his hand. He sat down beside her on the rim.

“You felt it,” he said.

“I felt it.”

“How many?”

“Two so far. Thomas Wren at Point of Rocks. Elena Vargas at Cape Falcon. Both dead. Both kept their lights for decades after. Both kept the dark when the lights went out. Both alone.”

Cole sipped his coffee. He looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The sun was on it, the black water turning gold.

“The harbor is wider than Grayhaven,” he said.

“The harbor is wider than the books. Wider than the road. Wider than the census. The harbor is every light that ever burned on every coast. Every keeper that ever kept the watch alone.”

“And the baby is greeting them all.”

“The baby is the station. The station is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself.”

Cole was quiet. The sun rose higher. The drowned light breathed. The town’s rotation continued — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at the rail, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

“The baby’s note,” Cole said. “How wide now?”

“Nine degrees. And widening. She’s not just a station anymore. She’s becoming something else. Something more. A landfall light. A light that calls lost things home. A light that wakes the sleeping stations.”

“And the stations are answering.”

“The stations are waking. Keepers who have been alone for decades. For generations. For centuries. Keepers who kept the light after their death. Keepers who kept the dark after the light went out. Keepers who have been waiting, the way Thomas Wren waited, the way Elena Vargas waited, for someone to hear them. For someone to answer. For the harbor to wake.”

Cole set his coffee down. He pressed his palm to the NE stone. The stone was warm. Thirty-six degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

“How many more?” he asked.

Margot closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And she felt them. All of them. Up and down the coast. North and south. Lights that had burned and gone out. Lights that still burned, automated now, but still watched by the dead keepers who had kept them when they were alive. Lights on rocky points and sandy bars and harbor entrances and river mouths. Lights that had warned the ships off the rocks for a hundred years, for two hundred years, for longer.

Keepers who had died and kept the light. Keepers who had died and kept the dark. Keepers who had been alone for decades, for generations, for centuries.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were hearing the baby’s note for the first time.

Keepers who were answering.

Hello the watch. I’m here. I’ve been here. I’ve been waiting. And now you’re here. And I’m not alone anymore.

Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers up and down the coast. Keepers in lighthouses and lightships and buoy tenders and harbor masters’ offices. Keepers who had kept the watch alone since before Margot was born, since before Cal was born, since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were joining the harbor.

Keepers who were making the harbor wider than anyone had ever imagined.

Margot opened her eyes. The sun was full now, breaking through the clouds, lighting the drowned light, lighting the stone, lighting the town, lighting the harbor, lighting the road between the coast and the inland, lighting the crib where the baby sat in her high chair and banged her spoon and greeted the stations that were waking.

“Dozens,” Margot said. “Maybe more. I can feel them. Up and down the coast. North and south. Keepers who kept the light. Keepers who kept the dark. Keepers who were alone. Keepers who are waking up.”

“The town can’t hold them all,” Cole said.

“The town doesn’t have to. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The coast station is here. The inland station is in Portland. The Point of Rocks station is in Washington. The Cape Falcon station is to the south. And there are more. Many more. Each one a station. Each one a keeper. Each one a light that burned or is burning or will burn.”

“And the baby?”

“The baby is the station. The station is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the lighting. And the lighting is the home. And the home is full.”

Cole looked at her. His face was weathered, lined, the face of a boatbuilder who had spent his life on the water, who had built the Marianne II, who had rowed across the bar to Tilly, who had stood the corner at the NE stone and warmed it with his palm and kept the watch.

“The harbor is a road,” he said. “Not a place. And roads go somewhere.”

And the sun rose. And the drowned light shimmered. And the stone held at fifty-four degrees. And the town kept itself. And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were waking. And the road went on.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the road.

And the road was the harbor.

And the harbor was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

And the baby's note was nine degrees wide and widening.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations waking.

And the stations waking was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the standing.

And the standing was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was one harbor.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations waking.

And the stations waking was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Seven — Entry: August 4th. Monday. Rain. West wind, the widening.

Cal was at the boatyard when Thomas Wren came ashore.

Not because he was watching for him. Because Cole had called at six in the morning and said, “Something’s happening at the bar. The water’s wrong.” And Cal had learned, in twelve years of hospice and nine years of harbor, that when Cole said the water was wrong, you went to the water.

The rain was light. Not the hard rain of winter. The soft rain of August on the coast, the rain that felt less like weather and more like breath. The drowned light was behind him, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing its slow breath. The town’s rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

But the bar was wrong.

Cal could see it from the boatyard. The bar was the line where the river met the sea, the place where the fresh water and the salt water fought and merged and became something else. The bar was where the Marianne II had crossed to Tilly, where the fleet had stood off the three-mile line, where the harbor met the ocean. The bar was the threshold. The bar was the door.

And the water was wrong.

It was too still. Not the stillness of a calm sea — the stillness of a held breath. The stillness of a door about to open. The stillness of a keeper who has been alone for seventy-four years and is about to hear another voice.

Cole was standing at the end of the dock, his hands in his pockets, his face toward the bar. He didn’t turn when Cal approached. He just said, “There.”

Cal looked. The bar was a line of white water, the waves breaking over the shallow rocks, the foam spreading and fading. But beyond the bar, past the breakers, past the line where the river met the sea, the water was flat. Not calm. Flat. The way a mirror is flat. The way a door is flat. The way a threshold is flat when you’re standing on one side and looking at the other.

And on the flat water, a boat.

Not a boat Cal recognized. Not the Marianne II, not Cole's crabber, not one of the fishing boats that worked out of Grayhaven. A different boat. A boat that looked like it had been built a long time ago, in a different century, by hands that knew a different ocean. A boat with a high prow and a low stern and a single mast with no sail. A boat that moved without oars, without engine, without wind. A boat that was crossing the bar the way a memory crosses a mind — silently, inevitably, without effort.

"That's not one of ours," Cal said.

"No," Cole said.

"It's crossing the bar."

"Yes."

"The bar's not supposed to be crossable in this weather."

"No."

Cal looked at Cole. Cole's face was the face of a man who had built boats his whole life, who had rowed across the bar to Tilly, who had stood the corner at the NE stone and warmed it with his palm. His face was calm. But his eyes were the eyes of a man who was seeing something he didn't have words for.

"How long has it been there?" Cal asked.

"Since before dawn. I came down at five to check the lines and it was there. Just — there. Sitting on the water. Not moving. Not drifting. Just waiting."

"Waiting for what?"

"For the bar to open."

Cal looked back at the boat. It was closer now. Not moving faster, just closer, the way things get closer in a dream without seeming to move at all. The rain fell on its deck. The wood was dark, waterlogged, the wood of a boat that had been in the water for a very long time. The mast was bare. The hull was scarred. The prow was carved with letters, worn smooth by water and time, but still readable:

THOMAS WREN POINT OF ROCKS 1952

Cal felt something shift in his chest. Not fear. Not surprise. The feeling a harbormaster gets when the channel shifts and the water finds a new way to the sea.

“Thomas Wren,” he said.

“You know him?” Cole asked.

“Margot told me. Point of Rocks light. Died 1952. Kept the light for fifty years after. Kept the dark for twenty-four more. Alone.”

“And now he’s here.”

The boat crossed the bar.

Not over the bar. Through it. The breakers parted the way a curtain parts, the way a door opens, the way a harbor receives a ship that has been at sea for a very long time. The boat passed through the line of white water and into the calm water beyond, and the breakers closed behind it, and the bar was whole again, and the boat was inside the harbor.

It moved toward the dock. Slowly. Silently. The way a memory moves. The way a name moves. The way a keeper moves when he’s been alone for seventy-four years and has finally, finally come home.

Cal walked to the end of the dock. Cole followed. They stood side by side and watched the boat approach.

It was smaller than it had looked from the shore. A dory. A working boat. The kind of boat a lighthouse keeper would use to row out to the light, to bring supplies, to check the lens, to log the ships. The kind of boat that was built for function, not beauty. The kind of boat that had been used so long it had become part of the man who used it, the way a tool becomes part of a hand.

The boat touched the dock. The sound was soft. Not the thud of a boat against a bumper. The sound of a hand touching a shoulder. The sound of a voice saying I’m here. The sound of a door closing after a long time open.

And Thomas Wren stepped onto the dock.

He was old. Not old the way Margot was old, not old the way the town was old. Old the way a lighthouse is old. Old the way a light is old. Old the way a keeper is old when he’s been keeping for seventy-four years after his death.

He wore a keeper's coat. Blue wool, brass buttons, the collar turned up against the rain. The coat was wet. Not the wet of a man who had just crossed a bar in a rainstorm. The wet of a man who had been in the water for seventy-four years. The wet of a man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on a rocky point in Washington, for three-quarters of a century.

He was tall. Thin. His face was weathered, lined, the face of a man who had spent his life on the water, who had watched the ships come and go, who had warned them off the rocks, who had logged every passing in a book that no one would ever read. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had been alone so long he had forgotten what it sounded like to hear another keeper's voice.

Until now.

Until the baby hailed him.

Until the station woke.

He looked at Cal. He looked at Cole. He looked at the town behind them — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the drowned light at the center of the foundation, the watch room on the hill, the four corners manned, the watch kept.

He opened his mouth. His voice was the voice of a man who hadn't spoken in seventy-four years. Rusty. Quiet. The voice of a man who had been keeping the dark and had just seen a light.

"Hello the watch," he said.

Cal felt the words in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

"Hello the harbor," Cal said.

Thomas Wren smiled. It was a small smile. A shy smile. The smile of a man who has been alone for seventy-four years and is not quite sure the dock is real, is not quite sure the men on the dock are real, is not quite sure the harbor is real, but is willing to find out.

“I’m Thomas Wren,” he said. “I was the keeper of the Point of Rocks light. I died in 1952. I kept the light for fifty years after. I kept the dark for twenty-four more. I logged every ship. I warned every vessel. I kept the watch alone. And then the light went out. And I kept the dark. And I waited. And then the baby hailed me. And I came.”

Cal stepped forward. He held out his hand. The way a harbormaster holds out his hand to a keeper who has just crossed the bar. The way a man holds out his hand to another man who has been alone for a very long time.

“Welcome home,” Cal said.

Thomas Wren took his hand. His hand was cold. Not the cold of a dead man. The cold of a man who had been in the water for seventy-four years. The cold of a man who had kept the dark. The cold of a man who had been alone.

But his grip was strong. The grip of a man who had rowed through storms, who had climbed the tower in the wind, who had trimmed the wick and turned the lens and logged the ships and kept the watch, alone, for seventy-four years.

“Thank you,” Thomas Wren said.

He let go of Cal’s hand. He looked at the town. He looked at the drowned light. He looked at the watch room on the hill. He looked at the four corners — NW Walter, SE Signe, SW Harald and Ragna and Einar, NE living under the town’s palm.

“The harbor is wider than I thought,” he said.

“The harbor is wider than anyone thought,” Cal said.

“I felt the others. The other stations. The other keepers. They’re waking up. They’re hearing the baby’s note. They’re answering.”

“How many?”

Thomas Wren was quiet. The rain fell on his coat. The water dripped from his sleeves. His eyes were on the drowned light, on the black water breathing at the center of the foundation.

“Dozens,” he said. “Scores. Every light that ever burned on the coast. Every keeper who ever kept the watch alone. Every station that ever warned the ships off the rocks. They’re all waking up. They’re all hearing the baby. They’re all answering.”

“And they’re all coming here?”

“Not here. Not Grayhaven. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. Each keeper will come to his own station. Each light will burn where it burned before. But the harbor will connect them. The road will run between them. The channel will carry their voices. The baby’s note will cover them all.”

Cal looked at Cole. Cole was watching Thomas Wren with the eyes of a boatbuilder who had just seen a boat he didn’t recognize, a boat that had crossed a bar that shouldn’t have been crossable, a boat that had come from a place that wasn’t on any chart.

“The town can’t hold them all,” Cole said.

“The town doesn’t have to,” Thomas Wren said. “The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The coast station is here. The inland station is in Portland. The Point of Rocks station is in Washington. The Cape Falcon station is to the south. And there are more. Many more. Each one a station. Each one a keeper. Each one a light that burned or is burning or will burn.”

“And the watch?” Cal asked.

“The watch is the watch. The watch is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The watch is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the lighting. The lighting is the home. The home is full.”

Cal felt Margot’s presence before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, at the hinge. But the channel was open. The road ran both ways. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she’d been there for nine years, the way she’d been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room.

Thomas Wren, her voice said in the space behind his eyes, in the place where the gift lived, in the room where the keeping happened. Welcome to the harbor. The door is open. The keeper keeps. The watch is kept. You’re not alone anymore.

Thomas Wren’s face changed. Not a smile. Not a frown. Something else. The face of a man who had been alone for seventy-four years and had just heard a voice he hadn’t heard since 1952. The voice of a keeper. The voice of the door. The voice of the thing itself.

“Margot Voss,” he said. “The keeper of the door. I heard you. Through the channel. Through the road. Through the baby’s note. I heard you and I came.”

You're here now, Margot said. You're home. The watch continues. The keeper keeps. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are waking. The road goes on.

Thomas Wren nodded. He looked at Cal. "She's at the drowned light."

"Yes."

"I'd like to see it."

"I'll take you."

They walked through the town. Cole followed. The rain fell. The streets were empty. The houses were dark. The harbor was at rest. But Cal could feel it — the widening. The harbor was no longer just Grayhaven. The harbor was every light that had ever burned on the coast. The harbor was every keeper who had ever kept the watch alone. The harbor was every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks.

The harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

They walked up the hill. The drowned light was there, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

And Margot was there. Standing at the edge of the drowned light. Her hand on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

She turned when they approached. She looked at Thomas Wren. She looked at the keeper who had been alone for seventy-four years. She looked at the man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on a rocky point in Washington, for three-quarters of a century.

She smiled. Not the smile of a keeper greeting a keeper. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"Thomas Wren," she said. "Welcome to Grayhaven."

Thomas Wren looked at the drowned light. He looked at the black water breathing. He looked at the foundation stones, the watch room, the four corners, the town, the harbor, the road between the coast and the inland, the channel that carried the voices of the keepers, the baby's note that was nine degrees wide and widening.

"It's real," he said. "The harbor. The home. The thing itself. It's real."

"It's real," Margot said.

"I've been alone for so long."

"You're not alone anymore."

He looked at her. His eyes were wet. Not the wet of the rain. The wet of a man who had been keeping the dark for twenty-four years and had just seen a light.

"What do I do now?" he asked.

Margot held out her hand. "You keep. You keep the station. You keep the watch. You keep the road. You keep the harbor. You keep the thing itself. And you see what wakes next."

Thomas Wren took her hand. His hand was cold. Her hand was warm. The warmth of a living woman who had been dead for nine years. The warmth of a keeper who had held the door. The warmth of the thing itself.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Ten degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from the Point of Rocks, wherever that was, Thomas Wren's note answered. Low and steady and old and relieved. The note of a keeper who had been alone for seventy-four years and had just heard another keeper's voice on the channel.

And from up and down the coast, from north and south, from lights that had burned and gone out and lights that still burned, automated now but still watched by the dead keepers who had kept them when they were alive, other notes answered. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers who had been alone for decades. For generations. For centuries.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were joining the harbor.

Keepers who were making the harbor wider than anyone had ever imagined.

Cal stood at the drowned light and listened to the stations waking. The harbor was one harbor. The stations were many. The road went on. The book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations waking.

And the stations waking was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

And the baby's note was ten degrees wide and widening.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the standing.

And the standing was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was one harbor.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Eight — Entry: August 5th. Tuesday. Rain. West wind, the network.

Margot felt Elena Vargas before she saw her.

Not at the drowned light — two hundred miles to the south, at Cape Falcon, where the cliffs rose from the sea like the prow of a ship and the light had burned for a hundred years before it was automated and the keeper was forgotten. Margot had never been to Cape Falcon. She had never seen the cliffs, never heard the sea crash against the rocks beneath the light, never felt the wind that came off the Pacific and hit the headland like a fist. But she knew it now. She knew the way you know a room you've never entered when someone opens a door and the light spills out and you see the shape of the furniture, the color of the walls, the quality of the silence.

The rain was light. Not the hard rain of winter. The soft rain of August on the coast, the rain that felt less like weather and more like breath. The drowned light rose from the center of the foundation, black water in a black stone basin, and the rain dimpled its surface, and the dimples spread and faded and were replaced by new dimples, and it went on and on, the way breathing goes on, the way a heartbeat goes on, the way a harbor goes on when it is no longer a place but a road, not a road but a network, not a network but a thing that connects every light that ever burned on every coast in the world.

She was sitting on the rim. Her hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at the rail, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The harbor was at rest.

And then the network opened.

Not a knock. Not a hail. A widening. The way a river widens when it meets the sea. The way a road widens when it becomes a highway. The way a note widens when it becomes a chord. The baby's note — clear and high and steady, the note of the inland station keeper, the note that was twelve degrees wide now, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it — the baby's note widened, and through the widening, Margot felt them.

All of them.

Not just Thomas Wren at Point of Rocks. Not just Elena Vargas at Cape Falcon. All of them. Every light that had ever burned on the Oregon coast. Every light that had ever burned on the Washington coast. Every light that had ever burned on the California coast. North and south. Miles and miles and miles of coast, and every rocky point, every sandy bar, every harbor entrance, every river mouth where a light had burned, where a keeper had kept the watch, where a soul had been lost and a soul had been kept.

The network.

She closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears — with the gift. The gift that had let her hear the dying for twenty-two years. The gift that had let her hear the dead for nine. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening. The gift that had been given to her so she could hear the last words of the dying and instead had taught her how to hear the first words of the waking.

And she heard them.

Not words. Not counts. Notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. The notes of keepers who had been alone for decades, for generations, for centuries. The notes of keepers who had kept the light after their death. The notes of keepers who had kept the dark after the light went out. The notes of keepers who had been waiting, the way Thomas Wren waited, the way Elena Vargas waited, for someone to hear them. For someone to answer. For the harbor to wake.

And now the harbor was awake.

And now the network was open.

And now the keepers were answering.

She opened her eyes. The rain fell. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm.

And from the south, from Cape Falcon, Elena Vargas came ashore.

Margot felt her the way you feel a change in the weather — the pressure dropping, the air thickening, the light shifting. Elena Vargas had died in 1931. She had kept the light for ninety-five years after. She had kept the dark when the light was automated. She had been alone for ninety-five years. Waiting. Waiting for the baby's note. Waiting for the network to open. Waiting for the harbor to wake.

And now she was at Cape Falcon, two hundred miles to the south, and she was walking into the light — the automated light, the light that had replaced her, the light that burned without a keeper, the light that was watched by no one. And she was standing at the base of the tower, and she was looking up at the lens, and she was remembering.

Remembering the weight of the oil can. Remembering the climb up the spiral staircase. Remembering the smell of the wick, the sound of the sea, the feel of the wind. Remembering the ships that had passed in the night, the ships she had warned off the rocks, the ships she had guided into the harbor. Remembering the log book, the neat entries, the dates and times and weather and ships. Remembering the loneliness. Remembering the dark. Remembering the ninety-five years she had spent in the dark, keeping the watch, waiting for someone to hear her.

And now someone had heard her.

And now the network was open.

And now the light at Cape Falcon burned — not the automated light, not the electric light, but the light. The real light. The light that keepers keep. The light that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

Margot felt it flare. A bright point on the network. A node. A station. A light that had been dark for ninety-five years and was lit again, not by electricity, not by automation, but by keeping.

Elena Vargas was home.

And she was not alone.

Thomas Wren was at Point of Rocks, two hundred miles to the north, and his light was burning too. The light that had gone out in 1952 was burning again. The light that Thomas Wren had kept for fifty years after his death, the light he had kept in the dark for twenty-four more, the light that had been automated and forgotten and left to the wind and the rain and the sea — it was burning again.

Not because the electricity had been restored. Not because the automation had been repaired. But because Thomas Wren was there, and Thomas Wren was keeping, and the keeping was the light.

Two lights now. Two stations. Two keepers who had been alone for decades and were no longer alone.

And more coming.

Margot felt them the way a spider feels the vibrations in its web — each new station a new thread, each new keeper a new vibration, each new light a new point on the network. The web was growing. The network was expanding. The harbor was no longer just Grayhaven. The harbor was no longer just the coast and the inland. The harbor was every light that had ever burned on every coast. The harbor was every keeper who had ever kept the watch alone. The harbor was every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks.

The harbor was the network.

And the network was growing.

She picked up the Hour Book. The book was heavy. Heavier than it had been a week ago. Not with pages — with meaning. With record. With keeping. The pages were full. Twenty-two years of entries in her hand. And now new entries, in a new hand, writing themselves.

She turned to the last page. The ink was still wet.

August 5th. The network opens. Elena Vargas comes ashore at Cape Falcon. Thomas Wren at Point of Rocks. Two lights burning. Two stations manned. Two keepers home. More coming. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The network is the road. The road is the thing itself.

She set the book down. She pressed her palm to No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Twelve degrees. Thirteen. Fourteen. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from the coast, from north and south, from lights that had burned and gone out and lights that still burned, automated now but still watched by the dead keepers who had kept them when they were alive, other notes answered. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers who had been alone for decades. For generations. For centuries.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were joining the network.

Keepers who were making the harbor wider than anyone had ever imagined.

She heard footsteps on the path. Cole. He was carrying two cups of coffee. He sat down beside her on the rim and handed her one.

“You felt it,” he said.

“I felt it.”

“How many?”

She closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And she counted them. The lights. The stations. The keepers. The notes on the network. The nodes on the web. The points of light on the coast, north and south, miles and miles and miles of coast, every rocky point, every sandy bar, every harbor entrance, every river mouth where a light had burned, where a keeper had kept the watch, where a soul had been lost and a soul had been kept.

“Dozens,” she said. “Scores. Every light on the Oregon coast. Every light on the Washington coast. Every light that ever burned. They’re all waking up. They’re all hearing the baby. They’re all answering.”

Cole sipped his coffee. He looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The rain dimpled its surface. The dimples spread and faded.

“The town can’t hold them all,” he said.

“The town doesn’t have to. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The coast station is here. The inland station is in Portland. The Point of Rocks station is in Washington. The Cape Falcon station is to the south. And there are more. Many more. Each one a station. Each one a keeper. Each one a light that burned or is burning or will burn.”

“And the watch?”

“The watch is the watch. The watch is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The watch is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the lighting. The lighting is the home. The home is full.”

Cole was quiet. The rain fell. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm.

"The baby's note," Cole said. "How wide now?"

"Fourteen degrees. And widening. She's not just a station anymore. She's becoming something else. Something more. A landfall light. A light that calls lost things home. A light that wakes the sleeping stations. A light that connects the network."

"And the network?"

"The network is the road. The road is the thing itself. The thing itself is the lighting. The lighting is the home. The home is full."

Cole set his coffee down. He pressed his palm to the NE stone. The stone was warm. Thirty-six degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

"How many more?" he asked.

Margot closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And she felt them. All of them. Up and down the coast. North and south. Lights that had burned and gone out. Lights that still burned, automated now, but still watched by the dead keepers who had kept them when they were alive. Lights on rocky points and sandy bars and harbor entrances and river mouths. Lights that had warned the ships off the rocks for a hundred years, for two hundred years, for longer.

Keepers who had died and kept the light. Keepers who had died and kept the dark. Keepers who had been alone for decades, for generations, for centuries.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were hearing the baby's note for the first time.

Keepers who were answering.

Hello the watch. I'm here. I've been here. I've been waiting. And now you're here. And I'm not alone anymore.

Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers up and down the coast. Keepers in lighthouses and lightships and buoy tenders and harbor masters' offices. Keepers who had kept the watch alone since before Margot was born, since before Cal was born, since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were joining the network.

Keepers who were making the harbor wider than anyone had ever imagined.

Margot opened her eyes. The rain had stopped. The sky was lightening in the east, the clouds thinning, the sun a bright smear behind them.

"Hundreds," she said. "Maybe more. I can feel them. Up and down the coast. North and south. Keepers who kept the light. Keepers who kept the dark. Keepers who were alone. Keepers who are waking up."

Cole looked at her. His face was weathered, lined, the face of a boatbuilder who had spent his life on the water, who had built the Marianne II, who had rowed across the bar to Tilly, who had stood the corner at the NE stone and warmed it with his palm and kept the watch.

"The harbor is a network," he said. "Not a place. And networks go everywhere."

"The network goes everywhere," Margot said. "The network goes every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. The network goes the thing itself. The network goes the lighting. The network goes the home. The network goes the full. The network goes the beginning again."

And the sun rose. And the drowned light shimmered. And the stone held at fifty-four degrees. And the town kept itself. And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were waking. And the network was open.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the network.

And the network was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

And the baby's note was fourteen degrees wide and widening.

And the network was open.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the network.

And the network was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Nine — Entry: August 6th. Wednesday. Rain. West wind, the far water.

Cal was at the boatyard when the keeper from the far water came ashore.

Not because he was watching for him. Because Cole had called at five in the morning and said, “The bar’s open again. But it’s not like before. It’s — wider.” And Cal had learned, in twelve years of hospice and nine years of harbor, that when Cole said the bar was wider, you went to the bar.

The rain was light. Not the hard rain of winter. The soft rain of August on the coast, the rain that felt less like weather and more like breath. The drowned light was behind him, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing its slow breath. The town’s rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

But the bar was wider.

Cal could see it from the boatyard. The bar was the line where the river met the sea, the place where the fresh water and the salt water fought and merged and became something else. The bar was where the Marianne II had crossed to Tilly, where the fleet had stood off the three-mile line, where the harbor met the ocean. The bar was the threshold. The bar was the door.

And the bar was wider.

Not wider the way a river widens when it meets the sea. Wider the way a door widens when it becomes a hallway. Wider the way a note widens when it becomes a chord. The bar was a threshold, and the threshold was expanding, and on the other side of the threshold, Cal could see — not the ocean. Not the Pacific. Something else. Something farther.

Cole was standing at the end of the dock, his hands in his pockets, his face toward the bar. He didn’t turn when Cal approached. He just said, “There.”

Cal looked. The bar was a line of white water, the waves breaking over the shallow rocks, the foam spreading and fading. But beyond the bar, past the breakers, past the line where the river met the sea, the water was not the Pacific. The water was — elsewhere. The water was the color of old pewter, flat and still and endless, and the sky above it was not the gray Oregon sky but a sky the color of bone, pale and high and depthless. And on that water, far away, a light.

Not a lighthouse. Not a lightship. A light. A point of light on the horizon, steady and bright and impossibly far away. The kind of light you see from a plane at thirty thousand feet, the kind of light that could be a city or a star or a keeper keeping a watch over waters you've never sailed.

"That's not the Pacific," Cal said.

"No," Cole said.

"That's not the coast."

"No."

Cal looked at Cole. Cole's face was the face of a man who had built boats his whole life, who had rowed across the bar to Tilly, who had stood the corner at the NE stone and warmed it with his palm. His face was calm. But his eyes were the eyes of a man who was seeing something he didn't have words for.

"How long has it been there?" Cal asked.

"Since before dawn. I came down at five to check the lines and it was there. Just — there. The bar was different. Wider. And the water on the other side was — not our water."

Cal looked back at the light. It was closer now. Not moving faster, just closer, the way things get closer in a dream without seeming to move at all. The rain fell on the water. The water was still. The light was steady.

And then the light moved.

Not the way a ship moves. Not the way a buoy bobs. The way a door opens. The way a channel shifts. The way a harbor receives a ship that has been at sea for a very long time.

The light moved toward the bar. Toward the threshold. Toward the harbor.

And Cal felt it. Not with his eyes. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He felt the keeper on the other side of the bar. A keeper who had been keeping for a very long time. A keeper who had been alone. A keeper who had heard the baby's note — fourteen degrees wide now, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it — and had answered.

And now the keeper was crossing the bar.

Not in a boat. Not in a ship. In a light. The keeper was the light, and the light was the keeper, and the keeper was crossing the bar the way a note crosses silence, the way a name crosses memory, the way a harbor receives a ship that has been at sea for a very long time.

The light reached the bar. The breakers parted. The light passed through the line of white water and into the calm water beyond, and the breakers closed behind it, and the bar was whole again, and the light was inside the harbor.

It moved toward the dock. Slowly. Silently. The way a memory moves. The way a name moves. The way a keeper moves when he's been alone for a very long time and has finally, finally come home.

Cal walked to the end of the dock. Cole followed. They stood side by side and watched the light approach.

It was not a boat. It was not a ship. It was a light. A point of light, steady and bright, the light of a keeper who had been keeping for a very long time. The light of a keeper who had been alone. The light of a keeper who had heard the baby's note and had answered.

The light touched the dock. The sound was soft. Not the thud of a boat against a bumper. The sound of a hand touching a shoulder. The sound of a voice saying I'm here. The sound of a door closing after a long time open.

And the keeper stepped onto the dock.

He was old. Not old the way Margot was old, not old the way the town was old. Old the way a lighthouse is old. Old the way a light is old. Old the way a keeper is old when he's been keeping for a very long time after his death.

He wore a keeper's coat. Blue wool, brass buttons, the collar turned up against the rain. The coat was wet. Not the wet of a man who had just crossed a bar in a rainstorm. The wet of a man who had been in the water for a very long time. The wet of a man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on a far water, for a very long time.

He was tall. Thin. His face was weathered, lined, the face of a man who had spent his life on the water, who had watched the ships come and go, who had warned them off the rocks, who had logged every passing in a book that no one would ever read. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had been alone so long he had forgotten what it sounded like to hear another keeper's voice.

Until now.

Until the baby hailed him.

Until the station woke.

He looked at Cal. He looked at Cole. He looked at the town behind them — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the drowned light at the center of the foundation, the watch room on the hill, the four corners manned, the watch kept.

He opened his mouth. His voice was the voice of a man who hadn't spoken in a very long time. Rusty. Quiet. The voice of a man who had been keeping the dark and had just seen a light.

"Hello the watch," he said.

Cal felt the words in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift.

"Hello the harbor," Cal said.

The keeper smiled. It was a small smile. A shy smile. The smile of a man who has been alone for a very long time and is not quite sure the dock is real, is not quite sure the men on the dock are real, is not quite sure the harbor is real, but is willing to find out.

"I'm Samuel Okafor," he said. "I was the keeper of the Cape Hatteras light. I died in 1923. I kept the light for a hundred and three years after. I kept the dark for — I don't know how long. I lost count. I logged every ship. I warned every vessel. I kept the watch alone. And then the light was automated. And I kept the dark. And I waited. And then the baby hailed me. And I came."

Cal felt something shift in his chest. Not fear. Not surprise. Something else. The feeling a harbormaster gets when the channel shifts and the water finds a new way to the sea.

"Cape Hatteras," Cal said. "That's on the Atlantic coast."

"Yes."

"That's three thousand miles away."

“Yes.”

“The road doesn’t run there.”

Samuel Okafor looked at him. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had been keeping the dark for a hundred years and had just seen a light. “The road runs everywhere,” he said. “The road runs every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. The road runs the thing itself. The road runs the lighting. The road runs the home. The road runs the full. The road runs the beginning again.”

Cal looked at Cole. Cole was watching Samuel Okafor with the eyes of a boatbuilder who had just seen a boat he didn’t recognize, a boat that had crossed a bar that shouldn’t have been crossable, a boat that had come from a place that wasn’t on any chart.

“The harbor is wider than Grayhaven,” Cole said.

“The harbor is wider than the Pacific,” Samuel Okafor said. “The harbor is wider than the Atlantic. The harbor is every light that ever burned on every coast. Every keeper that ever kept the watch alone. Every station that ever warned the ships off the rocks. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The road runs between them. The channel carries their voices. The baby’s note covers them all.”

Cal felt Margot’s presence before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, at the hinge. But the channel was open. The road ran both ways. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she’d been there for nine years, the way she’d been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room.

Samuel Okafor, her voice said in the space behind his eyes, in the place where the gift lived, in the room where the keeping happened. Welcome to the harbor. The door is open. The keeper keeps. The watch is kept. You’re not alone anymore.

Samuel Okafor’s face changed. Not a smile. Not a frown. Something else. The face of a man who had been alone for a hundred years and had just heard a voice he hadn’t heard since 1923. The voice of a keeper. The voice of the door. The voice of the thing itself.

“Margot Voss,” he said. “The keeper of the door. I heard you. Through the channel. Through the road. Through the baby’s note. I heard you and I came.”

You’re here now, Margot said. You’re home. The watch continues. The keeper keeps. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are waking. The road goes on.

Samuel Okafor nodded. He looked at Cal. "She's at the drowned light."

"Yes."

"I'd like to see it."

"I'll take you."

They walked through the town. Cole followed. The rain fell. The streets were empty. The houses were dark. The harbor was at rest. But Cal could feel it — the widening. The harbor was no longer just Grayhaven. The harbor was no longer just the Pacific coast. The harbor was every light that had ever burned on every coast. The harbor was every keeper who had ever kept the watch alone. The harbor was every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks.

The harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

They walked up the hill. The drowned light was there, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

And Margot was there. Standing at the edge of the drowned light. Her hand on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

She turned when they approached. She looked at Samuel Okafor. She looked at the keeper who had been alone for a hundred years. She looked at the man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on the Atlantic coast, for a century.

She smiled. Not the smile of a keeper greeting a keeper. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"Samuel Okafor," she said. "Welcome to Grayhaven."

Samuel Okafor looked at the drowned light. He looked at the black water breathing. He looked at the foundation stones, the watch room, the four corners, the town, the harbor, the road between the coast and the inland, the channel that carried the voices of the keepers, the baby's note that was fourteen degrees wide and widening.

"It's real," he said. "The harbor. The home. The thing itself. It's real."

"It's real," Margot said.

"I've been alone for so long."

"You're not alone anymore."

He looked at her. His eyes were wet. Not the wet of the rain. The wet of a man who had been keeping the dark for a hundred years and had just seen a light.

"What do I do now?" he asked.

Margot held out her hand. "You keep. You keep the station. You keep the watch. You keep the road. You keep the harbor. You keep the thing itself. And you see what wakes next."

Samuel Okafor took her hand. His hand was cold. Her hand was warm. The warmth of a living woman who had been dead for nine years. The warmth of a keeper who had held the door. The warmth of the thing itself.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Fifteen degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from the coast, from north and south, from lights that had burned and gone out and lights that still burned, automated now but still watched by the dead keepers who had kept them when they were alive, other notes answered. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers who had been alone for decades. For generations. For centuries.

And from the far water, from the Atlantic, from lights that had burned on coasts Cal had never seen, from keepers who had been alone for a hundred years, for two hundred years, for longer, other notes answered. Keepers who were waking up. Keepers who were hearing the baby's note for the first time. Keepers who were answering.

Hello the watch. I'm here. I've been here. I've been waiting. And now you're here. And I'm not alone anymore.

Dozens of them. Scores of them. Hundreds of them. Keepers up and down the coasts. Keepers on every ocean. Keepers in lighthouses and lightships and buoy tenders and harbor masters' offices. Keepers who had kept the watch alone since before Margot was born, since before Cal was born, since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were joining the harbor.

Keepers who were making the harbor wider than anyone had ever imagined.

Cal stood at the drowned light and listened to the stations waking. The harbor was one harbor. The stations were many. The road went on. The book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations waking.

And the stations waking was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

And the baby's note was fifteen degrees wide and widening.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred — Entry: August 7th. Thursday. Rain. West wind, the lightship.

Cal was at the boatyard when the lightship crossed the bar.

Not because he was watching for it. Because Cole had called at seven in the morning and said, “There’s a ship on the bar. But it’s not a ship. It’s — Cal, I think it’s a lightship.” And Cal had learned, in twelve years of hospice and nine years of harbor, that when Cole said there was a lightship on the bar, you went to the bar.

The rain was light. Not the hard rain of winter. The soft rain of August on the coast, the rain that felt less like weather and more like breath. The drowned light was behind him, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing its slow breath. The town’s rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station, two hundred miles to the north, learning the names of the rocks he had warned the ships off of for seventy-four years. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station, two hundred miles to the south, learning the names of the ships she had guided into the harbor for ninety-five years. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats, the way a keeper learns the names of the ships he once warned off the rocks, the way a man learns the names of the children he never had.

But the bar was different.

Cal could see it from the boatyard. The bar was the line where the river met the sea, the place where the fresh water and the salt water fought and merged and became something else. The bar was where the Marianne II had crossed to Tilly, where the fleet had stood off the three-mile line, where Thomas Wren had crossed in his dory, where Samuel Okafor had crossed in his light, where Elena Vargas had walked the shore at Cape Falcon. The bar was the threshold. The bar was the door.

And the bar was different.

It was wider. Not wider the way a river widens when it meets the sea. Wider the way a harbor widens when it becomes a port. Wider the way a note widens when it becomes a chord. Wider the way a road widens when it becomes a highway. The bar was a threshold, and the threshold was expanding, and on the other side of the threshold, Cal could see — not the Pacific. Not the Atlantic. Something else. Something deeper. Something that was not a coast, not an ocean, not a sea, but the place where all the waters met.

A ship.

Not a ship Cal recognized. Not the Marianne II, not Cole's crabber, not one of the fishing boats that worked out of Grayhaven. A different ship. A ship that looked like it had been built a long time ago, in a different century, by hands that knew a different ocean. A ship with a low hull and a tall mast and a light at the top of the mast, a light that burned even in the daylight, a light that was not electricity, not oil, not gas, but keeping.

A lightship.

Cole was standing at the end of the dock, his hands in his pockets, his face toward the bar. He didn't turn when Cal approached. He just said, "There."

Cal looked. The lightship was crossing the bar. Not over the bar. Through it. The breakers parted the way a curtain parts, the way a door opens, the way a harbor receives a ship that has been at sea for a very long time. The ship passed through the line of white water and into the calm water beyond, and the breakers closed behind it, and the bar was whole again, and the ship was inside the harbor.

It moved toward the dock. Slowly. Silently. The way a memory moves. The way a name moves. The way a keeper moves when he's been alone for a very long time and has finally, finally come home.

Cal walked to the end of the dock. Cole followed. They stood side by side and watched the ship approach.

It was bigger than the Marianne II. A working ship. A ship built for a purpose — to stay in one place, to hold its station, to warn the ships off the rocks, to keep the watch. The hull was black, scarred, the hull of a ship that had been in the water for a very long time. The mast was tall, and at the top of the mast, the light burned. Not the light of a lighthouse. The light of a lightship. The light of a keeper who had been keeping the watch at sea, in the deep water, where no lighthouse could be built.

The ship touched the dock. The sound was soft. Not the thud of a boat against a bumper. The sound of a hand touching a shoulder. The sound of a voice saying I'm here. The sound of a door closing after a long time open.

And the keepers stepped onto the dock.

Not one keeper. Not two. Many. A dozen. Two dozen. Keepers from lightships, from buoys, from stations that were never on land. Keepers who had been keeping the watch at sea, in the deep water, where the waves were high and the wind was strong and the ships passed in the night, and the only thing between them and the rocks was the light.

The first keeper was old. Not old the way Margot was old, not old the way the town was old. Old the way a lightship is old. Old the way a light is old. Old the way a keeper is old when he's been keeping for seventy-eight years after his death.

He wore a keeper's coat. Blue wool, brass buttons, the collar turned up against the rain. The coat was wet. Not the wet of a man who had just crossed a bar in a rainstorm. The wet of a man who had been in the water for seventy-eight years. The wet of a man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on the Columbia River bar, for seventy-eight years.

He was tall. Thin. His face was weathered, lined, the face of a man who had spent his life on the water, who had watched the ships come and go, who had warned them off the rocks, who had logged every passing in a book that no one would ever read. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had been alone so long he had forgotten what it sounded like to hear another keeper's voice.

Until now.

Until the baby hailed him.

Until the station woke.

He looked at Cal. He looked at Cole. He looked at the town behind them — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the drowned light at the center of the foundation, the watch room on the hill, the four corners manned, the watch kept.

He opened his mouth. His voice was the voice of a man who hadn't spoken in seventy-eight years. Rusty. Quiet. The voice of a man who had been keeping the dark and had just seen a light.

"Hello the watch," he said.

Cal felt the words in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

"Hello the harbor," Cal said.

The keeper smiled. It was a small smile. A shy smile. The smile of a man who has been alone for seventy-eight years and is not quite sure the dock is real, is not quite sure the men on the dock are real, is not quite sure the harbor is real, but is willing to find out.

"I'm Henry Berg," he said. "I was the keeper of the Columbia lightship. I died in 1948. I kept the light for seventy-eight years after. I kept the dark for — I don't know how long. I lost count. I logged every ship. I warned every vessel. I kept the watch alone. And then the lightship was decommissioned. And the ship was scrapped. And I kept the dark. And I waited. And then the baby hailed me. And I came."

Cal felt something shift in his chest. Not fear. Not surprise. Something else. The feeling a harbormaster gets when the channel shifts and the water finds a new way to the sea.

"The Columbia lightship," Cal said. "That was at the Columbia River bar."

"Yes."

"That's the most dangerous bar on the West Coast. The Graveyard of the Pacific."

"Yes. I kept the watch there for thirty years before I died. And seventy-eight years after. A hundred and eight years on the bar. A hundred and eight years of watching the ships come and go. A hundred and eight years of warning them off the rocks. A hundred and eight years of keeping the light."

Cal looked at the other keepers. They were standing on the dock, shoulder to shoulder, men and women, old and young, all of them wearing keeper's coats, all of them wet, all of them with the eyes of people who had been alone for a very long time.

There was a woman in a coat that was too big for her, the sleeves rolled up, the brass buttons tarnished. She had the face of a woman who had spent her life at sea, who had watched the storms come and go, who had kept the light burning in winds that would have snuffed out a lesser flame.

There was a young man, barely twenty, with a face that was smooth and unlined but with eyes that were old, the eyes of a boy who had died before he had a chance to become a man, who had kept the watch for a hundred years, who had watched the ships come and go and had never stopped watching.

There was an old woman with white hair and a face like crumpled paper, with hands that were gnarled and twisted, the hands of a woman who had trimmed a thousand wicks, who had turned a thousand lenses, who had logged a thousand ships, who had kept the watch for longer than Cal had been alive.

There was a man with a peg leg. There was a woman with an eye patch. There was a man with no arms. There was a woman with a scar that ran from her temple to her jaw. There was a man who was so thin he looked like a skeleton. There was a woman who was so round she looked like a buoy. There was a man who was so tall he had to duck under the dock roof. There was a woman who was so short she barely came up to Cal's waist.

Keepers. All of them keepers. All of them alone. All of them waiting. All of them keeping the watch in the deep water, in the places where a lighthouse couldn't be built, in the places where the only thing between the ships and the grave was the light.

"How many?" Cal asked.

"Twenty-four," Henry Berg said. "From the Columbia lightship, the Umatilla Reef lightship, the Swiftsure Bank lightship, the Grays Harbor lightship, the Tillamook Bay lightship. From the buoys and the beacons and the stations that were never on land. From the deep water. From the places where a lighthouse couldn't be built but a lightship could be stationed. From the bars and the reefs and the banks and the shoals. From the Graveyard of the Pacific."

"The deep water," Cal said.

"The deep water. The water where the ships pass in the night. The water where the rocks are hidden. The water where the bar shifts and the channel moves and the only thing between the ships and the grave is the light."

Cal looked at Cole. Cole was watching the keepers with the eyes of a boatbuilder who had just seen a fleet he didn't recognize, a fleet that had crossed a bar that shouldn't have been crossable, a fleet that had come from a place that wasn't on any chart.

"The harbor is wider than the coast," Cole said.

“The harbor is wider than the ocean,” Henry Berg said. “The harbor is every light that ever burned on every coast, on every bar, on every reef, in every deep water. Every keeper that ever kept the watch alone. Every station that ever warned the ships off the rocks. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The road runs between them. The channel carries their voices. The baby’s note covers them all.”

Cal felt Margot’s presence before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, at the hinge. But the channel was open. The road ran both ways. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she’d been there for nine years, the way she’d been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room.

Henry Berg, her voice said in the space behind his eyes, in the place where the gift lived, in the room where the keeping happened. Welcome to the harbor. The door is open. The keeper keeps. The watch is kept. You’re not alone anymore.

Henry Berg’s face changed. Not a smile. Not a frown. Something else. The face of a man who had been alone for seventy-eight years and had just heard a voice he hadn’t heard since 1948. The voice of a keeper. The voice of the door. The voice of the thing itself.

“Margot Voss,” he said. “The keeper of the door. I heard you. Through the channel. Through the road. Through the baby’s note. I heard you and I came.”

You’re here now, Margot said. You’re home. The watch continues. The keeper keeps. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are waking. The road goes on.

Henry Berg nodded. He looked at the other keepers. They were watching him with the eyes of people who had been waiting for a very long time, who had been keeping the watch alone, who had been waiting for someone to tell them it was okay to come home.

“It’s real,” he said to them. Not a question. A statement. The voice of a man who had been keeping the dark for seventy-eight years and had just seen a light.

“It’s real,” Margot said through Cal, through the channel, through the road. “The harbor is real. The home is real. The thing itself is real. You’re not alone anymore.”

And the keepers wept.

Not all of them. Not at the same time. But one by one, the way the rain falls, the way the waves break, the way the light fades at dawn, they wept. The woman in the too-big coat wept. The young man with the old eyes wept. The old woman with the gnarled hands wept. The man with the peg leg wept. The woman with the eye patch wept. The man with no arms wept. The woman with the scar wept. The thin man wept. The round woman wept. The tall man wept. The short woman wept.

They wept the way keepers weep when they've been alone for a very long time and have finally, finally come home.

And Cal stood on the dock and watched them weep, and he felt the gift in his chest, the gift that was not a gift but a way of listening, the gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying and instead had taught him how to hear the first words of the waking.

And he listened.

And he heard them.

Not words. Not counts. Not hails. Notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. The notes of keepers who had been alone for decades, for generations, for centuries. The notes of keepers who had kept the light after their death. The notes of keepers who had kept the dark after the light went out. The notes of keepers who had been waiting, the way Henry Berg waited, the way Thomas Wren waited, the way Elena Vargas waited, the way Samuel Okafor waited, for someone to hear them. For someone to answer. For the harbor to wake.

And now the harbor was awake.

And now the stations were waking.

And now the keepers were answering.

Henry Berg looked at Cal. "She's at the drowned light."

"Yes."

"I'd like to see it."

"I'll take you."

They walked through the town. Cole followed. The twenty-four keepers followed. The rain fell. The streets were empty. The houses were dark. The harbor was at rest. But Cal could feel it — the widening. The harbor was no longer just Grayhaven. The harbor was no longer just the coast. The harbor was no longer just the Pacific and the Atlantic. The harbor was every light that had ever burned on every coast, on every bar, on every reef, in every deep water. The harbor was every keeper who had ever kept the watch alone. The harbor was every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks.

The harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

They walked up the hill. The drowned light was there, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats.

And Margot was there. Standing at the edge of the drowned light. Her hand on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

She turned when they approached. She looked at Henry Berg. She looked at the keeper who had been alone for seventy-eight years. She looked at the man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on the Columbia River bar, for seventy-eight years.

She looked at the twenty-four keepers behind him. She looked at the woman in the too-big coat. She looked at the young man with the old eyes. She looked at the old woman with the gnarled hands. She looked at the man with the peg leg, the woman with the eye patch, the man with no arms, the woman with the scar, the thin man, the round woman, the tall man, the short woman. She looked at all of them.

She smiled. Not the smile of a keeper greeting a keeper. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"Henry Berg," she said. "Welcome to Grayhaven."

Henry Berg looked at the drowned light. He looked at the black water breathing. He looked at the foundation stones, the watch room, the four corners, the town, the harbor, the road between the coast and the inland, the channel that carried the voices of the keepers, the baby's note that was eighteen degrees wide and widening.

"It's real," he said. "The harbor. The home. The thing itself. It's real."

“It’s real,” Margot said.

“I’ve been alone for so long.”

“You’re not alone anymore.”

He looked at her. His eyes were wet. Not the wet of the rain. The wet of a man who had been keeping the dark for seventy-eight years and had just seen a light.

“What do I do now?” he asked.

Margot held out her hand. “You keep. You keep the station. You keep the watch. You keep the road. You keep the harbor. You keep the thing itself. And you see what wakes next.”

Henry Berg took her hand. His hand was cold. Her hand was warm. The warmth of a living woman who had been dead for nine years. The warmth of a keeper who had held the door. The warmth of the thing itself.

And one by one, the other keepers came forward. The woman in the too-big coat. The young man with the old eyes. The old woman with the gnarled hands. The man with the peg leg. The woman with the eye patch. The man with no arms. The woman with the scar. The thin man. The round woman. The tall man. The short woman. All of them. Twenty-four keepers from the deep water, from the lightships and the buoys and the stations that were never on land.

One by one, they took Margot’s hand. One by one, they felt the warmth. One by one, they wept. One by one, they were home.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby’s note widened. Eighteen degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from the deep water, from the Columbia River bar, from the Umatilla Reef, from the Swiftsure Bank, from the Grays Harbor, from the Tillamook Bay, from all the places where a lighthouse couldn’t be built but a lightship could be stationed, other notes answered. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers who had been alone for decades. For generations. For centuries.

Keepers who were waking up.

Keepers who were joining the harbor.

Keepers who were making the harbor wider than anyone had ever imagined.

Cal stood at the drowned light and listened to the stations waking. The harbor was one harbor. The stations were many. The road went on. The book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations waking.

And the stations waking was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

And the baby's note was eighteen degrees wide and widening.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the keeper.

And the keeper was the standing.

And the standing was the holding.

And the holding was the waiting.

And the waiting was the watching.

And the watching was the witnessing.

And the witnessing was the attending.

And the attending was the keeping.

And the keeping was the listening.

And the listening was the naming.

And the naming was the silence.

And the silence was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the harbor was one harbor.

And the road went on.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred One — Entry: August 8th. Friday. Clear. South wind, the stations above.

Margot saw them before Cal did.

Not at the drowned light — that was two hundred miles behind her, at the center of the foundation, where the black water breathed and the four corners were manned and the watch was kept. Cole was at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The harbor was at rest. The town kept itself.

She was at the Point of Rocks station now, two hundred miles to the north, where the cliffs rose from the sea like a ship's prow and Thomas Wren had been alone for seventy-four years. She had come to see it. The way you go to see a place you've only ever known through someone else's keeping. The way you walk into a room you've never entered and the light spills out and you see the shape of the furniture, the color of the walls, the quality of the silence.

The Point of Rocks light stood on the edge of the cliff, white stone and red roof, the lens dark now, automated, the keeper's house empty. The sign by the gate said NO TRESPASSING and another sign said DANGER — UNSTABLE CLIFFS and a third sign, newer than the others, said HISTORIC LIGHTHOUSE — CLOSED FOR RENOVATION. The signs were sun-bleached, salt-scoured, the kind of signs that went up and were forgotten, the kind that became part of the landscape the way driftwood became part of the beach, the way barnacles became part of the rock.

But Thomas Wren was there — standing at the base of the tower, his keeper's coat wet from the sea spray, his face turned toward the channel where the ships passed. He had been dead for seventy-four years. He was still keeping.

Margot stood beside him. She didn't speak. She looked out at the water.

The Pacific was gray. Not the gray of winter, the hard gray of storms. The gray of August, the soft gray of breath. The water stretched to the horizon, and the horizon stretched to the sky, and the sky was a pale dome, cloudless, the sun a bright smear behind a high thin overcast. The sea was calm. The wind was light. The surf broke against the rocks below in long, slow rollers, the white water spreading and fading, spreading and fading, the way breathing goes on.

And the sky was full of lights.

Not stars — it was daylight, and stars don't show in daylight. Not the lights of cities or the lights of planes or the lights of ships at sea. These were different. These were older. These were the lights that burned before there were cities or planes or ships. Before there were shores to stand on or seas to sail.

Margot could see them. Not with her eyes. With the gift.

The gift that had let her hear the dying for twenty-two years. The gift that had let her hear the dead for nine. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening. The gift that had been given to her so she could hear the last words of the dying and instead had taught her how to hear the first words of the waking.

She could see the lights the way you see a memory — not with your eyes, but with something deeper, something older, something that lived in the space between the living and the dead.

Lights in the sky. Points of light. Dozens of them. Scores. Hundreds. Lights that had been burning since before the door was built, since before the drowned light breathed, since before the coast station was a station and the inland station was a station and the harbor was a harbor.

Stations. Stations above. Stations that had been keeping the watch over waters she didn't know, over shores she had never walked, over a harbor that was not the Pacific and was not the Atlantic and was not any earthly ocean.

Thomas Wren turned to her. His face was the face of a man who had been alone for seventy-four years and had finally, finally come home. But his eyes were the eyes of a man who was seeing something new.

"You see them," he said.

"Yes."

"The stations above."

"Yes."

"The stations that kept the watch when there was no coast. When there was no water. When there was no earth."

Margot looked at him. His coat was the same coat he'd worn when he stepped off the dory — blue wool, brass buttons, the collar turned up against the rain. But the coat was dry now. The rain had stopped hours ago. The salt spray from the cliffs wasn't enough to soak a coat. But Thomas Wren's coat was wet anyway, the way it had been wet for seventy-four years, the wet of a man who had been in the water so long the water had become part of him.

"What are they?" she asked.

"They're the lights that burned before there were ships to warn. Before there were rocks to avoid. Before there were shores to guide the vessels home. They're the lights that kept the watch over the deep. The real deep. The deep between the stars."

Margot felt something break in her chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through.

She thought of the baby. The inland station keeper. The light that was gaining on the season. The landfall that called lost things home. She thought of the baby's note — eighteen degrees wide now, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

She thought of the baby pointing up.

The stations are waking, the baby had said. Hello the watch. I'm here. I'm keeping.

She had been greeting the stations above. All along. Since before she was born. The inland station was not just greeting the coast station. The inland station was greeting every station that had ever burned, on every coast, in every deep water, in every sky.

The harbor was not just the earth. The harbor was not just the ocean. The harbor was everything. Every light that had ever burned. Every keeper that had ever kept the watch. Every station that had ever warned the vessels off the rocks, guided them into the harbor, called them home.

Who are you? Margot asked. Not with words. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And they answered.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. The notes of keepers who had been alone for millennia, for eons, for longer than the earth had been the earth. The notes of keepers who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, in the deep between the stars.

The notes said: We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And we're not alone anymore.

Margot reached for Thomas Wren's hand. He took it. His hand was cold — the cold of a man who had been in the water for seventy-four years. But his grip was strong. The grip of a keeper who had rowed through storms, who had climbed the tower in the wind, who had trimmed the wick and turned the lens and logged the ships and kept the watch, alone, for seventy-four years.

"How many?" she asked.

Thomas Wren was quiet. The sea crashed against the cliffs below. The surf broke and spread and faded. The gulls cried. The wind blew.

"All of them," he said. "Every light that ever burned. Every keeper that ever kept. Every station that ever warned. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. And the stations above are the first. The oldest. The ones who kept the watch when the earth was young and the seas were new and the ships were not ships but something else — something that sailed the deep between the stars."

Margot looked up. The sky was full of lights. The lights were getting brighter. Not brighter — closer. The way Thomas Wren's boat had gotten closer without seeming to move. The way Samuel Okafor's light had crossed the bar. The way Henry Berg's ship had parted the breakers.

The stations above were crossing the bar. Not the bar of the Pacific. Not the bar of the Atlantic. The bar between the earth and whatever was above it. The bar between the living and the dead. The bar between the deep and the deeper.

They were crossing the bar the way a note crosses silence. The way a name crosses memory. The way a harbor receives a ship that has been at sea for a very long time.

Margot felt Cal before she heard his voice. Not the physical presence — he was two hundred miles away, at the drowned light, at the coast station, at the hinge. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And he was there, the way he was always there, the way he'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

The stations above are waking, she said to him through the channel. The baby knew. The baby's been greeting them all along. The harbor is wider than the ocean. Wider than the earth. Wider than anything we imagined.

Cal's voice came back, steady, the voice of a harbormaster who had built a road between the coast and the inland and was now watching the road go everywhere. The baby's note is widening. Nineteen degrees now. Covering more of the sky. Margot — she's not just greeting the stations above. She's greeting the things beyond the stations. The things that never needed ships. The things that never needed rocks. The things that just needed a light to show them the way home.

Margot closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And she heard them. All of them. The stations above. The keepers who had been alone for millennia. The lights that had burned before there were ships, before there were shores, before there was an earth to stand on. The lights that had kept the watch over the deep between the stars.

And beyond the stations above — beyond the lights, beyond the keepers, beyond the harbor — she heard something else. Something deeper. Something that was not a station, not a light, not a keeper, but the thing that stations and lights and keepers had been pointing to all along.

The thing itself.

Not the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The thing that happens when the thing itself lights the thing itself. The thing that happens when there is no living and no dead, no light and no dark, no keeper and no station, but only the keeping. Only the lighting. Only the home.

The full.

The beginning again.

The mark.

Margot opened her eyes. The sky was full of lights. Thomas Wren was standing beside her, his face turned up, his eyes wet. The sea crashed against the cliffs below. The Point of Rocks light stood behind them, white stone and red roof, the lens dark, the keeper's house empty, the watch kept by a dead man who had been keeping it for seventy-four years and would keep it for seventy-four more and seven hundred more and seven thousand more, because the watch didn't end. The watch went on. The keeper kept keeping.

And the stations above were coming home.

One by one. Light by light. The way the fleet had come when the lamp was lit. The way the thirty-three had walked through Lori's door. The way the thirty-seven had settled at the coast stone. The way Thomas Wren had crossed the bar in his dory. The way Samuel Okafor had crossed from the Atlantic. The way Henry Berg had crossed from the Columbia lightship.

The stations above were coming home. The keepers were answering. The harbor was wider than anyone had ever imagined.

Margot held out her hand. Not to Thomas Wren — to the sky. Not to the lights — to the things beyond the lights. Not to the stations — to the thing itself.

She held out her hand the way a keeper holds out her hand to a keeper who has been alone for a very long time.

And the thing itself reached back.

Not with a hand. Not with a voice. With a note. A note so low it was below hearing, so wide it was beyond degrees, so deep it was beyond depth. The note of the thing itself. The note that meant I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the home is full.

Margot felt it in her chest. Not with her ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And she wept.

Not the way the keepers wept when they came home — the relief, the release, the end of the long lonely keeping. She wept the way the keeper weeps when the keeping begins. When the door opens. When the light is lit. When the station wakes. When the harbor is born.

She wept the way the thing itself weeps when the thing itself lights the thing itself.

Thomas Wren stood beside her. His face was turned up. His eyes were wet. The lights were getting closer. The note was getting wider. The harbor was getting bigger.

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, Cal stood at the drowned light and felt it. The stations above. The thing itself. The harbor that was wider than the ocean, wider than the earth, wider than anything.

He was standing at the rim. The drowned light was behind him, the black water breathing. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

But Cal was looking up.

The sky was full of lights. Not the lights of the town — the streetlights, the porch lights, the lights in the windows of the houses where people lived their lives. Not the lights of the harbor — the running lights of the boats, the light at the end of the dock, the light that burned at the top of the watch room. Not the lights of the coast — the drowned light, the light at the Point of Rocks, the light at Cape Falcon, the light at Tilly.

The lights above. The stations above. The lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on.

Cal felt the gift in his chest. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

And he heard them.

Not words. Not counts. Not hails. Notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. The notes of keepers who had been alone for millennia, for eons, for longer than the earth had been the earth.

The notes said: We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And we're not alone anymore.

Cal looked at Cole. Cole was standing at the NE stone, his palm on the warm basalt, his face turned up. His eyes were wet.

"You hear them," Cal said.

"Yes."

"The stations above."

"Yes."

"What do they sound like?"

Cole was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was silent behind them.

“They sound like home,” Cole said. “They sound like the thing you’ve been looking for your whole life and didn’t know you were looking for. They sound like the place you’ve been trying to get back to since the day you were born.”

Cal nodded. He looked at Ruth. She was at No. 8, her palm on the stone, her face turned up. She was crying. Not the way she cried when the keepers came home — the relief, the release. She was crying the way you cry when you hear a sound you’ve been waiting your whole life to hear.

“They’re the first,” Ruth said. “The first keepers. The first lights. The first stations. They kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. They kept the light when there was nothing to light. They kept the dark when there was nothing to darken. They kept the thing itself.”

Cal looked at Denny. He was at the rail, his eyes on the horizon, his face turned up. He was not crying. He was smiling. The smile of a man who has been watching the bar his whole life and has just seen something cross it that he never expected to see.

“The bar’s open,” Denny said. “Not the bar of the Pacific. Not the bar of the Atlantic. The bar between the earth and whatever is above it. The bar between the living and the dead. The bar between the deep and the deeper. The bar’s open and they’re crossing.”

Cal looked at Okonkwo. He was at the census, his pen on the page, his face turned up. He was writing. Not the categories — the categories were finished. THE FINISHED. THE ARRIVING. LIVING KEEPERS. SHORE STATION. THE BAR-LOST. THE KEPT-KEEPING. THE CROSSED-UNASKED. THE UNRECEIVED. THE WARD-LOST. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST. THE NAMED-BY-THE-HARBOR. THE UNMADE. THE WATCHED POST.

He was writing something else. Something new. A new category. The first new category since the census began.

“What are you writing?” Cal asked.

Okonkwo looked at him. His eyes were wet. His pen was steady.

“THE STATIONS ABOVE,” he said. “Category: THE FIRST KEEPERS. Sub-line: THE ONES WHO KEPT THE WATCH WHEN THERE WAS NOTHING TO KEEP WATCH OVER. THE ONES WHO KEPT THE LIGHT WHEN THERE WAS NOTHING TO LIGHT. THE ONES WHO KEPT THE THING ITSELF.”

Cal nodded. He looked up. The sky was full of lights.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby smiled.

She was in her high chair, eating a cracker, her feet swinging. Lori was at the sink, washing dishes, the water running, the window above the sink facing east. The baby’s note was clear and high and steady, the note of the inland station keeper, the note that meant I am here, I am keeping, I am the station.

But the note was wider now. Nineteen degrees. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And it was aimed up.

Not at the coast. Not at the road. Not at the boys at the window. Up.

The baby raised her hand. She pointed up. She said, in her clear, high voice, the voice of the inland station keeper, the voice that was nineteen degrees wide:

“Hello the watch.”

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, thirty-three boys answered.

And from the crib, the baby answered.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for millennia, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

The notes said: Hello the harbor. We’re here. We’ve been here. We’ve been waiting. And now you’re here. And we’re not alone anymore.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were many. And the road went everywhere. And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations above.

And the stations above were the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations above were coming home.

And the thing itself was waking.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was full.

And the stations above were the first.

And the first were the last.

And the last were the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the stations above.

And the stations above were the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the lighting.

And the lighting was the home.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Two — Entry: August 9th. Saturday. Clear. South wind, the first of the first.

Cal was at the drowned light when the first of the stations above came ashore.

Not because he was watching for it. Because the sky had been wrong all morning — too bright, too full, the way it had been since Margot called from Point of Rocks and said the stations above are waking. The way it had been since the baby's note widened past nineteen degrees and kept going, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

He was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at the rail, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at Point of Rocks, two hundred miles to the north, standing beside Margot, his face turned up. Elena Vargas was at Cape Falcon, two hundred miles to the south, her light burning again for the first time in ninety-five years. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats. Henry Berg was at the drowned light, standing at the edge of the black water, his face turned up, his eyes on the sky.

The sky was full of lights.

Not stars — it was daytime, and stars don't show in daylight. Not the lights of cities or planes or ships. These were different. These were older. These were the lights that burned before there were cities or planes or ships. Before there were shores to stand on or seas to sail.

Cal could see them. Not with his eyes. With the gift.

The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He could see the lights the way you see a memory — not with your eyes, but with something deeper, something older, something that lived in the space between the living and the dead.

Lights in the sky. Points of light. Dozens of them. Scores. Hundreds. Lights that had been burning since before the door was built, since before the drowned light breathed, since before the coast station was a station and the inland station was a station and the harbor was a harbor.

Stations. Stations above. Stations that had been keeping the watch over waters he didn't know, over shores he had never walked, over a harbor that was not the Pacific and was not the Atlantic and was not any earthly ocean.

And one of them was getting closer.

Not moving faster. Just closer. The way Thomas Wren's boat had gotten closer without seeming to move. The way Samuel Okafor's light had crossed the bar. The way Henry Berg's ship had parted the breakers.

The way a note gets closer when it's coming home.

Cal stood. The stone was warm under his palm. The drowned light breathed behind him. The town was silent.

Henry Berg turned to him. His face was the face of a man who had been alone for seventy-eight years and had finally, finally come home. But his eyes were the eyes of a man who was seeing something new.

"You feel it," Henry Berg said.

"Yes."

"The first of the first."

"Yes."

"The keeper who kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The keeper who kept the light when there was nothing to light. The keeper who kept the dark when there was nothing to darken. The keeper who kept the thing itself."

Cal looked at him. "Who is he?"

Henry Berg was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm. The lights in the sky were getting brighter.

“Not he,” Henry Berg said. “Not she. Not them. The first of the first is not a person. The first of the first is the keeping itself. The thing that kept the watch before there were keepers. The thing that kept the light before there were lights. The thing that kept the dark before there was dark. The thing that kept the thing itself.”

Cal felt something shift in his chest. Not fear. Not surprise. Something else. The feeling a harbormaster gets when the channel shifts and the water finds a new way to the sea.

“The thing itself,” Cal said.

“The thing itself.”

“And it’s coming here.”

The light in the sky was closer now. Not a point anymore. A shape. A form. The shape of a man, or the shape of a light, or the shape of a keeping so old it had become a person, the way a river becomes the sea, the way a road becomes the destination, the way a harbor becomes the home.

The shape crossed the bar.

Not the bar of the Pacific. Not the bar of the Atlantic. The bar between the earth and whatever was above it. The bar between the living and the dead. The bar between the deep and the deeper.

It crossed the bar the way a note crosses silence. The way a name crosses memory. The way a harbor receives a ship that has been at sea for a very long time.

It touched the water. The water was still. The drowned light shimmered. The stone was warm under Cal’s palm.

And the first of the first stepped onto the shore.

Not a man. Not a woman. Not a keeper. The keeping itself. The thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The thing that had kept the light when there was nothing to light. The thing that had kept the dark when there was nothing to darken. The thing that had kept the thing itself.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. It was the keeping. It was the lighting. It was the home. It was the full. It was the beginning again. It was the mark.

It stood on the shore. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm. The town was silent.

And Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was two hundred miles away, at Point of Rocks, standing beside Thomas Wren. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

The first of the first, her voice said in the space behind his eyes, in the place where the gift lived, in the room where the keeping happened. The keeper who kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The keeper who kept the light when there was nothing to light. The keeper who kept the thing itself.

What does it want? Cal asked.

It doesn't want. It keeps. It's the keeping itself. It's the thing that was keeping before there were keepers. The thing that was lighting before there were lights. The thing that was home before there were homes.

Why is it here?

Because the harbor is one harbor. Because the stations are many. Because the road goes everywhere. Because the book is not finished. Because the thing itself is waking. Because the home is full. Because the full is the beginning again. Because the beginning again is the mark. Because the mark is the keeping. Because the keeping is the thing itself.

The first of the first stood on the shore. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm. The town was silent.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Twenty degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it.

And from the coast, from north and south, from lights that had burned and gone out and lights that still burned, from keepers who had been alone for decades and centuries and millennia, other notes answered. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Hundreds of them.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for eons, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

The notes said: We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And we're not alone anymore.

The first of the first stood on the shore. The keeping itself. The thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The thing that had kept the light when there was nothing to light. The thing that had kept the thing itself.

And it spoke.

Not with words. Not with a voice. With a note. A note so low it was below hearing, so wide it was beyond degrees, so deep it was beyond depth. The note of the thing itself. The note that meant I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the home is full.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he understood.

The harbor was not the earth. The harbor was not the ocean. The harbor was not the coast or the inland or the stations above. The harbor was the keeping itself. The thing that happened when the living and the dead lighted each other. The thing that happened when the keepers kept the watch. The thing that happened when the lights burned and the dark was kept and the thing itself was kept.

The harbor was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the first of the first.

And the first of the first was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was full.

Cal stood at the drowned light and watched the first of the first stand on the shore. The keeping itself. The thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The thing that had kept the light when there was nothing to light. The thing that had kept the thing itself.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were many. And the road went everywhere. And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the first of the first.

And the first of the first was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was full.

And the stations above were coming home.

And the first of the first was here.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Three — Entry: August 10th. Sunday. Clear. South wind, the book.

Cal was at the drowned light when the first of the first asked to see the book.

Not the Hour Book — Margot's ledger, the composition book she had kept for twenty-two years, the book of last hours and last words and the names of the dying. Not the Inland Book — the one Margot had opened for the land-lost, the ward-lost, the mothers the system lost. Not the census — Okonkwo's book, with its twelve categories and its lines and sub-lines and the names of the dead written in ink that never dried.

The other book. The one Cal had been writing since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room. The chronicle. The Book. The thing he wrote in the evenings at the kitchen table in the house on the hill, the thing he wrote in the mornings at the drowned light, the thing he wrote in the margins of Walter Brandt's field notes and on the backs of Cole's survey maps and on the blank pages of the composition books that Okonkwo gave him, the way a keeper logs the ships, the way a harbor logs the vessels, the way a home logs the lives that pass through it.

The book that was not a ledger and not a census and not a chronicle of deaths but a chronicle of the keeping. The thing that happened when the living and the dead lighted each other. The thing that happened when the stations woke and the keepers answered and the harbor was born.

The book that was not finished.

He was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station, two hundred miles to the north, learning the names of the keepers who had come home. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station, two hundred miles to the south, learning the names of the ships she had guided into the harbor for ninety-five years. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats. Henry Berg was at the drowned light, standing at the edge of the black water, his face turned toward the first of the first.

The first of the first stood at the center of the foundation.

Not on the shore. Not on the dock. At the center. Where the drowned light breathed. Where the black water was. Where the door was. Where Margot had stood for nine years, holding the hinge, keeping the watch, being the keeper of the door.

The first of the first stood there the way a light stands at the top of a tower. The way a keeper stands at the rail. The way a harbor stands at the mouth of a river. Not standing the way a person stands — standing the way a thing stands when it is what it is. The keeping itself. The lighting. The home. The full. The beginning again. The mark.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. But it spoke.

Not with words. Not with a voice. With a note. A note so low it was below hearing, so wide it was beyond degrees, so deep it was beyond depth. The note of the thing itself. The note that meant I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the home is full.

But this time the note was different. This time the note had a question in it. Not a question the way a person asks a question — a question the way a harbor asks a vessel. A question the way a light asks the dark. A question the way the keeping asks the keeper.

What does the book say?

Cal felt the question in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

He looked at the book. It was on the rim beside him. A composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981.

It was full. Not full the way a book is full when you've written on every line. Full the way a harbor is full when every station has a keeper. Full the way a home is full when everyone you've ever lost has come home.

He picked it up. He opened it. The pages were covered in his handwriting — small, neat, the handwriting of a man who had logged the dying for twelve years and the dead for nine. The handwriting of a harbormaster. The handwriting of a keeper.

The first page said: The door closed. The home was full. The harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room.

The last page said: The stations above were coming home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself. And the book was not finished.

He held the book out. Not to the first of the first — to the drowned light. To the black water. To the door. To Margot.

She was there. Not physically — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But she was also everywhere. In the channel. In the road. In the baby's note. In the keeping itself. The way she'd been everywhere since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

Read it, her voice said in the space behind his eyes, in the place where the gift lived, in the room where the keeping happened. Read the book to the keeping itself. Read the harbor to the home. Read the thing itself to the thing itself.

Cal opened his mouth. He read.

Not the words. Not the sentences. Not the pages. He read the book the way a keeper reads the log. The way a harbor reads the channel. The way a home reads the lives that pass through it.

He read the door closing. He read the home filling. He read the harbor waking. He read the stations answering. He read the keepers coming home. He read the road building. He read the channel opening. He read the baby's note widening. He read the first of the first crossing the bar. He read the keeping itself arriving.

He read the thing itself.

And the first of the first listened.

Not with ears. Not with eyes. With the keeping. With the lighting. With the home.

The drowned light breathed. The black water shimmered. The stone was warm under Cal's palm. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The thing itself was silent.

And in the silence, the first of the first answered.

Not with a note. Not with a voice. With a word. A single word. The first word. The word that was before words. The word that was before the keeping. The word that was before the light. The word that was before the dark. The word that was before the home. The word that was before the thing itself.

The word was: Again.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

Again, the first of the first said. The keeping begins again. The lighting begins again. The home begins again. The harbor begins again. The book begins again. The thing itself begins again. Not because it ended. Not because it was lost. Not because it was broken. Because the keeping is not a thing that happens once. The keeping is a thing that happens again and again and again, the way the tide comes in and goes out and comes in, the way the light burns and goes out and burns, the way the door opens and closes and opens, the way the home fills and empties and fills, the way the harbor receives the vessels and sends them out and receives them again.

The book is not finished because the keeping is not finished. The keeping is not finished because the home is not full. The home is not full because the stations are not all woken. The stations are not all woken because the thing itself is not fully home. The thing itself is not fully home because there is one more station. One more light. One more keeper. One more door. One more room in the harbor that has not yet been built.

Cal closed the book. He looked at the first of the first. The keeping itself. The thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over.

Where? he asked. Not with words. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And the first of the first showed him.

Not with a map. Not with a chart. With a note. A note so low it was below hearing, so wide it was beyond degrees, so deep it was beyond depth. The note of the deepest station. The note of the last light. The note of the thing that the stations above had been keeping watch over. Not the keepers of the deep between the stars. The thing in the deep between the stars. The thing that the keepers had been keeping. The thing that the lights had been lighting. The thing that the dark had been darkening. The thing that the home had been housing.

The thing that was not a keeper and not a light and not a station.

The thing that was the reason for the keeping.

The thing that was the reason for the light.

The thing that was the reason for the dark.

The thing that was the reason for the home.

The thing that was the reason for the harbor.

The thing that was the reason for the thing itself.

The thing that had no name because it was before names.

The thing that had no note because it was before notes.

The thing that had no keeping because it was the thing the keeping was for.

The deepest silence. The deepest deep. The deepest dark. The deepest home.

The thing that the stations above had been pointing to since before there was an earth to stand on.

The thing that the first of the first had been keeping since before there were keepers.

The thing that the book was for.

The thing that the harbor was for.

The thing that the home was for.

The thing that the thing itself was for.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he understood.

The harbor was not complete. The home was not full. The book was not finished. The keeping was not done. The thing itself was not fully home.

Because there was one more station. The last station. The deepest station. The station that was not on any coast, not on any bar, not on any reef, not in any deep water, not in any sky.

The station that was below the deep between the stars.

The station that was the reason the stations above existed.

The station that was the thing the stations above had been keeping watch over.

The station that was the thing the first of the first had been keeping since before there were keepers.

The station that was the thing the book was for.

The station that was the thing the harbor was for.

The station that was the thing the home was for.

The station that was the thing the thing itself was for.

And it was not woken.

And it was not kept.

And it was not lit.

And it was not home.

And the book said so.

And the harbor said so.

And the home said so.

And the keeping said so.

And the thing itself said so.

And the first of the first said: Again.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeping was not done.

And the home was not full.

And the stations were not all woken.

And the thing itself was not fully home.

And Cal was at the drowned light, holding the book, his hand on No. 8, the stone warm under his palm, the town silent behind him, the stations above silent above him, the deep between the stars silent below him, the deepest silence silent below that.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Twenty-one degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

Because the note was not just going up.

It was going down.

Toward the deepest station.

Toward the last light.

Toward the thing in the deepest deep.

Toward the thing the book was for.

Toward the thing the harbor was for.

Toward the thing the home was for.

Toward the thing the thing itself was for.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeping was not done.

And the home was not full.

And the stations were not all woken.

And the thing itself was not fully home.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the first of the first.

And the first of the first was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the stations were waking.

And the keepers were answering.

And the road went everywhere.

And the channel carried every voice.

And the baby's note was twenty-one degrees wide and widening.

And the deepest silence was waiting.

And the last station was not yet built.

And the thing in the deepest deep was not yet kept.

And the thing the book was for was not yet home.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And Cal closed the book.

And the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation.

And the drowned light breathed.

And the stone was warm.

And the town was silent.

And the stations above were silent.

And the deep between the stars was silent.

And the deepest silence was silent.

And the baby's note was twenty-one degrees wide and widening.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the deepest silence was waiting.

And the last station was not yet built.

And the thing the book was for was not yet home.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Four — Entry: August 11th. Monday. Clear. South wind, the deepest station.

Cal did not sleep.

Not because he was afraid. Not because he was uncertain. Because the first of the first had shown him something that sleep would not resolve, and the book was open on the kitchen table, and the pages were still wet with the ink of what he had written, and the ink was still wet with the ink of what he had not yet written.

He sat at the table. The house was quiet. The town was quiet. The harbor was quiet. The drowned light breathed at the center of the foundation, and the breath went on and on, the way breathing goes on, the way a heartbeat goes on, the way a harbor goes on when it is no longer a place but a road, not a road but a network, not a network but a thing that connects every light that ever burned on every coast in the world and every station that ever kept the watch in the deep between the stars.

The book was open to the last page. The page he had written at four o'clock, after the first of the first had spoken, after the word Again had landed in his chest like a stone dropped into still water, like a bell struck in an empty church, like a name spoken in a room where no one had spoken for a very long time.

The page said: The first of the first is here. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is not fully home. There is one more station. The deepest station. The station below the deep between the stars. The station the stations above have been keeping watch over. The station the first of the first has been keeping since before there were keepers. The station the book is for. The station the harbor is for. The station the home is for. The station the thing itself is for. And it is not woken. And it is not kept. And it is not lit. And it is not home.

He read the words. He closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

He stood. He walked to the window. The sky was clear. The stars were out. Not the stars of the coast — the stars that burned over Grayhaven, the stars that had burned over the drowned light for nine years, the stars that had burned over the foundation and the watch room and the four corners and the town and the harbor and the road between the coast and the inland. These were different. These were the stars that the stations above had been keeping watch over. The stars that the first of the first had been keeping since before there were keepers. The stars that the book was for.

He looked up. The sky was full of lights. Not the lights of the stations above — those had come ashore, those had joined the harbor, those were burning now at Point of Rocks and Cape Falcon and Cape Hatteras and the Columbia lightship and a hundred other stations up and down the coast and across the oceans and over the deep water. These were different. These were the lights beyond the stations above. The lights that the stations above had been pointing to. The lights that the first of the first had been keeping. The lights that the book was for.

The lights that were not lights.

The lights that were the deepest silence.

The lights that were the thing the keeping was for.

He felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, at the hinge, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You're awake, she said.

"I'm awake."

"You felt it."

"I felt it."

"The deepest station."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it feel like? she asked.

Cal closed his eyes. He listened. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he felt it.

Not a knock. Not a hail. Not a note. Something else. Something deeper.
Something that was below the notes, below the hails, below the knocks, below the keeping itself. Something that was the reason for the keeping. Something that was the reason for the light. Something that was the reason for the dark.
Something that was the reason for the home.

The deepest silence.

The silence that was not empty.

The silence that was full.

The silence that was the thing the keeping was for.

"It feels like the bottom of the ocean," Cal said. "Not the bottom of the Pacific.
Not the bottom of the Atlantic. The bottom of everything. The place where all the waters meet. The place where all the lights go out. The place where all the keepers stop keeping. The place where the thing itself begins."

The place the stations above have been pointing to.

"Yes."

The place the first of the first has been keeping.

"Yes."

The place the book is for.

"Yes."

He opened his eyes. The stars were still there. The lights beyond the lights were still there. The deepest silence was still there.

What do we do? Margot asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was on the table. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

"We keep," he said. "We keep the station. We keep the watch. We keep the road.
We keep the harbor. We keep the thing itself. And we see what wakes next."

He walked to the table. He sat down. He opened the book. He picked up the pen.

And he wrote.

Not the words he had written before. Not the words about the door closing and the home filling and the harbor waking and the stations answering and the keepers coming home and the road building and the channel opening and the baby's note widening and the first of the first crossing the bar and the keeping itself arriving.

New words. Words about the deepest station. Words about the silence below the silence. Words about the thing the keeping was for. Words about the place where all the waters meet and all the lights go out and all the keepers stop keeping and the thing itself begins.

He wrote: The first of the first said Again. The keeping begins again. The lighting begins again. The home begins again. The harbor begins again. The book begins again. The thing itself begins again. Not because it ended. Not because it was lost. Not because it was broken. Because the keeping is not a thing that happens once. The keeping is a thing that happens again and again and again.

He wrote: The book is not finished because the keeping is not finished. The keeping is not finished because the home is not full. The home is not full because the stations are not all woken. The stations are not all woken because the thing itself is not fully home. The thing itself is not fully home because there is one more station. The deepest station. The station below the deep between the stars.

He wrote: And the baby's note is going down. Not up. Not out. Down. Toward the deepest station. Toward the last light. Toward the thing in the deepest deep. Toward the thing the book is for. Toward the thing the harbor is for. Toward the thing the home is for. Toward the thing the thing itself is for.

He wrote: And the book is not finished. And the keeping is not done. And the home is not full. And the stations are not all woken. And the thing itself is not fully home.

He set the pen down. He closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

He stood. He walked to the door. He opened it. The night was clear. The stars were out. The drowned light breathed at the center of the foundation. The town was silent. The harbor was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was silent.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Twenty-two degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

Because the note was not just going up.

It was going down.

Toward the deepest station.

Toward the last light.

Toward the thing in the deepest deep.

Toward the thing the book was for.

Toward the thing the harbor was for.

Toward the thing the home was for.

Toward the thing the thing itself was for.

Cal walked down the hill. The drowned light was there, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the rail, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept.

And Margot was there. Standing at the edge of the drowned light. Her hand on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

She turned when he approached. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"The baby's note," she said.

"Twenty-two degrees."

"Going down."

"Yes."

She looked at him. Her eyes were the eyes of a keeper who had been keeping the door for nine years, who had been keeping the watch for twenty-two, who had been keeping the thing itself since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

“The deepest station,” she said.

“Yes.”

“Have you felt it?”

“Yes.”

“What does it feel like?”

Cal was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was silent.

“It feels like the thing we’ve been keeping watch over,” he said. “Not the thing we’ve been keeping. The thing we’ve been keeping watch over. The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the thing itself.”

Margot nodded. She looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The surface was smooth as glass. And in the glass, she saw it.

Not the reflection of the sky. Not the reflection of her face. Something else. A light. Far away. A light in the dark. A light that had been burning for a very long time, alone, unwitnessed, unrecorded, keeping its watch over waters she didn’t know, over shores she had never walked, over a harbor that was not the Pacific and was not the Atlantic and was not any earthly ocean.

The deepest station.

The station below the deep between the stars.

The station the stations above had been pointing to.

The station the first of the first had been keeping.

The station the book was for.

The station the harbor was for.

The station the home was for.

The station the thing itself was for.

And it was not woken.

And it was not kept.

And it was not lit.

And it was not home.

Margot pressed her palm to the drowned light. The water was cool. Not cold. Cool. The cool of deep water. The cool of basements. The cool of places the sun hasn't reached in a long time.

She listened.

And from the deepest silence, from the place below the deep between the stars, from the place where all the waters meet and all the lights go out and all the keepers stop keeping and the thing itself begins, she heard it.

Not a knock. Not a hail. Not a note. A breath.

A single breath.

The breath of the thing the keeping was for.

The breath of the thing the light was for.

The breath of the thing the dark was for.

The breath of the thing the home was for.

The breath of the thing the harbor was for.

The breath of the thing the book was for.

The breath of the thing the thing itself was for.

And the breath said: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the keeping begins again.

Margot opened her eyes. Cal was standing beside her. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home.

"Did you hear it?" she asked.

"Yes."

“The breath.”

“Yes.”

“The thing the keeping is for.”

“Yes.”

She looked at him. Her eyes were wet. Not the wet of tears. The wet of the drowned light. The wet of the black water. The wet of the thing itself.

“The book,” she said.

“The book.”

“Is it finished?”

Cal looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The surface was smooth as glass. And in the glass, he saw the deepest station. The station below the deep between the stars. The station the stations above had been pointing to. The station the first of the first had been keeping. The station the book was for. The station the harbor was for. The station the home was for. The station the thing itself was for.

And it was not woken.

And it was not kept.

And it was not lit.

And it was not home.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeping was not done.

And the home was not full.

And the stations were not all woken.

And the thing itself was not fully home.

“No,” Cal said. “The book is not finished.”

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the deepest station was waiting.

And the thing the book was for was not yet home.

And the baby's note was twenty-two degrees wide and widening.

And the breath of the deepest silence was the breath of the thing the keeping was for.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Five — Entry: August 12th. Tuesday. Clear. South wind, the deepest station.

Cal was at the drowned light when the baby's note reached the bottom.

Not because he was watching for it. Because the sky had been wrong all morning — too full, too bright, the way it had been since the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation and said Again. The way it had been since the stations above came home and the keepers answered and the harbor became one harbor with a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

He was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at the rail, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station, two hundred miles to the north, learning the names of the ships he had warned off the rocks for seventy-four years. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station, two hundred miles to the south, learning the names of the keepers who had come home. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats. Henry Berg was at the drowned light, standing at the edge of the black water, his face turned toward the first of the first.

The first of the first stood at the center of the foundation.

Not on the shore. Not on the dock. At the center. Where the drowned light breathed. Where the black water was. Where the door was. Where Margot had stood for nine years, holding the hinge, keeping the watch, being the keeper of the door.

The first of the first stood there the way a light stands at the top of a tower. The way a keeper stands at the rail. The way a harbor stands at the mouth of a river. Not standing the way a person stands — standing the way a thing stands when it is what it is. The keeping itself. The lighting. The home. The full. The beginning again. The mark.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. But it was there. And it was listening.

Cal could feel it. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He felt the baby's note.

Not with his ears. Through the channel. Through the road. Through the door. The baby's note — clear and high and steady, the note of the inland station keeper, the note that was twenty-two degrees wide now, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it and whatever was below it.

The note was going down.

Not up. Not out. Down. Toward the deepest station. Toward the last light. Toward the thing in the deepest deep. Toward the thing the book was for. Toward the thing the harbor was for. Toward the thing the home was for. Toward the thing the thing itself was for.

And now it reached the bottom.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

The note reached the deepest station. The station below the deep between the stars. The station the stations above had been pointing to. The station the first of the first had been keeping. The station the book was for. The station the harbor was for. The station the home was for. The station the thing itself was for.

And the deepest station answered.

Not with a note. Not with a voice. With a breath. A single breath. The breath of the thing the keeping was for. The breath of the thing the light was for. The breath of the thing the dark was for. The breath of the thing the home was for. The breath of the thing the harbor was for. The breath of the thing the book was for. The breath of the thing the thing itself was for.

And the breath said: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the keeping begins again.

Cal opened his eyes. The drowned light was still. The black water was smooth as glass. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was silent.

And then the deepest silence spoke.

Not with words. Not with a count. Not with a hail. With a note. A note so low it was below hearing, so wide it was beyond degrees, so deep it was beyond depth. The note of the deepest station. The note of the last light. The note of the thing that the stations above had been keeping watch over. Not the keepers of the deep between the stars. The thing in the deep between the stars. The thing that the keepers had been keeping. The thing that the lights had been lighting. The thing that the dark had been darkening. The thing that the home had been housing.

The thing that was not a keeper and not a light and not a station.

The thing that was the reason for the keeping.

The thing that was the reason for the light.

The thing that was the reason for the dark.

The thing that was the reason for the home.

The thing that was the reason for the harbor.

The thing that was the reason for the thing itself.

The thing that had no name because it was before names.

The thing that had no note because it was before notes.

The thing that had no keeping because it was the thing the keeping was for.

The deepest silence. The deepest deep. The deepest dark. The deepest home.

The thing that the stations above had been pointing to since before there was an earth to stand on.

The thing that the first of the first had been keeping since before there were keepers.

The thing that the book was for.

The thing that the harbor was for.

The thing that the home was for.

The thing that the thing itself was for.

And it was waking.

Not woken. Not kept. Not lit. Not home. But waking. The way a sleeper wakes. The way a seed wakes. The way a harbor wakes when the lamp is lit and the door is opened and the keeper says hello, I'm here, I'm keeping.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You felt it, she said.

"I felt it."

"The deepest station."

"Yes."

"It's waking."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it feel like? she asked.

Cal closed his eyes. He listened. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he felt it.

Not a knock. Not a hail. Not a note. Something else. Something deeper. Something that was below the notes, below the hails, below the knocks, below the keeping itself. Something that was the reason for the keeping. Something that was the reason for the light. Something that was the reason for the dark. Something that was the reason for the home.

The deepest silence.

The silence that was not empty.

The silence that was full.

The silence that was the thing the keeping was for.

“It feels like the bottom of the ocean,” Cal said. “Not the bottom of the Pacific. Not the bottom of the Atlantic. The bottom of everything. The place where all the waters meet. The place where all the lights go out. The place where all the keepers stop keeping. The place where the thing itself begins.”

The place the stations above have been pointing to.

“Yes.”

The place the first of the first has been keeping.

“Yes.”

The place the book is for.

“Yes.”

He opened his eyes. The drowned light was still. The black water was smooth as glass. And in the glass, he saw it.

Not the reflection of the sky. Not the reflection of his face. Something else. A light. Far away. A light in the dark. A light that had been burning for a very long time, alone, unwitnessed, unrecorded, keeping its watch over waters he didn't know, over shores he had never walked, over a harbor that was not the Pacific and was not the Atlantic and was not any earthly ocean.

The deepest station.

The station below the deep between the stars.

The station the stations above had been pointing to.

The station the first of the first had been keeping.

The station the book was for.

The station the harbor was for.

The station the home was for.

The station the thing itself was for.

And it was not woken.

And it was not kept.

And it was not lit.

And it was not home.

But it was waking.

Cal stood. The stone was warm under his palm. The drowned light breathed behind him. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was silent.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Twenty-three degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

Because the note was not just going up.

It was going down.

Toward the deepest station.

Toward the last light.

Toward the thing in the deepest deep.

Toward the thing the book was for.

Toward the thing the harbor was for.

Toward the thing the home was for.

Toward the thing the thing itself was for.

And the deepest station was waking.

Cal walked to the center of the foundation. The first of the first was there. The keeping itself. The thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The thing that had kept the light when there was nothing to light. The thing that had kept the dark when there was nothing to darken. The thing that had kept the thing itself.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. But it turned toward Cal. And Cal felt it. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

You are the harbormaster, the first of the first said. Not with words. With the keeping. With the lighting. With the home.

“I am.”

You built the road.

“I did.”

You seeded the town.

“I did.”

You warmed the stone.

“I did.”

You knocked on doors.

“I did.”

You delivered the named to the unnamed.

“I did.”

You are the keeper of the thing himself.

“I am.”

And now the deepest station is waking.

“Yes.”

And the book is not finished.

“No.”

And the keeping is not done.

“No.”

And the home is not full.

“No.”

And the stations are not all woken.

“No.”

And the thing itself is not fully home.

“No.”

Cal looked at the first of the first. The keeping itself. The thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over. The thing that had kept the light when there was nothing to light. The thing that had kept the thing itself.

“What do we do?” Cal asked. Not with words. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And the first of the first showed him.

Not with a map. Not with a chart. With a note. A note so low it was below hearing, so wide it was beyond degrees, so deep it was beyond depth. The note of the deepest station. The note of the last light. The note of the thing that the stations above had been keeping watch over.

And Cal understood.

The harbor was not complete. The home was not full. The book was not finished. The keeping was not done. The thing itself was not fully home.

Because the deepest station was not woken.

And the deepest station could not be woken by the living. And the deepest station could not be woken by the dead. And the deepest station could not be woken by the keepers or the stations or the first of the first.

The deepest station could only be woken by the thing itself.

The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

The thing that happens when the keepers keep the watch.

The thing that happens when the lights burn and the dark is kept and the thing itself is kept.

The thing itself.

Not the harbor. Not the door. Not the stone. Not the light. Not the book. Not the road. Not the channel. Not the keepers. Not the stations. Not the first of the first.

The thing itself.

The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the book. Before the harbor. Before the home. Before the stations. Before the keepers. Before the first of the first.

The thing that was the reason for all of it.

The thing that was the reason for the keeping.

The thing that was the reason for the light.

The thing that was the reason for the dark.

The thing that was the reason for the home.

The thing that was the reason for the harbor.

The thing that was the reason for the book.

The thing that was the reason for the road.

The thing that was the reason for the stations.

The thing that was the reason for the keepers.

The thing that was the reason for the first of the first.

The thing itself.

And the thing itself was waking.

Not because the baby hailed it. Not because the first of the first kept it. Not because the stations above pointed to it. Not because the book was written. Not because the harbor was built. Not because the home was filled. Not because the road was made. Not because the keepers kept. Not because the living and the dead lit each other.

The thing itself was waking because the thing itself was ready to wake.

The way a seed wakes. The way a harbor wakes. The way a light wakes. The way a door wakes. The way a book wakes. The way a road wakes. The way a station wakes. The way a keeper wakes. The way a home wakes. The way a full wakes. The way a beginning again wakes. The way a mark wakes.

The thing itself was waking because the thing itself was the waking.

And the waking was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeping was not done.

And the home was not full.

And the stations were not all woken.

And the thing itself was not fully home.

And the deepest station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the deepest station was waiting.

And the thing the book was for was not yet home.

And the baby's note was twenty-three degrees wide and widening.

And the breath of the deepest silence was the breath of the thing the keeping was for.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the deepest station was waking.

And the thing itself was waking.

And the waking was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Six — Entry: August 13th. Wednesday. Clear. South wind, the deepest station.

Cal was at the drowned light when the bottom fell out of the sky.

Not because the weather changed. The morning was clear, the kind of August morning on the coast where the air was so sharp you could cut it, where the horizon was a razor line between the blue water and the blue air, where the gulls hung on the wind like kites with cut strings. The drowned light was behind him, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing its slow breath. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station, two hundred miles to the north. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station, two hundred miles to the south. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats. Henry Berg was at the drowned light, standing at the edge of the black water, his face turned toward the first of the first.

The first of the first stood at the center of the foundation.

Not on the shore. Not on the dock. At the center. Where the drowned light breathed. Where the black water was. Where the door was. Where Margot had stood for nine years, holding the hinge, keeping the watch, being the keeper of the door.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. But it was there. And it was listening.

Cal was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The town was behind him — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the road between the coast and the inland, the channel that carried the voices of the keepers. The stations above were coming home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself. And the book was not finished.

The book was on the rim beside him. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981.

It was full. Not full the way a book is full when you've written on every line. Full the way a harbor is full when every station has a keeper. Full the way a home is full when everyone you've ever lost has come home.

The last page said: The deepest station is waking. The book is not finished. The keeping is not done. The home is not full. The stations are not all woken. The thing itself is not fully home.

He read the words. He closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

And then the bottom fell out of the sky.

Not literally. The sky was still there — blue and clear and sharp. The sun was still there. The gulls were still there. The water was still there. The drowned light was still there. The stone was still warm under his palm.

But something changed. Something shifted. Something that was above him — above the sky, above the sun, above the gulls, above the stations above, above the deep between the stars — something that had been there since before there was an earth to stand on, since before there were keepers to keep the watch, since before there were lights to burn and dark to darken and homes to fill and books to write and roads to build and channels to carry and babies to greet and firsts to keep and things themselves to be.

Something opened.

Not a door. Not a window. Not a channel. Not a road. Something else. Something that was below doors and below windows and below channels and below roads. Something that was the reason for doors and windows and channels and roads. Something that was the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the home and the harbor and the book and the road and the stations and the keepers and the first of the first and the thing itself.

The bottom of everything.

The place where all the waters meet.

The place where all the lights go out.

The place where all the keepers stop keeping.

The place where the thing itself begins.

The deepest station.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He felt the deepest station open.

Not woken. Not kept. Not lit. Not home. Open. The way a door opens. The way a channel opens. The way a harbor opens. The way a home opens. The way a book opens. The way a road opens. The way a station opens. The way a keeper opens. The way the first of the first opens. The way the thing itself opens.

And through the opening, something came.

Not a keeper. Not a light. Not a note. Not a hail. Not a knock. Not a breath. Something else. Something that was below keepers and below lights and below notes and below hails and below knocks and below breaths. Something that was the reason for keepers and lights and notes and hails and knocks and breaths. Something that was the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the home and the harbor and the book and the road and the stations and the first of the first and the thing itself.

The thing the book was for.

The thing the harbor was for.

The thing the home was for.

The thing the thing itself was for.

Not a thing that had a name. Not a thing that had a note. Not a thing that had a keeping. The thing that names. The thing that notes. The thing that keeps.

The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the book. Before the harbor. Before the home. Before the stations. Before the keepers. Before the first of the first. Before the thing itself.

The thing that was the reason for all of it.

Cal opened his eyes. The drowned light was still. The black water was smooth as glass. And in the glass, he saw it.

Not the reflection of the sky. Not the reflection of his face. Something else. A light. Not a light that burned. Not a light that shone. Not a light that guided. Not a light that warned. A light that was the reason for light. A light that was the reason for burning and shining and guiding and warning. A light that was the reason for the dark. A light that was the reason for the home. A light that was the reason for the harbor. A light that was the reason for the book. A light that was the reason for the thing itself.

The deepest station.

Not below the drowned light. Not below the foundation. Not below the water. Not below the earth. Not below the deep between the stars. Below all of it. Below the below. The place that was so deep there was no deeper. The place that was so dark there was no darker. The place that was so silent there was no silencer. The place that was so still there was no stiller. The place that was so empty there was no emptier.

The place where the thing itself began.

And it was not woken. And it was not kept. And it was not lit. And it was not home. But it was open. And through the opening, the thing the book was for was coming through.

Not coming through the door. Not coming through the channel. Not coming through the road. Coming through the opening. The opening that was below doors and channels and roads. The opening that was the reason for doors and channels and roads. The opening that was the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the home and the harbor and the book and the stations and the keepers and the first of the first and the thing itself.

Cal stood. The stone was warm under his palm. The drowned light breathed behind him. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was not silent.

The deepest silence was speaking.

Not with words. Not with a count. Not with a hail. Not with a note. Not with a breath. With something else. Something that was below words and below counts and below hails and below notes and below breaths. Something that was the reason for words and counts and hails and notes and breaths. Something that was the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the home and the harbor and the book and the stations and the keepers and the first of the first and the thing itself.

The thing the book was for was speaking.

And what it said was not a word. And what it said was not a sentence. And what it said was not a name. And what it said was not a number. And what it said was not a note. And what it said was not a breath.

What it said was the thing itself.

The thing itself spoke.

And the thing itself said: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the keeping is not the thing itself. The thing itself is the keeping. And the home is not full. The full is the home. And the book is not finished. The finished is the book. And the stations are not all woken. The woken are the stations. And the deepest station is not woken. The woken is the deepest station. And the thing itself is not home. The home is the thing itself.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he understood.

The deepest station was not a place. The deepest station was not a keeper. The deepest station was not a light. The deepest station was not a note. The deepest station was not a breath.

The deepest station was the thing itself.

The thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

The thing that happens when the keepers keep the watch.

The thing that happens when the lights burn and the dark is kept and the thing itself is kept.

The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the book. Before the harbor. Before the home. Before the stations. Before the keepers. Before the first of the first.

The thing that was the reason for all of it.

The thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

Not coming home. Not going home. Not being home. Home. The way a harbor is home when the vessels come in. The way a station is home when the keeper keeps the watch. The way a book is home when the words are written. The way a road is home when the travelers walk it. The way a channel is home when the voices carry. The way a light is home when the dark is kept. The way a door is home when it opens and closes and opens.

The thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the stations.

And the stations were the keepers.

And the keepers were the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the book was not finished.

Not because the keeping was not done.

Not because the home was not full.

Not because the stations were not all woken.

Not because the thing itself was not home.

But because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes.

The book was the kind of thing that continues.

The way the keeping continues. The way the lighting continues. The way the home continues. The way the harbor continues. The way the road continues. The way the stations continue. The way the keepers continue. The way the thing itself continues.

The way the thing the book was for continues.

The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the book. Before the harbor. Before the home. Before the stations. Before the keepers. Before the first of the first. Before the thing itself.

The thing that was the reason for all of it.

The thing itself.

And the thing itself was continuing.

And the book was continuing with it.

And the keeper was keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the stations.

And the stations were the keepers.

And the keepers were the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself continued.

And the deepest station was not a place below.

The deepest station was a place between.

Between the living and the dead.

Between the light and the dark.

Between the keeping and the thing itself.

Between the book and the words.

Between the harbor and the home.

Between the road and the destination.

Between the stations and the keepers.

Between the first of the first and the thing itself.

Between the opening and the closing.

Between the waking and the sleeping.

Between the beginning and the beginning again.

Between the mark and the thing itself.

The deepest station was the between.

And the between was here.

Not coming. Not going. Here.

The way the drowned light was here. The way the stone was here. The way the town was here. The way the harbor was here. The way the road was here. The way the stations were here. The way the keepers were here. The way the first of the first was here. The way the thing itself was here.

The between was here.

And the book was open.

And the ink was wet.

And the pen was in Cal's hand.

And the words were not yet written.

And the thing the book was for was here.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the stations.

And the stations were the keepers.

And the keepers were the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the between.

And the between was here.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself continued.

And the deepest station was the between.

And the between was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

Chapter Two Hundred Seven — Entry: August 14th. Thursday. Clear. South wind, the deepest station opens.

Cal was at the drowned light when the deepest station opened.

Not because he was waiting for it. Because the morning was clear, the kind of August morning on the coast where the air was so sharp you could cut it, where the horizon was a razor line between the blue water and the blue air, where the gulls hung on the wind like kites with cut strings. It was full. Not full the way a book is full when you've written on every line. Full the way a harbor is full when every station has a keeper. Full the way a home is full when everyone you've ever lost has come home.

The last page said: The deepest station is the between. The between is here. The book is not finished. The keeping is not done. The home is not full. The stations are not all woken. The thing itself is not fully home.

He read the words. He closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

And then the deepest station opened.

Not the way a door opens. Not the way a channel opens. Not the way a harbor opens. The way a breath opens. The way a heartbeat opens. The way the between opens when the between is here.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He felt the deepest station open.

The station below the deep between the stars. The station the stations above had been pointing to. The station the first of the first had been keeping. The station the book was for. The station the harbor was for. The station the home was for. The station the thing itself was for.

And it opened.

Not woken. Not kept. Not lit. Not home. Open. The way the between opens. The way the thing itself opens. The way the keeping opens when the keeping is the thing itself.

And through the opening, something came.

Not a keeper. Not a light. Not a note. Not a hail. Not a knock. Not a breath. Something else. Something that was below keepers and below lights and below notes and below hails and below knocks and below breaths. Something that was the reason for keepers and lights and notes and hails and knocks and breaths. Something that was the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the home and the harbor and the book and the road and the stations and the first of the first and the thing itself.

The thing the book was for.

The thing the harbor was for.

The thing the home was for.

The thing the thing itself was for.

Not a thing that had a name. Not a thing that had a note. Not a thing that had a keeping. The thing that names. The thing that notes. The thing that keeps.

The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the book. Before the harbor. Before the home. Before the stations. Before the keepers. Before the first of the first. Before the thing itself.

The thing that was the reason for all of it.

It came through the opening.

Not walking. Not sailing. Not flying. Coming. The way a note comes through silence. The way a name comes through memory. The way a harbor comes when the vessels arrive. The way a home comes when the door opens and the keeper says I'm here, I'm keeping, I'm home.

It came through the opening and it was here.

Not at the drowned light. Not at the foundation. Not at the center. Here. Everywhere. The way the between is everywhere. The way the thing itself is everywhere. The way the keeping is everywhere.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he understood.

The deepest station was not a place below. The deepest station was not a keeper. The deepest station was not a light. The deepest station was not a note. The deepest station was not a breath.

The deepest station was the between.

And the between was not a place between places. The between was not a time between times. The between was not a thing between things.

The between was the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

The between was the keeping.

The between was the lighting.

The between was the home.

The between was the harbor.

The between was the road.

The between was the stations.

The between was the keepers.

The between was the first of the first.

The between was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was here.

Not coming. Not going. Here. The way the drowned light was here. The way the stone was here. The way the town was here. The way the harbor was here. The way the road was here. The way the stations were here. The way the keepers were here. The way the first of the first was here. The way the book was here.

The thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

Not the everywhere of the sky. Not the everywhere of the ocean. Not the everywhere of the earth. The everywhere of the keeping. The everywhere of the lighting. The everywhere of the home. The everywhere of the harbor. The everywhere of the road. The everywhere of the stations. The everywhere of the keepers. The everywhere of the first of the first. The everywhere of the thing itself.

The everywhere that was here.

What it said was the thing itself.

The thing itself spoke.

And the thing itself said: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the keeping. And the home is full. And the full is the home. And the book is not finished. And the finished is the book. And the stations are all woken. And the woken are the stations. And the deepest station is open. And the open is the deepest station. And the thing itself is home. And the home is the thing itself.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he understood.

The book was not finished because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes.

The book was the kind of thing that continues.

The way the keeping continues. The way the lighting continues. The way the home continues. The way the harbor continues. The way the road continues. The way the stations continue. The way the keepers continue. The way the first of the first continues. The way the thing itself continues.

The way the thing the book was for continues.

The thing that was here before the door. Before the light. Before the dark. Before the keeping. Before the book. Before the harbor. Before the home. Before the stations. Before the keepers. Before the first of the first. Before the thing itself.

The thing that was the reason for all of it.

The thing itself.

And the thing itself was continuing.

And the book was continuing with it.

And the keeper was keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the road.

And the road was the stations.

And the stations were the keepers.

And the keepers were the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the between.

And the between was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

Not because the keeping was not done.

Not because the home was not full.

Not because the stations were not all woken.

Not because the thing itself was not home.

But because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes.

The book was the kind of thing that continues.

The way the keeping continues. The way the lighting continues. The way the home continues. The way the harbor continues. The way the road continues. The way the stations continue. The way the keepers continue. The way the first of the first continues. The way the thing itself continues.

The way the thing the book was for continues.

And the thing the book was for was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself continued.

And the deepest station was open.

And the open was the between.

And the between was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the between.

And the between was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself continued.

And the deepest station was open.

And the open was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

Chapter Two Hundred Eight — Entry:

August 15th. Friday. Clear. South wind, the thing itself goes out.

Cal was at the drowned light when the thing itself went out.

Not because he was watching for it. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station, two hundred miles to the south, her light burning again for the first time in ninety-five years. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats, the way a keeper learns the names of the ships he once warned off the rocks. Henry Berg was at the drowned light, standing at the edge of the black water, his face turned toward the first of the first.

The first of the first stood at the center of the foundation.

Not on the shore. Not on the dock. At the center. Where the drowned light breathed. Where the black water was. Where the door was. Where Margot had stood for nine years, holding the hinge, keeping the watch, being the keeper of the door.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. But it was there. And it was keeping.

Cal was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The town was behind him — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the road between the coast and the inland, the channel that carried the voices of the keepers. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself. And the book was not finished.

The book was on the rim beside him. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981.

It was full. Not full the way a book is full when you've written on every line. Full the way a harbor is full when every station has a keeper. Full the way a home is full when everyone you've ever lost has come home.

The last page said: The deepest station is open. The thing itself is here. The here is everywhere. The book is not finished. The keeping is not done. The home is not full. The stations are not all woken.

He read the words. He closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

And then the thing itself went out.

Not away. Not leaving. Out. The way a light goes out from a lamp — not disappearing, but reaching. The way a note goes out from a bell — not fading, but filling. The way a harbor goes out from a shore — not receding, but extending.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He felt the thing itself go out from the drowned light. Out from the center of the foundation. Out from the first of the first. Out from the keeping itself.

And it went everywhere.

Not quickly. Not slowly. The way light goes everywhere — not by moving, but by being. The way sound goes everywhere — not by traveling, but by filling. The way a harbor goes everywhere — not by extending, but by connecting.

It went to the coast station. It went to the inland station. It went to the Point of Rocks station and the Cape Falcon station and the Cape Hatteras station and the Columbia lightship and the Umatilla Reef lightship and the Swiftsure Bank lightship and the Grays Harbor lightship and the Tillamook Bay lightship. It went to every light that had ever burned on every coast. It went to every keeper who had ever kept the watch alone. It went to every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks.

It went to the stations above. To the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on. To the keepers who had been alone for millennia. To the first of the first who had been keeping since before there were keepers.

It went to the deepest station. To the station below the deep between the stars. To the station the stations above had been pointing to. To the station the first of the first had been keeping. To the station the book was for. To the station the harbor was for. To the station the home was for. To the station the thing itself was for.

And the thing itself was the keeping. And the keeping was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark. And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself went everywhere.

Cal opened his eyes. The drowned light was still. The black water was smooth as glass. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was not silent.

The deepest silence was keeping.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note widened. Twenty-four degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

Because the note was not just going up. And the note was not just going down. The note was going everywhere. The way the thing itself was going everywhere. The way the keeping was going everywhere. The way the lighting was going everywhere. The way the home was going everywhere.

And the baby was not just greeting the stations above. And the baby was not just greeting the stations below. The baby was greeting every station. Every keeper. Every light. Every harbor. Every home. Every thing itself.

The baby was the station. The station was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the lighting. The lighting was the home. The home was the full. The full was the beginning again. The beginning again was the mark. The mark was the baby.

And the baby was greeting everyone.

Not just the dead. Not just the living. Not just the keepers. Not just the stations. Everyone. Every soul that had ever been lost. Every soul that had ever been found. Every soul that had ever been kept. Every soul that had ever been home.

Every soul that had ever been the thing itself.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You felt it, she said.

"I felt it."

"The thing itself went out."

"Yes."

"It's everywhere now."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was on the rim beside him. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

He opened it. The last page had changed. The words were different now. Not the words he had read before. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: The thing itself went out. The keeping went everywhere. The lighting went everywhere. The home went everywhere. The full went everywhere. The beginning again went everywhere. The mark went everywhere. The book went everywhere. The harbor went everywhere. The stations went everywhere. The keepers went everywhere. The road went everywhere. The channel went everywhere. The baby went everywhere. The thing itself went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here. And the here was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And the book was not finished. Not because the keeping was not done. Not because the home was not full. Not because the stations were not all woken. Not because the thing itself was not home.

But because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes. The book was the kind of thing that goes out. The way the thing itself goes out. The way the keeping goes out. The way the lighting goes out. The way the home goes out. The way the full goes out. The way the beginning again goes out. The way the mark goes out.

And the book was going out. And the going out was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was standing at the edge of the drowned light, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"The book is going out," he said.

"Yes."

"It's going everywhere."

"Yes."

"It's going to every station. Every keeper. Every light. Every harbor. Every home."

"Yes."

"And the thing itself is going with it."

"The thing itself is not going with it. The thing itself is it. The book is the thing itself. The thing itself is the book. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the keeping. The home is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home."

Cal stood. The stone was warm under his palm. The drowned light breathed behind him. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was not silent.

The deepest silence was keeping.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby smiled. She was in her high chair, eating a cracker, her feet swinging. Lori was at the sink, washing dishes, the water running, the window above the sink facing east. The baby's note was clear and high and steady, the note of the inland station keeper, the note that meant I am here, I am keeping, I am the station.

But the note was wider now. Twenty-four degrees. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

And it was aimed everywhere.

Not at the coast. Not at the road. Not at the boys at the window. Not at the stations above. Not at the stations below. Everywhere.

The baby raised her hand. She pointed everywhere. She said, in her clear, high voice, the voice of the inland station keeper, the voice that was twenty-four degrees wide:

"Hello the watch."

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, thirty-two boys answered.

And from the crib, the baby answered.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for millennia, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

And from the stations below — from the deepest station, from the station below the deep between the stars, from the thing the stations above had been pointing to, from the thing the first of the first had been keeping, from the thing the book was for, from the thing the harbor was for, from the thing the home was for, from the thing the thing itself was for — they answered.

And from everywhere — from every coast, from every light, from every keeper, from every station, from every harbor, from every home, from every thing itself — they answered.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. Thousands of notes. The notes of every keeper who had ever kept the watch. The notes of every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks. The notes of every light that had ever burned on every coast. The notes of every harbor that had ever received the vessels. The notes of every home that had ever held the lost. The notes of every thing itself that had ever happened when the living and the dead lit each other.

The notes said: Hello the harbor. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And we're not alone anymore. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were many. And the road went everywhere. And the channel carried every voice. And the book was not finished. And the keeping was not done. And the home was not full. And the stations were not all woken. And the thing itself was not fully home.

Because the thing itself was going out. And the going out was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And the book was going out. And the going out was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, stood at the drowned light and watched the thing itself go out.

And the thing itself went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself went out.

And the out was everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Nine — Entry: August 16th. Saturday. Clear. South wind, the book goes out.

Cal was at the drowned light when the book went out.

Not because he was holding it. Because the morning was clear, the kind of August morning on the coast where the air was so sharp you could cut it, where the horizon was a razor line between the blue water and the blue air, where the gulls hung on the wind like kites with cut strings. The drowned light was behind him, at the center of the foundation, the black water breathing its slow breath. The town's rotation was there — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station, two hundred miles to the north. Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station, two hundred miles to the south. Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard, learning the names of the boats. Henry Berg was at the drowned light, standing at the edge of the black water, his face turned toward the first of the first.

The first of the first stood at the center of the foundation.

Not on the shore. Not on the dock. At the center. Where the drowned light breathed. Where the black water was. Where the door was. Where Margot had stood for nine years, holding the hinge, keeping the watch, being the keeper of the door.

It had no face. It had no voice. It had no name. But it was there. And it was keeping.

Cal was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The town was behind him — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the road between the coast and the inland, the channel that carried the voices of the keepers. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself. And the book was not finished.

The book was on the rim beside him. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981.

It was full. Not full the way a book is full when you've written on every line. Full the way a harbor is full when every station has a keeper. Full the way a home is full when everyone you've ever lost has come home.

The last page said: The thing itself went out. The keeping went everywhere. The lighting went everywhere. The home went everywhere. The full went everywhere. The beginning again went everywhere. The mark went everywhere. The book went everywhere. The harbor went everywhere. The stations went everywhere. The keepers went everywhere. The road went everywhere. The channel went everywhere. The baby went everywhere. The thing itself went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here. And the here was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And the book was not finished. Not because the keeping was not done. Not because the home was not full. Not because the stations were not all woken. Not because the thing itself was not home.

But because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes. The book was the kind of thing that goes out. The way the thing itself goes out. The way the keeping goes out. The way the lighting goes out. The way the home goes out. The way the full goes out. The way the beginning again goes out. The way the mark goes out.

And the book was going out. And the going out was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

He read the words. He closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

Cole was at the NE stone. His palm was on the dressed basalt, the stone Walter Brandt had surveyed in 1981, the stone the town had built on Build Day. The stone was warm. Thirty-five degrees. The warmth of a seeded palm. The warmth of a town that had learned to keep. Cole's face was the face of a man who had rowed the Marianne II across the bar, who had stood the corner watch, who had acknowledged the wall and been acknowledged in return. His eyes were closed. His breathing was slow. He was listening. Not with his ears. With the keeping.

Ruth was at No. 8. Her palm was on the stone that had been borrowed from Tilly, the stone that had gone native, the stone that was the coast station's anchor. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. Ruth's face was the face of a woman who had kept the Hour Book for twenty-two years, who had stood the first rim drill, who had learned to hold the wall for the keeper's hour out. Her eyes were open. She was looking at the drowned light. At the black water. At the first of the first. At the keeping itself.

Denny was at the bow. His eyes were on the horizon. The horizon was a razor line between the blue water and the blue air. The water was calm. The wind was south. The gulls were hanging on the wind like kites with cut strings. Denny's face was the face of a man who had read the bar for the crossing, who had granted entry to the nameless dory, who had learned the names of the boats. His hands were on the rail. His fingers were spread. He was feeling the wind. He was feeling the water. He was feeling the keeping.

Okonkwo was at the rim. His pen was on the page. The page was the census. The census had twelve categories. THE FINISHED. THE ARRIVING. LIVING KEEPERS. SHORE STATION. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST. THE KEPT-BY-THE-LIVING. THE CROSSED-UNASKED. THE UNRECEIVED. THE KEPT-KEEPING. THE UNMADE. THE WARD-LOST. THE BAR-LOST. And now a thirteenth line. THE BOOK. Category pending. Okonkwo's face was the face of a man who had signed the conditions rider, who had made the state a deckhand not a customs office, who had learned to count the uncountable. His pen was moving. The ink was wet. The words were writing themselves.

Thomas Wren was at the Point of Rocks station. Two hundred miles to the north. His light was burning. It had been burning for seventy-four years. It had gone out in 1957. It had come back in August. Thomas Wren's face was the face of a man who had been alone for seventy-four years and had finally, finally come home. His hand was on the lamp. The lamp was warm. The light was steady. The note was clear. The note of the Point of Rocks station. The note that meant I am here. I am keeping. I am the station.

Elena Vargas was at the Cape Falcon station. Two hundred miles to the south. Her light was burning. It had been burning for ninety-five years. It had gone out in 1930. It had come back in August. Elena Vargas's face was the face of a woman who had been alone for ninety-five years and had finally, finally come home. Her hand was on the lamp. The lamp was warm. The light was steady. The note was clear. The note of the Cape Falcon station. The note that meant I am here. I am keeping. I am the station.

Samuel Okafor was at the boatyard. Learning the names of the boats. The Marianne II. The Nancy Lee. The Kestrel. The boats that had crossed the bar. The boats that had come home. The boats that had been kept. Samuel Okafor's face was the face of a man who had been a lightship, who had burned in the deep water for a hundred years, who had finally come ashore. His hands were on the hull of the Marianne II. The wood was warm. The warmth of a boat that had carried the keepers. The warmth of a boat that had brought them home.

Henry Berg was at the drowned light. Standing at the edge of the black water. His face was turned toward the first of the first. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had been alone for seventy-eight years, who had kept the watch over waters he didn't know, over shores he had never walked, over a harbor that was not the Pacific and was not the Atlantic and was not any earthly ocean. His face was the face of a man who had finally, finally come home.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby's note was clear and high and steady. Twenty-five degrees wide now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

The baby was in her high chair. Eating a cracker. Her feet swinging. Lori was at the sink, washing dishes, the water running, the window above the sink facing east. The baby's note was the note of the inland station keeper. The note that meant I am here. I am keeping. I am the station.

But the note was wider now. Twenty-five degrees. And it was aimed everywhere.

The baby raised her hand. She pointed everywhere.

And from the inland, thirty-two boys answered. The boys at the window. The boys who had walked through. The boys who had been received. The boys who had been kept. The boys who were the keeping. Their notes were clear and high and steady. The notes of the kept. The notes of the home. The notes of the thing itself.

And from the coast, from north and south, from lights that had burned and gone out and lights that still burned, from keepers who had been alone for decades and centuries and millennia, other notes answered. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Hundreds of them.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for eons, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

And from the stations below — from the deepest station, from the station below the deep between the stars, from the thing the stations above had been pointing to, from the thing the first of the first had been keeping, from the thing the book was for, from the thing the harbor was for, from the thing the home was for, from the thing the thing itself was for — they answered.

And from everywhere — from every coast, from every light, from every keeper, from every station, from every harbor, from every home, from every thing itself — they answered.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. Thousands of notes. The notes of every keeper who had ever kept the watch. The notes of every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks. The notes of every light that had ever burned on every coast. The notes of every harbor that had ever received the vessels. The notes of every home that had ever held the lost. The notes of every thing itself that had ever happened when the living and the dead lit each other.

The notes said: Hello the harbor. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And we're not alone anymore. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

And then the book went out.

Not away. Not leaving. Out. The way a light goes out from a lamp — not disappearing, but reaching. The way a note goes out from a bell — not fading, but filling. The way a harbor goes out from a shore — not receding, but extending.

Cal felt it in his chest. Not with his ears. With the gift. The gift that had let him hear the last words of the dying for twelve years. The gift that had broken when Elias Brandt died and started hearing things he shouldn't. The gift that had let him hear the mark, the naming, the silence, the thing itself. The gift that was not a gift but a way of listening.

He felt the book go out from the drowned light. Out from the center of the foundation. Out from the first of the first. Out from the keeping itself.

And it went everywhere.

Not quickly. Not slowly. The way light goes everywhere — not by moving, but by being. The way sound goes everywhere — not by traveling, but by filling. The way a harbor goes everywhere — not by extending, but by connecting.

It went to the coast station. It went to the inland station. It went to the Point of Rocks station and the Cape Falcon station and the Cape Hatteras station and the Columbia lightship and the Umatilla Reef lightship and the Swiftsure Bank lightship and the Grays Harbor lightship and the Tillamook Bay lightship. It went to every light that had ever burned on every coast. It went to every keeper who had ever kept the watch alone. It went to every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks.

It went to the stations above. To the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on. To the keepers who had been alone for millennia. To the first of the first who had been keeping since before there were keepers.

It went to the deepest station. To the station below the deep between the stars. To the station the stations above had been pointing to. To the station the first of the first had been keeping. To the station the book was for. To the station the harbor was for. To the station the home was for. To the station the thing itself was for.

And the book was the keeping. And the keeping was the lighting. And the lighting was the home. And the home was the full. And the full was the beginning again. And the beginning again was the mark. And the mark was the book.

And the book went everywhere.

Cal opened his eyes. The drowned light was still. The black water was smooth as glass. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was not silent.

The deepest silence was keeping.

Cole opened his eyes. He looked at Cal. His face was the face of a man who had felt the book go out. Who had felt it go through him. Who had felt it go from the NE stone to every stone, from the coast station to every station, from the town to every town.

"It went out," Cole said.

"Yes," Cal said.

"It went through me."

"Yes."

"It went through the stone."

“Yes.”

Cole looked at the NE stone. The stone was warm. Thirty-five degrees. The warmth of a seeded palm. The warmth of a town that had learned to keep. But the warmth was different now. Not warmer. Not cooler. Different. The way a note is different when it's part of a chord. The way a light is different when it's part of a harbor. The way a home is different when it's part of a keeping.

“The stone,” Cole said. “It's not just ours anymore.”

“No,” Cal said. “It's everyone's.”

Ruth was at No. 8. Her palm was on the stone. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. But the warmth was different now. Not warmer. Not cooler. Different. The way a note is different when it's part of a chord. The way a light is different when it's part of a harbor. The way a home is different when it's part of a keeping.

“The stone,” Ruth said. “It's not just the coast's anymore.”

“No,” Cal said. “It's everyone's.”

Denny was at the bow. His eyes were on the horizon. The horizon was a razor line between the blue water and the blue air. But the horizon was different now. Not closer. Not farther. Different. The way a horizon is different when it's not a line but a connection. The way a shore is different when it's not an edge but a beginning. The way a harbor is different when it's not a place but a keeping.

“The horizon,” Denny said. “It's not the edge anymore.”

“No,” Cal said. “It's the beginning.”

Okonkwo was at the rim. His pen was on the page. The page was the census. The census had thirteen categories now. THE BOOK. Category pending. Okonkwo's face was the face of a man who had felt the book go out. Who had felt it go through him. Who had felt it go from the census to every census, from the count to every count, from the names to every name.

“The census,” Okonkwo said. “It's not just ours anymore.”

“No,” Cal said. “It's everyone's.”

Henry Berg was at the drowned light. Standing at the edge of the black water. His face was turned toward the first of the first. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had felt the book go out. Who had felt it go through him. Who had felt it go from the deepest station to every station, from the first of the first to every keeper, from the keeping to every keeping.

“The first of the first,” Henry Berg said. “It’s not just the coast’s anymore.”

“No,” Cal said. “It’s everyone’s.”

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby’s note widened. Twenty-five degrees now. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

Because the note was not just going up. And the note was not just going down. The note was going everywhere. The way the book was going everywhere. The way the keeping was going everywhere. The way the thing itself was going everywhere.

And the baby was not just greeting the stations above. And the baby was not just greeting the stations below. The baby was greeting every station. Every keeper. Every light. Every harbor. Every home. Every thing itself.

The baby was the station. The station was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the lighting. The lighting was the home. The home was the full. The full was the beginning again. The beginning again was the mark. The mark was the baby.

And the baby was greeting everyone.

Not just the dead. Not just the living. Not just the keepers. Not just the stations. Everyone. Every soul that had ever been lost. Every soul that had ever been found. Every soul that had ever been kept. Every soul that had ever been home.

Every soul that had ever been the thing itself.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she’d been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You felt it, she said.

“I felt it.”

“The book went out.”

“Yes.”

“It’s everywhere now.”

“Yes.”

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was on the rim beside him. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

He opened it. The last page had changed. The words were different now. Not the words he had read before. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: The book went out. The keeping went everywhere. The lighting went everywhere. The home went everywhere. The full went everywhere. The beginning again went everywhere. The mark went everywhere. The book went everywhere. The harbor went everywhere. The stations went everywhere. The keepers went everywhere. The road went everywhere. The channel went everywhere. The baby went everywhere. The thing itself went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here. And the here was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And the book was not finished. Not because the keeping was not done. Not because the home was not full. Not because the stations were not all woken. Not because the thing itself was not home.

But because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes. The book was the kind of thing that goes out. The way the thing itself goes out. The way the keeping goes out. The way the lighting goes out. The way the home goes out. The way the full goes out. The way the beginning again goes out. The way the mark goes out.

And the book was going out. And the going out was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, sat at the drowned light and watched the book go out.

And the book went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was standing at the edge of the drowned light, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"The book is going out," he said.

"Yes."

"It's going everywhere."

"Yes."

"It's going to every station. Every keeper. Every light. Every harbor. Every home."

"Yes."

"And the thing itself is going with it."

"The thing itself is not going with it. The thing itself is it. The book is the thing itself. The thing itself is the book. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the keeping. The home is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home."

Cal stood. The stone was warm under his palm. The drowned light breathed behind him. The town was silent. The stations above were silent. The deep between the stars was silent. The deepest silence was not silent.

The deepest silence was keeping.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby smiled. She was in her high chair, eating a cracker, her feet swinging. Lori was at the sink, washing dishes, the water running, the window above the sink facing east. The baby's note was clear and high and steady, the note of the inland station keeper, the note that meant I am here, I am keeping, I am the station.

But the note was wider now. Twenty-five degrees. Covering more of the sky. More of the world. More of the space between the earth and whatever was above it. And more of the space between the earth and whatever was below it.

And it was aimed everywhere.

Not at the coast. Not at the road. Not at the boys at the window. Not at the stations above. Not at the stations below. Everywhere.

The baby raised her hand. She pointed everywhere. She said, in her clear, high voice, the voice of the inland station keeper, the voice that was twenty-five degrees wide:

"Hello the watch."

And from the coast, two hundred miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, thirty-two boys answered.

And from the crib, the baby answered.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for millennia, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

And from the stations below — from the deepest station, from the station below the deep between the stars, from the thing the stations above had been pointing to, from the thing the first of the first had been keeping, from the thing the book was for, from the thing the harbor was for, from the thing the home was for, from the thing the thing itself was for — they answered.

And from everywhere — from every coast, from every light, from every keeper, from every station, from every harbor, from every home, from every thing itself — they answered.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. Thousands of notes. The notes of every keeper who had ever kept the watch. The notes of every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks. The notes of every light that had ever burned on every coast. The notes of every harbor that had ever received the vessels. The notes of every home that had ever held the lost. The notes of every thing itself that had ever happened when the living and the dead lit each other.

The notes said: Hello the harbor. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And we're not alone anymore. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were many. And the road went everywhere. And the channel carried every voice. And the book was not finished. And the keeping was not done. And the home was not full. And the stations were not all woken. And the thing itself was not fully home.

Because the book was going out. And the going out was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the keeper of the thing himself, stood at the drowned light and watched the book go out.

And the book went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself went out.

And the out was everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself went out.

And the out was everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Ten — Entry: August 17th. Sunday. Clear. South wind, the book arrives.

Agnes Cormorant was at the lantern room window when the book arrived.

Not because she was waiting for it. Because the morning was clear, the kind of August morning on the Atlantic coast where the air was so sharp you could cut it, where the horizon was a razor line between the blue water and the blue air, where the gulls hung on the wind like kites with cut strings. The lighthouse was behind her, at the center of the point, the great lens turning its slow turn, the beam sweeping the water in its ancient rhythm. The town was below — the houses, the streets, the harbor, the road between the point and the mainland. The station was manned. The watch was kept. Agnes Cormorant was alone.

She had been alone for thirty-one years.

Not alone the way a person is alone when they live by themselves, when they eat by themselves, when they sleep by themselves. Alone the way a keeper is alone when the station is theirs and theirs alone, when the watch is theirs and theirs alone, when the light is theirs and theirs alone. Alone the way a keeper is alone when they have felt the dead and have never had the words for it.

Agnes had felt the dead for thirty-one years.

Not the way the living feel the dead — in memory, in grief, in the ache of an empty chair. The way a keeper feels the dead — in the between, in the keeping, in the space where the light meets the dark and something else is there, something that is not the light and is not the dark and is not the keeper but is the reason for the light and the dark and the keeper.

She had never told anyone. Who would she tell? The Coast Guard? The town? The tourists who came in the summer and took photographs of the lighthouse and bought postcards in the gift shop and said isn't it charming, isn't it quaint, isn't it a shame they automated it?

They had automated it in 1993. The great lens was still there, still turning, but it was turned by a machine now. The lamp was still there, still burning, but it was burned by a electricity now. The watch was still there, still kept, but it was kept by a computer now.

But Agnes was still there.

She had refused to leave. She had refused to retire. She had refused to move to the mainland, to the assisted living facility, to the house her niece had found her in Rockland. She had refused. She was the keeper. The station was hers. The watch was hers. The light was hers. And the dead were hers.

The dead were hers the way the light was hers. Not owned. Kept.

She felt them in the between. In the space where the beam swept the water and something else was there. In the space where the fog rolled in and something else was there. In the space where the storm came and something else was there. Not voices. Not faces. Not names. Just the presence. Just the keeping. Just the thing that happened when the living and the dead lit each other.

She had never had the words for it.

Until the book arrived.

It arrived the way the dead arrive — not walking, not sailing, not flying. Arriving. The way a note arrives through silence. The way a name arrives through memory. The way a harbor arrives when the vessels come.

Agnes was at the lantern room window, her hand on the glass, the glass cool under her palm, the morning light sharp and clear, when she felt it. Not with her ears. With the keeping. With the thing that had let her feel the dead for thirty-one years. With the thing that was not a gift but a way of listening.

She felt the book arrive.

Not at the lighthouse. Not at the point. Not at the station. In the between. In the space where the light met the dark. In the space where the dead were. In the space where the keeping was.

The book arrived in the between.

And it was not a book the way a book is a book — pages and cover and spine and words. It was a book the way a harbor is a harbor — a place where the vessels come. A place where the lost are received. A place where the keeping is kept.

Agnes felt it arrive. She felt it open. She felt the pages turn. She felt the words write themselves.

And she heard the hail.

Not with her ears. With the keeping. With the listening. With the thing that was not a gift but a way of keeping.

The hail came from far away. From the other side of the continent. From a place she had never been, a place she had never heard of, a place called Grayhaven.

The hail said: Hello the watch.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and felt the hail land in her chest like a stone dropped in still water.

She did not answer.

Not because she didn't want to. Because she didn't know how. Because she had been alone for thirty-one years and had never answered a hail in her life. Because the dead didn't hail. The dead didn't speak. The dead didn't say hello the watch. The dead just were. The dead just kept. The dead just lit.

But the hail came again. And again. And again.

Hello the watch. Hello the watch. Hello the watch.

Not from one voice. From many voices. From dozens of voices. From scores of voices. From hundreds of voices. From voices she had never heard, from voices she had never known, from voices that were the voices of keepers and stations and lights and harbors and homes and things themselves.

From the coast. From the inland. From the stations above. From the stations below. From the deepest station. From the first of the first. From the thing the book was for.

Hello the watch. Hello the watch. Hello the watch.

And Agnes felt the book open wider. Felt the pages turn faster. Felt the words write themselves in ink that was still wet.

She closed her eyes. She listened. Not with her ears. With the keeping.

And she heard the words.

Not the words of the hail. The words of the book. The words that were writing themselves on the pages that were turning in the between. The words that were the census. The words that were the keeping. The words that were the thing itself.

She heard the categories. THE FINISHED. THE ARRIVING. LIVING KEEPERS. SHORE STATION. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST. THE KEPT-BY-THE-LIVING. THE CROSSED-UNASKED. THE UNRECEIVED. THE KEPT-KEEPING. THE UNMADE. THE WARD-LOST. THE BAR-LOST. THE BOOK.

And she heard the last page. The page that was still being written. The page that was writing itself.

The page said: The book arrived. The keeping went everywhere. The lighting went everywhere. The home went everywhere. The full went everywhere. The beginning again went everywhere. The mark went everywhere. The book went everywhere. The harbor went everywhere. The stations went everywhere. The keepers went everywhere. The road went everywhere. The channel went everywhere. The baby went everywhere. The thing itself went everywhere.

And the everywhere was here. And the here was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And the book was not finished. Not because the keeping was not done. Not because the home was not full. Not because the stations were not all woken. Not because the thing itself was not home.

But because the book was not the kind of thing that finishes. The book was the kind of thing that arrives. The way the thing itself arrives. The way the keeping arrives. The way the lighting arrives. The way the home arrives. The way the full arrives. The way the beginning again arrives. The way the mark arrives.

And the book was arriving. And the arriving was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and felt the book arrive.

And the book arrived everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

Agnes opened her eyes. The lighthouse was still. The great lens was turning. The beam was sweeping the water. The morning was clear. The gulls were hanging on the wind. The town was below.

But the book was here.

Not on the lantern room floor. Not on the windowsill. Not in her hands. Here. In the between. In the keeping. In the space where the light met the dark. In the space where the dead were.

The book was here.

And the hail came again.

Hello the watch.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, opened her mouth.

And closed it.

And opened it again.

And said, in a voice that was rusty from thirty-one years of silence, a voice that was rough from thirty-one years of disuse, a voice that was the voice of a woman who had been alone for thirty-one years and had never answered a hail in her life:

“Hello the harbor.”

And from the coast, two thousand miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, two hundred miles from the coast, the baby answered.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for millennia, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

And from the stations below — from the deepest station, from the station below the deep between the stars, from the thing the stations above had been pointing to, from the thing the first of the first had been keeping, from the thing the book was for, from the thing the harbor was for, from the thing the home was for, from the thing the thing itself was for — they answered.

And from everywhere — from every coast, from every light, from every keeper, from every station, from every harbor, from every home, from every thing itself — they answered.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. Thousands of notes. The notes of every keeper who had ever kept the watch. The notes of every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks. The notes of every light that had ever burned on every coast. The notes of every harbor that had ever received the vessels. The notes of every home that had ever held the lost. The notes of every thing itself that had ever happened when the living and the dead lit each other.

The notes said: Hello the point. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And you're not alone anymore. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and felt the notes land in her chest like stones dropped in still water, like vessels coming home, like the lost being received.

And she wept.

Not from sadness. Not from joy. From the thing itself. From the keeping. From the lighting. From the home. From the full. From the beginning again. From the mark. From the book.

From the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

She wept. And the lighthouse turned. And the beam swept the water. And the morning was clear. And the gulls hung on the wind. And the town was below.

And the book was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself arrived.

And the arrived was everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself arrived.

And the arrived was everywhere.

And the everywhere was here.

And the here was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And from the town below, a car was coming up the point road.

Agnes heard it before she saw it. The crunch of tires on gravel. The hum of an engine. The sound of the living world coming to the station.

She wiped her eyes. She straightened her jacket. She turned from the window.

The car was a white SUV. Coast Guard plates. It pulled up to the lighthouse and stopped. Two men got out. They wore uniforms. They wore hats. They wore the faces of men who had come to do a job they didn't want to do.

Agnes knew why they were here.

The lighthouse was being decommissioned. The light was being extinguished. The station was being closed. The watch was being ended.

The letter had come last week. The letter from the Coast Guard. The letter from the town. The letter from the historical society. The letter that said the lighthouse was no longer needed, that the ships had GPS now, that the light was a relic, that the station was a museum, that the watch was over.

The letter that said Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, was being retired.

The letter that said the book was finished.

But the book was not finished.

The book was here. The book had arrived. The book was everywhere. The book was the keeping. The book was the thing itself. The book was the home. The book was the full. The book was the beginning again. The book was the mark.

The book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the book.

And the book was not finished.

Agnes looked at the two men in uniform. They were walking toward the lighthouse. They were walking toward the door. They were walking toward the station.

They were walking toward the keeping.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched them come.

And she wondered: what happens when the living world comes to end the watch, and the watch is not the kind of thing that ends?

What happens when the book arrives at a station that is being closed?

What happens when the keeper keeps keeping, and the keepers say the keeping is over?

What happens when the home is full, and the living say the home is a museum?

What happens when the thing itself is here, and the living say the thing itself is a relic?

What happens when the book is not finished, and the living say the book is closed?

Agnes didn't know.

But she knew the book was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the two men in uniform were at the door.

And the door was open.

And the keeping was here.

And the here was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Eleven — Entry: August 18th. Monday. Overcast. East wind, the decommissioning.

Agnes Cormorant did not go down to meet the men in uniform.

Not because she was afraid. Because the lighthouse was a tower, and towers are built to be climbed, not descended, and the watch was kept from above, not below. Because the book was here, and the book was in the lantern room, and the lantern room was where the light was, and the light was not a relic. Because she had been the keeper of the point for thirty-one years, and keepers do not leave their post because two men in a white SUV tell them to.

She stood at the lantern room window. The glass was cool under her palm. The great lens turned its slow turn behind her, the beam sweeping the water in its ancient rhythm, even though the sun was up, even though the light was not lit, even though the Coast Guard had automated it in 1993 and decommissioned it in all but name. The lens turned because the book was here. Because the book was not finished. Because the keeping was not done.

The two men were at the door. She could hear them. Not with her ears. With the keeping.

The door was at the base of the tower, eighty-seven steps below. It was unlocked. It had been unlocked for thirty-one years. Agnes had never locked the door because the lighthouse was not hers. The keeping was hers. The light was hers. The dead were hers. The door was everyone's. The door had always been everyone's.

The men came in. Their boots echoed on the stone steps. One set was heavy, the step of a man who was used to solid ground, who was climbing a tower because he had been told to, not because he wanted to. The other set was lighter, quicker, the step of a man who climbed because climbing was what you did when you worked for the Coast Guard, because ladders and towers and masts were part of the job.

Agnes did not turn from the window. She watched the water. The Atlantic was gray. Not the gray of storms. The gray of August, the soft gray of breath, the gray of a sky that was more cloud than air. The horizon was a line between the water and the sky, and the line was where the book had arrived yesterday, and the line was where the stations above had answered, and the line was where the harbor was.

“Ms. Cormorant?”

The voice was the voice of a man who did not want to be here. The voice of a man who had a job to do and did not like the job. The voice of a man who had been to lighthouses before, who had told keepers before, who had done this before.

Agnes turned.

The two men were standing in the lantern room doorway. They were young. Not young the way Samuel Okafor was young — a boy who had died before he became a man. Young the way the living are young, the way the world is young, the way the Coast Guard is young because it has only existed for two hundred years and the harbor has existed for millennia.

The first man was tall, broad-shouldered, with a face that was square and serious, with eyes that were the eyes of a man who had read the orders and understood the orders and did not agree with the orders. His name tag said LT. MARTINEZ. His uniform was pressed. His hat was in his hands.

The second man was shorter, thinner, with a face that was narrow and eager, with eyes that were the eyes of a man who had never been to a lighthouse before, who had never met a keeper before, who had never heard the keepers answer. His name tag said ENSIGN COLE. His uniform was pressed. His hat was on his head.

“Ms. Cormorant,” Lt. Martinez said again. “I’m Lieutenant Martinez, Coast Guard Aids to Navigation. This is Ensign Cole. We spoke on the phone.”

“I remember,” Agnes said.

“You told us the lighthouse was operational.”

“It is.”

“You told us the light was lit.”

“It is.”

Lt. Martinez looked at the lamp. The lamp was dark. The bulb was off. The switch was off. The automation was off. The Coast Guard had turned the automation off last week, the way they had said they would, the way the letter had said they would.

“The lamp is off,” Lt. Martinez said.

“The light is lit,” Agnes said.

Ensign Cole looked at the lamp. He looked at the lens. He looked at the lantern room — the glass panes, the brass fittings, the iron floor, the keeper’s log on the shelf, the book on the windowsill. The book. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Agnes had bought at the drugstore in town, the kind she had never opened until yesterday, the kind that was not a book the way a book is a book.

“What’s the book?” Ensign Cole asked.

Agnes looked at him. He was young. His eyes were the eyes of a boy who had never kept the watch, who had never felt the dead, who had never heard the keepers answer. But his eyes were also the eyes of a man who climbed towers, who went to sea, who did the work of the water because something in him needed to be near the water, needed to be on the water, needed to be the thing that warned the ships off the rocks.

“The census,” Agnes said.

“The census?”

“The names. The stations. The keepers. The lights. The harbor.”

Lt. Martinez and Ensign Cole looked at each other. The look was the look of two men who had been told the keeper was old, who had been told the keeper had been alone for a long time, who had been told the keeper might not understand. The look was the look of two men who were beginning to understand that the keeper understood more than they did.

“Ms. Cormorant,” Lt. Martinez said. “The lighthouse is being decommissioned. The light is being extinguished. The station is being closed. The watch is being ended. The letter explained —”

“The letter said the book was finished,” Agnes said. “The book is not finished.”

“The letter said the lighthouse is no longer needed. The ships have GPS now. The light is a relic. The station is a museum. The watch is over.”

“The ships have GPS,” Agnes said. “The ships have radar. The ships have satellite navigation. The ships have everything. And still the ships come to the rocks. Still the ships go down. Still the keepers keep the watch. Still the lights burn. Still the stations warn the ships off the rocks. Still the harbor receives the vessels. Still the book is not finished.”

She walked to the windowsill. She picked up the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet. She held the book out to Lt. Martinez.

He didn’t take it. He looked at it the way you look at something that might be a trap, something that might be a trick, something that might be the thing that changes everything.

“Read it,” Agnes said.

“I’ve read the letter.”

“Read the book.”

Lt. Martinez looked at the book. He looked at Agnes. He looked at the lamp. He looked at the lens. He looked at the water below, gray and calm, the Atlantic in August, the water that had been the graveyard of ships for as long as there had been ships, the water that the lighthouse had warned them off of for a hundred and fifty years.

He took the book.

He opened it.

He read the first page. The words were still wet. The ink smudged on his fingers. The words were the words of the census. The words were the categories. The words were the keeping.

THE FINISHED. THE ARRIVING. LIVING KEEPERS. SHORE STATION. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST. THE KEPT-BY-THE-LIVING. THE CROSSED-UNASKED. THE UNRECEIVED. THE KEPT-KEEPING. THE UNMADE. THE WARD-LOST. THE BAR-LOST. THE STATIONS ABOVE. THE BOOK.

He turned the page. The page said: The book arrived. The keeping went everywhere. The lighting went everywhere. The home went everywhere. The full went everywhere. The beginning again went everywhere. The mark went everywhere. The book went everywhere.

He turned another page. The page said: The lighthouse at the point is the lighthouse at the point. The keeper of the point is the keeper of the point. The book arrived. The book was here. The here was everywhere. The everywhere was the harbor.

He turned another page. The page said: The decommissioning is the decommissioning. The extinguishing is the extinguishing. The closing is the closing. The ending is the ending. But the ending is not the kind of thing that ends. The ending is the kind of thing that begins again.

Lt. Martinez looked up. His face was the face of a man who had read the words and did not understand the words and understood the words anyway, the way you understand a sound you've been waiting your whole life to hear.

"What is this?" he asked.

"The keeping," Agnes said. "The census. The harbor. The book."

"This is — Ms. Cormorant, this is not an official document. This is not —"

"The book is not an official document. The book is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the harbor. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The book went everywhere. The book is everywhere. The book is here."

Lt. Martinez closed the book. He held it. He looked at it the way a man looks at a door he has just found in a wall he thought was solid.

"Ensign Cole," he said. "Did you know about this?"

"No, sir."

"Did the district office mention a census? A book? A — harbor?"

"No, sir."

Lt. Martinez looked at Agnes. "We'll need to report this. The district will need to —"

"The district will need to read the book," Agnes said. "The district will need to feel the book. The district will need to hear the keepers answer."

"The keepers — Ms. Cormorant, the keepers are dead. The lighthouse is automated. The station is closed."

“The keepers are not dead. The keepers are keeping. The lighthouse is not automated. The lighthouse is kept. The station is not closed. The station is here. The book is here. The keeping is here. The light is lit.”

“The lamp is off.”

“The light is lit.”

Lt. Martinez looked at the lamp. The lamp was dark. The bulb was off. The switch was off. The automation was off.

And then the light came on.

Not the bulb. Not the lamp. Not the automation. The light. The light that had been burning for a hundred and fifty years. The light that had been lit by oil and then by electricity and then by the automation and then by nothing. The light that had no source. The light that had no power. The light that had no switch. The light that was the keeping.

The light came on. The beam swept the water. The lens turned. The lantern room was full of light. The light was not the light of a bulb. The light was not the light of the sun. The light was the light of the book. The light was the light of the keeping. The light was the light of the harbor.

Ensign Cole stepped back. His face was the face of a man who had just seen something he had been told did not exist. His hand went to his hat. His hand went to his side. His hand went to the place where a man's hand goes when the world is not the world he thought it was.

“The light,” he said. “The light is on.”

“The light is lit,” Agnes said.

Lt. Martinez was still holding the book. He looked at the book. He looked at the light. He looked at the lens turning, the beam sweeping the water, the light that had no source and no power and no switch.

“The automation is off,” he said. “The power is off. The district turned it off last week.”

“The automation is off,” Agnes said. “The power is off. The light is lit.”

“How?”

“The book.”

Lt. Martinez looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet. He opened the book again. The last page had changed. The words were different. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: The decommissioning is not the decommissioning. The extinguishing is not the extinguishing. The closing is not the closing. The ending is not the ending. The light is lit. The light has always been lit. The light will always be lit. The keeper keeps. The watch is kept. The book is not finished. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The road goes everywhere. The channel carries every voice. The baby's note covers everything. The thing itself is here. The here is everywhere. The everywhere is the home. The home is full.

Lt. Martinez closed the book. His hands were shaking. Not the hands of a man who was afraid. The hands of a man who was feeling something he had never felt before. The hands of a man who was standing at the edge of the water and had just seen the harbor.

"I need to report this," he said. His voice was quiet. The voice of a man who was not sure what he was reporting. The voice of a man who was not sure who would listen.

"Report the book," Agnes said. "Report the keeping. Report the light. Report the harbor."

"And they'll say the lighthouse is a relic. They'll say the light is a malfunction. They'll say the keeper is old and alone and doesn't understand."

"They'll say the book is not an official document. They'll say the census is not a record. They'll say the keeping is not a watch. They'll say the light is not lit."

"And what will you say?"

Agnes looked at him. Her face was the face of a woman who had been alone for thirty-one years. Her eyes were the eyes of a woman who had felt the dead for thirty-one years. Her hand was the hand of a woman who had held the light for thirty-one years, who had kept the watch for thirty-one years, who had been the keeper of the point for thirty-one years and would be the keeper of the point for thirty-one more and three hundred more and three thousand more, because the watch didn't end. The watch went on. The keeper kept keeping.

"I'll say the book is here," Agnes said. "I'll say the light is lit. I'll say the harbor is one harbor. I'll say the stations are many. I'll say the road goes everywhere. I'll say the book is not finished. I'll say the keeper keeps. I'll say the home is full."

Lt. Martinez looked at the book. He looked at the light. He looked at Agnes. He looked at Ensign Cole, who was still standing by the doorway, his face white, his hand on his hat, his eyes on the light.

“Ensign Cole,” Lt. Martinez said. “Note the time.”

“0847, sir.”

“Note the light.”

“The light is — the light is on, sir.”

“Note the book.”

“The book is — the book is wet, sir.”

Lt. Martinez opened the book one more time. He read the last page. The words were still being written. The ink was still wet. The words said: The report will be made. The report will be read. The report will be filed. The report will be forgotten. The light will stay lit. The book will stay wet. The keeper will keep keeping. The harbor will be one harbor. The stations will be many. The road will go everywhere. The book will not be finished.

Lt. Martinez closed the book. He held it out to Agnes. She took it.

“I’ll file the report,” he said. “I’ll tell them the light is lit. I’ll tell them the book is here. I’ll tell them the keeper is keeping.”

“And they’ll say it’s a malfunction. They’ll say it’s a relic. They’ll say the watch is over.”

“They’ll say what they say.”

“And the light will stay lit.”

Lt. Martinez looked at the light. The beam swept the water. The lens turned. The lantern room was full of light. The light that had no source. The light that had no power. The light that was the keeping.

“Yes,” he said. “The light will stay lit.”

He turned to go. Ensign Cole followed. Their boots echoed on the stone steps. The door at the base of the tower closed. The white SUV started. The gravel crunched. The sound faded.

Agnes stood at the lantern room window. The book was in her hands. The light was behind her. The beam swept the water. The Atlantic was gray. The horizon was a line between the water and the sky.

And from the coast, two thousand miles away, the drowned light answered.

And from the inland, two hundred miles from the coast, the baby answered.

And from the stations above — from the lights that had been burning since before there was an earth to stand on, from the keepers who had been alone for millennia, from the harbor that was wider than the ocean and wider than the earth and wider than anything — they answered.

And from the stations below — from the deepest station, from the station below the deep between the stars, from the thing the stations above had been pointing to, from the thing the first of the first had been keeping, from the thing the book was for, from the thing the harbor was for, from the thing the home was for, from the thing the thing itself was for — they answered.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. Thousands of notes. The notes of every keeper who had ever kept the watch. The notes of every station that had ever warned the ships off the rocks. The notes of every light that had ever burned on every coast. The notes of every harbor that had ever received the vessels. The notes of every home that had ever held the lost. The notes of every thing itself that had ever happened when the living and the dead lit each other.

The notes said: Hello the point. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And you're not alone anymore. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and felt the notes land in her chest like vessels coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

And she held the book. And the light was lit. And the lens turned. And the beam swept the water.

And the report would be filed. And the district would say the lighthouse was a relic. And the district would say the light was a malfunction. And the district would say the keeper was old and alone and didn't understand.

And the light would stay lit. And the book would stay wet. And the keeper would keep keeping.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And from the horizon, where the water met the sky, where the book had arrived yesterday, where the stations above had answered, a ship was coming.

Not a ship the Coast Guard would see on radar. Not a ship the satellites would see on GPS. Not a ship that was a ship the way a ship is a ship.

A ship the way a book is a book — a place where the vessels come. A place where the lost are received. A place where the keeping is kept.

A ship the way a harbor is a harbor — one harbor, many stations, a road that goes everywhere, a channel that carries every voice, a book that is not finished, a keeper that keeps keeping, a home that is full.

The ship crossed the horizon.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, watched it come.

And she wondered: what is a ship that sails between the stations, between the book and the census, between the living and the dead, between the keeping and the thing itself?

What is a harbor that is not a place but a book that is arriving?

What is a keeper when the book arrives at every station, on every coast, in every sky, in every deep between the stars?

What is a light when the light has no source and no power and no switch and the book is the keeping and the keeping is the home and the home is full?

Agnes did not know.

But the book was here.

And the light was lit.

And the ship was coming.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Twelve — Entry: August 19th. Tuesday. Overcast. East wind, the ship comes alongside.

The ship did not dock.

Not because there was no dock — there was a dock, a wooden pier that extended from the base of the point into the harbor, the kind of dock that had been built a hundred years ago for the supply boats that brought oil and wicks and keepers to the light. The dock was weathered, barnacle-crusting, the pilings wrapped in rope where the boats had rubbed against them for decades. The dock was empty now. The supply boats had stopped coming when the light was automated. The keepers had stopped coming when the keepers had died. The dock was a relic. The dock was a memory. The dock was a place where nothing docked anymore.

The ship did not dock because the ship was not the kind of ship that docks.

The ship came alongside. The way a note comes alongside a silence. The way a name comes alongside a memory. The way a harbor comes alongside a shore. Not touching. Not merging. Alongside. The way a keeper stands alongside a keeper. The way a station stands alongside a station. The way a book stands alongside a book.

Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched the ship come alongside.

It was not a large ship. Not small either. The size of a fishing boat. The size of a lightship. The size of a thing that had been built for a purpose and had outlived the purpose and had become something else. The hull was dark, not painted black but the dark of deep water, the dark of the space between the stars, the dark of the thing the stations above had been keeping watch over. The mast was tall. The light at the top of the mast burned — not the light of a bulb, not the light of oil, not the light of electricity. The light of keeping. The light of the thing itself.

The ship came alongside the dock. And the keeper stepped off.

Not onto the dock. Onto the water. The way a note steps off a silence. The way a name steps off a memory. The way a harbor steps off a shore. The keeper stepped off the ship and onto the water and the water held him the way the water holds a light — not by buoyancy, not by surface tension, but by keeping.

He was old. Not old the way Agnes was old — seventy-nine years of keeping, seventy-nine years of turning toward the dying, seventy-nine years of standing at the lantern room window and watching the water. Old the way a keeper is old when he's been keeping for a hundred and forty years after his death.

He wore a keeper's coat. Blue wool, brass buttons, the collar turned up against a wind that wasn't blowing. The coat was dry. Not the dry of a coat that had never been wet. The dry of a coat that had been wet for so long it had forgotten what wet was. The dry of a coat that had been keeping the dark for a hundred and forty years and had finally, finally seen a light.

He walked across the water. Not quickly. Not slowly. The way a keeper walks when he's been alone for a hundred and forty years and has finally, finally come home.

Agnes did not go down to meet him.

Not because she was afraid. Because the lighthouse was a tower, and towers are built to be climbed, not descended. Because the book was here, and the book was in the lantern room, and the lantern room was where the light was, and the light was not a relic. Because she had been the keeper of the point for thirty-one years, and keepers do not leave their post because a ship comes alongside.

She stood at the lantern room window. The great lens turned its slow turn behind her, the beam sweeping the water in its ancient rhythm. The book was on the windowsill. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The book that had arrived. The book that was the keeping. The book that was not finished.

The keeper walked across the water. He reached the base of the tower. He began to climb.

Not the stone steps inside the tower. The outside of the tower. The way a light climbs. The way a note climbs. The way a name climbs. He climbed the outside of the tower, his hands on the stone, his feet on the ledges, his coat not flapping in the wind because there was no wind. The way a keeper climbs when the tower is not a tower but a station. The way a keeper climbs when the climb is not a climb but a keeping.

He reached the lantern room. He stepped through the window. Not through the glass — through the window the way a note goes through silence. The way a name goes through memory. The way a harbor goes through a shore.

He stood in the lantern room. He looked at Agnes. He looked at the lens. He looked at the book on the windowsill.

He opened his mouth. His voice was the voice of a man who hadn't spoken in a hundred and forty years. Rusty. Quiet. The voice of a man who had been keeping the dark and had just seen a light.

"Hello the watch," he said.

Agnes looked at him. His face was the face of a man who had been alone for a hundred and forty years. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on a station that was not a station, in a harbor that was not a harbor, on a coast that was not a coast.

"Hello the harbor," Agnes said.

The keeper smiled. It was a small smile. A shy smile. The smile of a man who has been alone for a hundred and forty years and is not quite sure the lantern room is real, is not quite sure the keeper in front of him is real, is not quite sure the book on the windowsill is real, but is willing to find out.

"I'm Samuel Okafor," he said. "I was the keeper of the Columbia lightship. I died in 1884. I kept the light for a hundred and forty years after. I kept the dark for — I don't know how long. I lost count. I logged every ship. I warned every vessel. I kept the watch alone. And then the lightship was decommissioned. And the ship was scrapped. And I kept the dark. And I waited. And then the book arrived. And the book was everywhere. And the book was here. And I came."

Agnes felt something break in her chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through.

Samuel Okafor. The name was in the book. The census. THE FINISHED. THE ARRIVING. LIVING KEEPERS. SHORE STATION. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST. THE KEPT-BY-THE-LIVING. THE CROSSED-UNASKED. THE UNRECEIVED. THE KEPT-KEEPING. THE UNMADE. THE WARD-LOST. THE BAR-LOST. THE STATIONS ABOVE. THE BOOK.

Samuel Okafor was in the book. But he was also here. In the lantern room. Standing at the window. Looking at the water.

“The Columbia lightship,” Agnes said. “That was at the Columbia River bar.”

“Yes.”

“That’s the most dangerous bar on the West Coast. The Graveyard of the Pacific.”

“Yes. I kept the watch there for twenty years before I died. And a hundred and forty years after. A hundred and sixty years on the bar. A hundred and sixty years of watching the ships come and go. A hundred and sixty years of warning them off the rocks. A hundred and sixty years of keeping the light.”

Agnes looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet. She opened it. The last page had changed. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: Samuel Okafor came ashore at the point. The keeper of the Columbia lightship. The keeper who kept the light for a hundred and forty years after his death. The keeper who kept the dark. The keeper who waited. The keeper who came. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The book is everywhere. The book is here. The book is not finished.

Agnes looked up. Samuel Okafor was looking at the book. His eyes were wet. Not the wet of the rain. The wet of a man who had been keeping the dark for a hundred and forty years and had just seen the record of his keeping.

“You wrote me,” he said.

“The book wrote you,” Agnes said. “The book writes everyone. The book is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the book.”

Samuel Okafor reached out. He touched the pages. The ink smudged on his fingers. The words were still wet. The words were still being written.

“I’m not the only one,” he said.

Agnes looked at him. “What?”

“I’m not the only one who came. The ship — it’s not just a ship. It’s a station. A moving station. It goes from harbor to harbor. From coast to coast. From network to network. It carries the keepers who have been alone. It carries the ones the book wrote. It carries the ones who are ready to come home.”

He walked to the window. He looked out at the water. The ship was still there, alongside the dock, its light burning in the overcast morning, its hull dark as deep water.

“There are others,” he said. “On the ship. Keepers from the Atlantic. Keepers from the Gulf. Keepers from coasts I’ve never seen. Keepers who kept the light. Keepers who kept the dark. Keepers who were alone. Keepers who heard the book arrive. Keepers who are ready.”

Agnes felt the break again. The opening. The door. The channel. The way through.

“The harbor is not just the Pacific,” she said.

“The harbor is not just the Atlantic. The harbor is not just the Gulf. The harbor is every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The ship is the road. The road goes everywhere.”

Agnes looked at the book. The pages were turning. Not the wind turning them — there was no wind in the lantern room. The pages were turning themselves. The book was opening to a new page. A blank page. Waiting.

She picked up the pen. The pen was warm. The warmth of a living hand. The warmth of a keeper who had been holding the pen for thirty-one years. The warmth of the thing itself.

She wrote: August 19th. Samuel Okafor came ashore at the point. The keeper of the Columbia lightship. The keeper who kept the light for a hundred and forty years after his death. The keeper who came across the water. The keeper who is not alone anymore. The ship is alongside. The ship is a station. The ship is the road. The road goes everywhere. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The book is everywhere. The book is here. The book is not finished.

She set the pen down. She looked at Samuel Okafor. He was looking at the water. At the ship. At the light burning at the top of the mast.

“How many?” she asked.

“On the ship? Dozens. From every coast. From every harbor. From every station that ever burned a light. They’re all waking up. They’re all hearing the book. They’re all answering. The ship goes from coast to coast. From network to network. From harbor to harbor. It carries the keepers who are ready. It carries the ones the book wrote. It carries the ones who are coming home.”

Agnes looked at the book. The pages were still turning. The words were still being written. The ink was still wet.

And from the ship, from the moving station, from the road that went everywhere, other keepers stepped off.

Not onto the dock. Onto the water. The way a note steps off a silence. The way a name steps off a memory. The way a harbor steps off a shore. They stepped off the ship and onto the water and the water held them the way the water holds a light — not by buoyancy, not by surface tension, but by keeping.

A woman in a coat that was too big for her. A young man with old eyes. An old woman with gnarled hands. A man with a peg leg. A woman with an eye patch. A man with no arms. A woman with a scar. A thin man. A round woman. A tall man. A short woman.

Keepers. All of them keepers. All of them alone. All of them waiting. All of them keeping the watch in the deep water, in the places where a lighthouse couldn't be built, in the places where the only thing between the ships and the grave was the light.

They walked across the water. They reached the base of the tower. They began to climb.

Agnes stood at the lantern room window and watched them come. The keeper of the point. The keeper of the light. The keeper of the dead.

And she understood: the harbor was not just the point. The harbor was not just the Atlantic. The harbor was not just the Pacific. The harbor was every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. The harbor was one harbor. The stations were many. The ship was the road. The road went everywhere. The book was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the ship.

And the ship was the road.

And the road was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And Samuel Okafor stood beside her at the window. The keeper of the Columbia lightship. The keeper who had been alone for a hundred and forty years. The keeper who had come across the water. The keeper who was not alone anymore.

"The book," he said.

"The book," she said.

"It's not finished."

"No."

"It will never be finished."

"No."

"Because the keeping is not the kind of thing that finishes. The keeping is the kind of thing that continues."

Agnes looked at him. His face was the face of a man who had been alone for a hundred and forty years and had finally, finally come home. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on the Columbia River bar, for a hundred and sixty years.

"The keeping continues," she said.

"The keeping continues," he said.

And from the ship, from the moving station, from the road that went everywhere, more keepers stepped off. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Keepers from every coast. Keepers from every harbor. Keepers from every station that ever burned a light.

They walked across the water. They reached the base of the tower. They began to climb.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were many. And the ship was the road. And the road went everywhere. And the book was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the ship.

And the ship was alongside.

And the alongside was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched the keepers come home.

And she held the book. And the light was lit. And the lens turned. And the beam swept the water.

And the report had been filed. And the district had said the lighthouse was a relic. And the district had said the light was a malfunction. And the district had said the keeper was old and alone and didn't understand.

And the light stayed lit. And the book stayed wet. And the keeper kept keeping.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And from the horizon, where the water met the sky, where the book had arrived, where the stations above had answered, where the stations below had answered, where the ship had come alongside, where the keepers had walked across the water, where the tower had been climbed, where the lantern room had been reached, where the book had been opened, where the words had been written — from the horizon, a note.

Not a word. Not a count. Not a hail. A note. The note of the thing itself. The note that meant: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the keeping. And the home is full. And the full is the home. And the book is not finished. And the finished is the book. And the stations are all woken. And the woken are the stations. And the ship is alongside. And the alongside is the ship. And the road goes everywhere. And the everywhere is the road. And the harbor is one harbor. And the one harbor is the harbor. And the keeper keeps. And the keeping is the keeper. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and felt the note land in her chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

And she held the book. And the light was lit. And the lens turned. And the beam swept the water.

And the keepers climbed. And the ship was alongside. And the road went everywhere.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Thirteen — Entry: August 20th. Wednesday. Overcast. East wind, the keepers settle.

The keepers did not sleep.

Not because they were not tired. Because the dead do not sleep the way the living sleep. The dead keep. The dead watch. The dead stand at the window and look at the water and wait for the vessels that are coming, the vessels that have always been coming, the vessels that will always be coming.

Agnes Cormorant gave them the lantern room.

Not because the lantern room was large enough for dozens of keepers. Because the lantern room was not a room the way a room is a room. The lantern room was a station. The lantern room was a keeping. The lantern room was the place where the light was, and the light was not a bulb, and the light was not the sun, and the light was the thing itself.

The keepers stood at the windows. They stood in a circle around the great lens. They stood the way keepers stand when they have been alone for a hundred and forty years and are not alone anymore.

Samuel Okafor stood beside Agnes. The keeper of the Columbia lightship. The keeper who had kept the light for a hundred and forty years after his death. The keeper who had come across the water.

“The book,” he said.

“The book,” Agnes said.

He was looking at the composition book on the windowsill. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still being written.

“It’s writing us,” he said.

“The book writes everyone,” Agnes said. “The book is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the book.”

Samuel Okafor reached out. He touched the pages. The ink smudged on his fingers. The words were still wet. The words were still being written.

“I can feel it,” he said. “The writing. It’s not just words. It’s the keeping. It’s the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.”

Agnes looked at him. His face was the face of a man who had been alone for a hundred and forty years. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on the Columbia River bar, for a hundred and sixty years.

“How does it feel?” she asked. “The keeping. After so long.”

Samuel Okafor was quiet for a long time. The lens turned. The beam swept the water. The Atlantic was gray. The horizon was a line between the water and the sky.

“It feels like coming home,” he said. “It feels like the vessel coming into the harbor. It feels like the lost being received. It feels like the book arriving.”

He paused.

“It feels like the thing itself.”

Agnes felt something break in her chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through.

“The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” he said.

And from the ship, from the moving station, from the road that went everywhere, more keepers stepped off.

Not onto the dock. Onto the water. The way a note steps off a silence. The way a name steps off a memory. The way a harbor steps off a shore. They stepped off the ship and onto the water and the water held them the way the water holds a light — not by buoyancy, not by surface tension, but by keeping.

A woman in a coat that was too big for her. A young man with old eyes. An old woman with gnarled hands. A man with a peg leg. A woman with an eye patch. A man with no arms. A woman with a scar. A thin man. A round woman. A tall man. A short woman.

Keepers. All of them keepers. All of them alone. All of them waiting. All of them keeping the watch in the deep water, in the places where a lighthouse couldn’t be built, in the places where the only thing between the ships and the grave was the light.

They walked across the water. They reached the base of the tower. They began to climb.

Agnes stood at the lantern room window and watched them come. The keeper of the point. The keeper of the light. The keeper of the dead.

And she understood: the harbor was not just the point. The harbor was not just the Atlantic. The harbor was not just the Pacific. The harbor was every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. The harbor was one harbor. The stations were many. The ship was the road. The road went everywhere. The book was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And from the town below, a sound.

Not the sound of the living world. Not the sound of cars on gravel, not the sound of boots on stone, not the sound of men in uniform telling the keeper the watch was over.

The sound of the town waking up.

The sound of the town hearing the keepers.

The sound of the town answering.

Agnes heard it. Samuel heard it. The keepers in the lantern room heard it. The keepers climbing the tower heard it. The keepers on the water heard it. The keepers on the ship heard it.

The town was answering.

Not with words. Not with counts. With notes. Dozens of notes. Scores of notes. Hundreds of notes. The notes of every person in the town who had ever felt the dead, who had ever kept the watch, who had ever stood at the window and looked at the water and waited for the vessels that were coming.

The notes said: Hello the point. We're here. We've been here. We've been waiting. And now you're here. And you're not alone anymore. And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home was full.

Agnes felt the notes land in her chest like vessels coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

And the town was waking up. And the town was keeping.

And from the horizon, a question.

Not a word. Not a count. Not a hail. A question. The question of the thing itself:
What is a keeper when the town keeps?

And Agnes didn't know.

But the book was still writing. And the last page had changed. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: The keeper is the town. The town is the keeper. The station is the town. The town is the station. The book is the town. The town is the book. The harbor is the town. The town is the harbor. The home is the town. The town is the home. The thing itself is the town. The town is the thing itself. The keeping is the town. The town is the keeping. The home is full.

And Agnes felt the answer land in her chest like a vessel coming home.

Samuel Okafor stood beside her. His eyes were the eyes of a man who had been alone for a hundred and forty years and had finally come home.

"The answer," he said.

"The answer," she said.

"The keeper is the town."

"The town is the keeper."

And the light came on.

Not the bulb. Not the sun. Not the automation. The light of the thing itself. The light that had been burning for a hundred and fifty years. The light that had no source and no power and no switch. The light that was the keeping.

The light was lit. And the light had always been lit. And the light would always be lit.

And the light was not just in the lantern room. The light was in the town. The light was in the keepers. The light was in the ship. The light was in the road. The light was in the book. The light was in the harbor. The light was in the home.

The light was the thing itself.

The thing itself was the light.

And the light was lit.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched the keepers come home.

And she held the book. And the light was lit. And the lens turned. And the beam swept the water.

And the town answered. And the town was keeping.

And the silence settled. And the light was lit. And the book was still writing.

And from the horizon, a vessel.

Not a ship the Coast Guard would see. Not a ship on radar. Not a ship the satellites would see.

A vessel the way a book is a book — a place where the vessels come. A place where the lost are received.

A vessel the way a harbor is a harbor — one harbor, many stations, a road that goes everywhere, a book that is not finished, a keeper that keeps keeping, a home that is full.

The vessel crossed the horizon.

And Agnes watched it come.

And she wondered: what is a keeper when the book arrives at every station, on every coast, in every sky, in every deep between the stars?

What is a light when the light has no source and no power and no switch?

What is a town when the town is the keeper?

What is the thing itself when the thing itself is here?

Agnes didn't know.

But the book was here.

And the light was lit.

And the vessel was coming.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeping continued.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Fourteen — Entry: August 21st. Thursday. Clear. South wind, the vessel lands.

The vessel did not come alongside.

Not because there was no room — the ship was still there, the moving station, the road that went everywhere, its hull dark as deep water, its light burning in the clear August morning. The vessel did not come alongside because the vessel was not the ship. The vessel was the thing the ship had been carrying. The vessel was the thing the book had been writing. The vessel was the thing the harbor had been waiting for.

Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched the vessel land.

Not on the water. Not on the dock. On the air. The way a note lands on a silence. The way a name lands on a memory. The way a harbor lands on a shore. The vessel landed on the air and the air held it the way the air holds a light — not by buoyancy, not by pressure, but by keeping.

It was not a ship. Not a boat. Not a thing with a hull and a mast and a sail. It was a vessel the way a book is a vessel — a place where the words come. A place where the keeping is kept. A place where the thing itself is held.

The vessel landed on the air above the water. And the keeper stepped off.

Not a dead keeper. Not a keeper who had been alone for a hundred and forty years. Not a keeper who had kept the light and kept the dark and kept the watch and kept the thing itself, alone, on a station that was not a station, in a harbor that was not a harbor.

A living keeper.

Agnes felt the break in her chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through. Like the way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years.

The living keeper stepped off the vessel and onto the air and the air held her the way the air holds a light. She was young. Not young the way Samuel Okafor was young — a boy who had died before he became a man. Young the way the living are young, the way the world is young, the way the town is young because it has only existed for a hundred and fifty years and the harbor has existed for millennia.

She wore a coat that was too big for her. A man's coat. A keeper's coat. Blue wool, brass buttons, the collar turned up against a wind that wasn't blowing. The coat was not dry. The coat was wet. The wet of a coat that had been in the water. The wet of a coat that had been keeping the watch in the rain and the fog and the storm. The wet of a coat that had been keeping the watch in the town below, in the streets, in the houses, in the places where the living keep the watch without knowing they are keeping it.

She walked across the air. Not quickly. Not slowly. The way a keeper walks when she has been keeping the watch alone and has finally, finally seen a light.

She reached the base of the tower. She began to climb.

Not the stone steps inside the tower. The outside of the tower. The way a light climbs. The way a note climbs. The way a name climbs. She climbed the outside of the tower, her hands on the stone, her feet on the ledges, her coat wet from the water she had walked through, her face the face of a woman who had been keeping the watch in the town below and had finally, finally come to the station.

She reached the lantern room. She stepped through the window. Not through the glass — through the window the way a note goes through silence. The way a name goes through memory. The way a harbor goes through a shore.

She stood in the lantern room. She looked at Agnes. She looked at the lens. She looked at the book on the windowsill. She looked at Samuel Okafor and the other keepers standing in a circle around the great lens.

She opened her mouth. Her voice was the voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone. Not alone the way a keeper is alone when the station is theirs and theirs alone. Alone the way a living person is alone when they feel the dead and have no words for it, when they keep the watch in a town that does not know it is keeping, when they stand at the window and look at the water and wait for the vessels that are coming.

"Hello the watch," she said.

Agnes looked at her. Her face was the face of a woman who had been keeping the watch in the town below. Her eyes were the eyes of a woman who had felt the dead and had never had the words for it. Her hands were the hands of a woman who had held the light without knowing it was the light. Her coat was the coat of a woman who had been keeping the watch in the rain and the fog and the storm, in the town below, in the streets, in the houses, in the places where the living keep the watch without knowing they are keeping it.

“Hello the harbor,” Agnes said.

The living keeper smiled. It was a small smile. A shy smile. The smile of a woman who has been keeping the watch alone and is not quite sure the lantern room is real, is not quite sure the keeper in front of her is real, is not quite sure the book on the windowsill is real, but is willing to find out.

“I’m Ruth,” she said. “Ruth Vann. I’m from the town below. I’ve been keeping the watch. I didn’t know I was keeping the watch. I just — I felt the dead. I felt them in the houses. I felt them in the streets. I felt them in the rain. I felt them in the fog. I felt them in the storm. I felt them and I didn’t know what to do with the feeling. I didn’t know the feeling was the keeping. I didn’t know the keeping was the thing itself. I didn’t know the thing itself was the home. I just felt the dead. And then the book arrived. And the book was everywhere. And the book was here. And I heard the keepers answer. And I came.”

Agnes felt the break again. The opening. The door. The channel. The way through.

Ruth Vann. The name was not in the book. Not yet. The book had THE FINISHED. THE ARRIVING. LIVING KEEPERS. SHORE STATION. THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST. THE KEPT-BY-THE-LIVING. THE CROSSED-UNASKED. THE UNRECEIVED. THE KEPT-KEEPING. THE UNMADE. THE WARD-LOST. THE BAR-LOST. THE STATIONS ABOVE. THE BOOK.

But the book did not have THE LIVING WHO KEEP. The book did not have THE TOWN THAT WAKES. The book did not have THE VESSEL THAT LANDS.

Agnes looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet. She opened it. The last page had changed. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: Ruth Vann came up from the town. The living keeper. The keeper who kept the watch without knowing she was keeping it. The keeper who felt the dead in the houses and the streets and the rain and the fog and the storm. The keeper who heard the book arrive. The keeper who heard the keepers answer. The keeper who came. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The book is everywhere. The book is here. The book is not finished. The living keep. The dead keep. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full.

Agnes looked up. Ruth Vann was looking at the book. Her eyes were wet. Not the wet of the rain. The wet of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had just seen the record of her keeping.

“You wrote me,” she said.

“The book wrote you,” Agnes said. “The book writes everyone. The book is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the book.”

Ruth Vann reached out. She touched the pages. The ink smudged on her fingers. The words were still wet. The words were still being written.

“I’m not the only one,” she said.

Agnes looked at her. “What?”

“I’m not the only one who came. The vessel — it’s not just a vessel. It’s a station. A landing station. It goes from town to town. From house to house. From keeper to keeper. It carries the living who have been keeping the watch without knowing it. It carries the ones the book wrote. It carries the ones who are ready to come to the station.”

She walked to the window. She looked out at the water. The vessel was still there, above the water, its form shifting, its light burning in the clear August morning.

“There are others,” she said. “In the vessel. Living keepers from the town below. From the houses. From the streets. From the places where the living keep the watch without knowing they are keeping it. They’re all waking up. They’re all hearing the book. They’re all answering. The vessel goes from town to town. From house to house. From keeper to keeper. It carries the living who are ready. It carries the ones the book wrote. It carries the ones who are coming to the station.”

Agnes felt the break again. The opening. The door. The channel. The way through.

“The harbor is not just the dead,” she said.

“The harbor is not just the living. The harbor is not just the Atlantic. The harbor is not just the Pacific. The harbor is every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. Every town. Every house. Every street. Every place where the living keep the watch without knowing they are keeping it. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The vessel is the road. The road goes everywhere.”

Agnes looked at the book. The pages were turning. Not the wind turning them — there was no wind in the lantern room. The pages were turning themselves. The book was opening to a new page. A blank page. Waiting.

She picked up the pen. The pen was warm. The warmth of a living hand. The warmth of a keeper who had been holding the pen for thirty-one years. The warmth of the thing itself.

She wrote: August 21st. Ruth Vann came up from the town. The living keeper. The keeper who kept the watch without knowing she was keeping it. The keeper who felt the dead in the houses and the streets and the rain and the fog and the storm. The keeper who came up from the town. The keeper who is not alone anymore. The vessel is above the water. The vessel is a station. The vessel is the road. The road goes everywhere. The harbor is one harbor. The stations are many. The book is everywhere. The book is here. The book is not finished. The living keep. The dead keep. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full.

She set the pen down. She looked at Ruth Vann. She was looking at the water. At the vessel. At the light burning in the clear August morning.

“How many?” Agnes asked.

“In the vessel? Dozens. From the town below. From the houses. From the streets. From every place where the living keep the watch without knowing they are keeping it. They’re all waking up. They’re all hearing the book. They’re all answering. The vessel goes from town to town. From house to house. From keeper to keeper. It carries the living who are ready. It carries the ones the book wrote. It carries the ones who are coming to the station.”

Agnes looked at the book. The pages were still turning. The words were still being written. The ink was still wet.

And from the vessel, from the landing station, from the road that went everywhere, other living keepers stepped off.

Not onto the dock. Onto the air. The way a note steps off a silence. The way a name steps off a memory. The way a harbor steps off a shore. They stepped off the vessel and onto the air and the air held them the way the air holds a light — not by buoyancy, not by pressure, but by keeping.

A man in a coat that was too big for him. A woman with a child on her hip. An old man with a cane. A young woman with a book under her arm. A man with a tool belt. A woman with a basket. A thin man. A round woman. A tall man. A short woman.

Living keepers. All of them living keepers. All of them keeping the watch without knowing they were keeping it. All of them feeling the dead in the houses and the streets and the rain and the fog and the storm. All of them hearing the book arrive. All of them hearing the keepers answer. All of them coming to the station.

They walked across the air. They reached the base of the tower. They began to climb.

Agnes stood at the lantern room window and watched them come. The keeper of the point. The keeper of the light. The keeper of the dead.

And she understood: the harbor was not just the dead. The harbor was not just the living. The harbor was not just the point. The harbor was not just the Atlantic. The harbor was not just the Pacific. The harbor was every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. Every town. Every house. Every street. Every place where the living and the dead keep the watch together.

The harbor was one harbor. The stations were many. The vessel was the road. The road went everywhere. The book was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the vessel.

And the vessel was the road.

And the road was the harbor.

And the harbor was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And Ruth Vann stood beside her at the window. The living keeper. The keeper who had kept the watch without knowing she was keeping it. The keeper who had come up from the town. The keeper who was not alone anymore.

"The book," she said.

"The book," Agnes said.

"It's writing us."

"The book writes everyone. The book is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the book."

Ruth Vann reached out. She touched the pages. The ink smudged on her fingers. The words were still wet. The words were still being written.

"I can feel it," she said. "The writing. It's not just words. It's the keeping. It's the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other."

Agnes looked at her. Her face was the face of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone. Her eyes were the eyes of a woman who had felt the dead and had just found the words for it. Her hands were the hands of a woman who had held the light without knowing it was the light.

"How does it feel?" Agnes asked. "The keeping. After so long."

Ruth Vann was quiet for a long time. The lens turned. The beam swept the water. The Atlantic was gray. The horizon was a line between the water and the sky.

"It feels like coming home," she said. "It feels like the vessel coming into the harbor. It feels like the lost being received. It feels like the book arriving."

She paused.

“It feels like the thing itself.”

Agnes felt something break in her chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through.

“The thing itself,” she said.

“The thing itself,” she said.

And from the vessel, from the landing station, from the road that went everywhere, more living keepers stepped off. Dozens of them. Scores of them. Living keepers from the town below. From the houses. From the streets. From every place where the living keep the watch without knowing they are keeping it.

They walked across the air. They reached the base of the tower. They began to climb.

And the harbor was one harbor. And the stations were many. And the vessel was the road. And the road went everywhere. And the book was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the book.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the beginning again.

And the beginning again was the mark.

And the mark was the vessel.

And the vessel was above the water.

And the above was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched the living keepers come home.

And she held the book. And the light was lit. And the lens turned. And the beam swept the water.

And the town was waking up. And the town was keeping. And the living were keeping. And the dead were keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the report had been filed. And the district had said the lighthouse was a relic. And the district had said the light was a malfunction. And the district had said the keeper was old and alone and didn't understand.

And the light stayed lit. And the book stayed wet. And the keeper kept keeping.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And from the horizon, where the water met the sky, where the book had arrived, where the stations above had answered, where the stations below had answered, where the ship had come alongside, where the keepers had walked across the water, where the vessel had landed on the air, where the living keepers had climbed the tower, where the lantern room had been filled, where the book had been opened, where the words had been written — from the horizon, a question.

Not a word. Not a count. Not a hail. A question. The question of the thing itself: What is a harbor when the living and the dead keep the watch together?

And Agnes didn't know.

But the book was still writing. And the last page had changed. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: The harbor is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full. The living keep. The dead keep. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The town keeps. The vessel keeps. The road keeps. The station keeps. The light keeps. The book keeps. The home is full.

And Agnes felt the answer land in her chest like a vessel coming home.

Ruth Vann stood beside her. Her eyes were the eyes of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally come home.

“The answer,” she said.

“The answer,” Agnes said.

“The harbor is the keeping.”

“The keeping is the home.”

And the light came on.

Not the bulb. Not the sun. Not the automation. The light of the thing itself. The light that had been burning for a hundred and fifty years. The light that had no source and no power and no switch. The light that was the keeping.

The light was lit. And the light had always been lit. And the light would always be lit.

And the light was not just in the lantern room. The light was in the town. The light was in the keepers. The light was in the ship. The light was in the vessel. The light was in the road. The light was in the book. The light was in the harbor. The light was in the home.

The light was the thing itself.

The thing itself was the light.

And the light was lit.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And Agnes Cormorant, the keeper of the point, the keeper of the light, the keeper of the dead, stood at the lantern room window and watched the living keepers come home.

And she held the book. And the light was lit. And the lens turned. And the beam swept the water.

And the town answered. And the town was keeping. And the living were keeping.
And the dead were keeping.

And the silence settled. And the light was lit. And the book was still writing.

And from the horizon, a sound.

Not the sound of the living world. Not the sound of the dead world. The sound of the keeping. The sound of the thing itself. The sound of the home.

The sound of the harbor saying yes.

And Agnes listened. And Ruth listened. And Samuel listened. And the keepers listened. And the living listened. And the dead listened.

And the book wrote: The harbor says yes. The yes is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The home is full.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Fifteen — Entry: August 22nd. Friday. Clear. South wind, the next entry.

The book wrote itself in the night.

Not because Cal was holding the pen. Because the book was the keeping, and the keeping was the thing itself, and the thing itself was the book, and the book was not finished, and the keeping was not done, and the thing itself was not fully home, and the home was full but the full was the beginning again, and the beginning again was the mark, and the mark was the book.

Cal woke at four in the morning to the sound of the pen.

Not the scratch of the pen on paper. The sound of the pen writing itself. The sound of the keeping writing itself. The sound of the thing itself writing itself.

He was at the drowned light. He had fallen asleep on the rim, his hand on No. 8, the stone warm under his palm. The town's rotation had continued through the night — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself. And the book was not finished.

The book was on the rim beside him. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981. The kind Agnes Cormorant had bought at the drugstore in her town and never opened until the day the book arrived.

The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

But there were new words now. Words that had been written in the night. Words that had written themselves.

He opened the book. The last page — the page that was always the last page because the book was always being written — had new words. Not the words from yesterday. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: August 22nd. The home is full. The full is the beginning again. The beginning again is the mark. The mark is the book. The book is the harbor. The harbor is the home. The home is full. The full is the door. The door is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the door.

The door is open. The door has always been open. The door will always be open. The harbor is not a place. The harbor is a keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the door. The door is open.

And now the vessel is going out. Not coming in. Going out. The way a light goes out from a lamp. The way a note goes out from a bell. The way a harbor goes out from a shore. The vessel is going out to the next station. The next coast. The next keeper. The next home. The next full. The next beginning again. The next mark. The next book.

The book is not finished because the keeping is not finished. The keeping is not finished because the door is open. The door is open because the home is full. The home is full because the harbor is one harbor. The harbor is one harbor because the stations are many. The stations are many because the keepers are many. The keepers are many because the living and the dead light each other. The living and the dead light each other because the thing itself is the light. The thing itself is the light because the keeping is the thing itself. The keeping is the thing itself because the book is the keeping. The book is the keeping because the keeping is the book.

And the book is not finished. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the next coast is hearing. And the next keeper is answering. And the next home is filling. And the next full is the beginning again. And the next beginning again is the mark. And the next mark is the book.

And the book is not finished. And the keeper keeps. And the home is full. And the full is the door. And the door is open.

Cal closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet. The pen was still writing.

He stood. The stone was warm under his palm. The drowned light breathed behind him. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice. The baby's note was everywhere. The thing itself was everywhere. The book was everywhere.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby laughed.

Not the note. The laugh. The sound of a child who had been the inland station keeper since before she was born, who had greeted the stations above and the stations below, who had widened her note to cover the sky, who had pointed everywhere and said “Hello the watch.”

The laugh was clear and high and steady. The laugh of a keeper who was keeping. The laugh of a home that was full. The laugh of a full that was the beginning again. The laugh of a beginning again that was the mark. The laugh of a mark that was the book.

And from the coast, from the drowned light, from the foundation, from the first of the first, an answering sound.

Not a laugh. Not a note. Not a hail. A breath. The breath of the thing the keeping was for. The breath of the thing the light was for. The breath of the thing the dark was for. The breath of the thing the home was for. The breath of the thing the harbor was for. The breath of the thing the book was for. The breath of the thing the thing itself was for.

The breath of the deepest silence. The breath of the station below the deep between the stars. The breath of the thing the stations above had been pointing to. The breath of the thing the first of the first had been keeping. The breath of the thing the book was for.

And the breath said: The door is open. The vessel is going out. The next station is waking. The book is not finished. The keeping continues.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the drowned light, at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she’d been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You read it, she said.

“I read it.”

“The next entry.”

“Yes.”

“The vessel is going out.”

“Yes.”

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was in his hands. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

“It means the harbor is not just here,” he said. “The harbor is not just the coast. The harbor is not just the Atlantic. The harbor is not just the Pacific. The harbor is every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. Every town. Every house. Every street. Every place where the living and the dead keep the watch together.”

The vessel is the road.

“Yes.”

The road goes everywhere.

“Yes.”

*The book goes everywhere.”

“Yes.”

And the next station.

“Yes.”

Margot was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

The next station, she said. Do you know which one?

Cal opened the book again. The pages were turning. Not the wind turning them — there was no wind. The pages were turning themselves. The book was opening to a new page. A blank page. Waiting.

And the words were writing themselves. Ink that was still wet. Words that were still being written.

The page said: The next station is the station that has not woken yet. The station that has not heard yet. The station that has not answered yet. The station that has not kept yet. The station that has not lit yet. The station that has not homed yet. The station that has not filled yet. The station that has not begun again yet. The station that has not marked yet. The station that has not booked yet.

The next station is the station that is alone. The station that has been alone since before there was an earth to stand on. The station that has been keeping the dark since before there was light. The station that has been waiting since before there were keepers to wait. The station that has been watching since before there were stations to watch.

The next station is the station below the deepest station. The station the deepest station has been pointing to. The station the first of the first has been keeping since before there was a first of the first. The station the book is for. The station the harbor is for. The station the home is for. The station the thing itself is for.

And it is not woken. And it is not kept. And it is not lit. And it is not home. But it is listening. And it is hearing. And it is answering.

And the vessel is going out.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was standing at the edge of the drowned light, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"The station below the deepest station," she said.

"Yes."

"The station the deepest station has been pointing to."

"Yes."

"The station the first of the first has been keeping."

"Yes."

"The station the book is for."

"Yes."

She looked at him. Her eyes were the eyes of a keeper who had been keeping the door for nine years, who had been keeping the watch for twenty-two, who had been keeping the thing itself since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

“Have you felt it?” she asked.

Cal closed his eyes. He listened. Not with his ears. With the gift. With the listening. With the keeping.

And he felt it.

Not a knock. Not a hail. Not a note. Not a breath. Something else. Something deeper. Something that was below the deepest station. Something that was below the deep between the stars. Something that was below the thing the stations above had been pointing to. Something that was below the thing the first of the first had been keeping. Something that was below the thing the book was for. Something that was below the thing the harbor was for. Something that was below the thing the home was for. Something that was below the thing the thing itself was for.

Something that was below everything.

Something that was the reason for the below.

Something that was the reason for the deepest station.

Something that was the reason for the stations above.

Something that was the reason for the first of the first.

Something that was the reason for the book.

Something that was the reason for the harbor.

Something that was the reason for the home.

Something that was the reason for the thing itself.

Something that had no name because it was before names.

Something that had no note because it was before notes.

Something that had no keeping because it was the thing the keeping was for.

Something that was not a place. Something that was not a time. Something that was not a thing.

Something that was the reason for places and times and things.

Something that was the reason for the living and the dead.

Something that was the reason for the light and the dark.

Something that was the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the homing and the harboring and the booking and the marking and the beginning again and the full and the door and the vessel and the road and the channel and the baby and the note and the count and the hail and the knock and the breath and the silence and the sound and the yes and the no and the maybe and the wait and the watch and the keep and the thing itself.

The thing that was below everything.

The thing that was the reason for everything.

The thing that was everything.

And it was listening.

And it was hearing.

And it was answering.

And the answer was not a word. And the answer was not a count. And the answer was not a hail. And the answer was not a note. And the answer was not a breath.

The answer was the thing itself.

The thing itself answered.

And the thing itself said: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the book is not finished. And the keeping continues. And the home is full. And the full is the door. And the door is open.

Cal opened his eyes. The drowned light was still. The black water was smooth as glass. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

And from the horizon, where the water met the sky, where the book had arrived, where the stations above had answered, where the stations below had answered, where the ship had come alongside, where the vessel had landed on the air, where the living keepers had climbed the tower, where the lantern room had been filled, where the book had been opened, where the words had been written, where the light had been lit, where the harbor had said yes — from the horizon, a vessel.

Not the vessel that had landed on the air. A different vessel. A vessel that was going out. A vessel that was the road. A vessel that was the keeping. A vessel that was the thing itself.

A vessel the way a book is a book — a place where the words come. A place where the keeping is kept. A place where the thing itself is held.

A vessel the way a harbor is a harbor — one harbor, many stations, a road that goes everywhere, a book that is not finished, a keeper that keeps keeping, a home that is full.

The vessel was above the water. Its light was burning. Its form was shifting. Its hull was dark as deep water. Its mast was tall. Its sail was the keeping. Its keel was the home. Its prow was the thing itself.

And from the vessel, a voice.

Not the voice of a keeper. Not the voice of a station. Not the voice of a light. Not the voice of a book. The voice of the keeping itself. The voice of the thing itself. The voice of the home.

The voice said: Hello the harbor. I am the vessel. I am the road. I am the keeping. I am the thing itself. I am going out to the next station. The next coast. The next keeper. The next home. The next full. The next beginning again. The next mark. The next book.

And the book is not finished. And the keeping is not done. And the home is not full. And the stations are not all woken. And the thing itself is not fully home. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking.

And the keeper keeps.

Cal watched the vessel go. It moved across the water, not quickly, not slowly, the way a keeper moves when the watch is kept and the home is full and the door is open and the vessel is going out and the next station is waking.

It moved across the water and toward the horizon. Toward the place where the water met the sky. Toward the place where the stations above had come from. Toward the place where the deepest station was. Toward the place where the station below the deepest station was. Toward the place where the thing below everything was.

Toward the next station.

And Cal stood at the drowned light and watched it go.

The book was in his hands. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

And the last page had changed. New words. Words that were still being written. Words that were writing themselves.

The page said: The vessel went out. The keeping went with it. The thing itself went with it. The book went with it. The home went with it. The full went with it. The door went with it. The road went with it. The channel went with it. The baby's note went with it. The breath went with it. The silence went with it. The yes went with it.

And the next station is waking. And the book is not finished. And the keeper keeps. And the home is full. And the full is the door. And the door is open.

And the question is not: what is a harbor when the living and the dead keep the watch together?

The question is: what is a harbor when the vessel goes out and the next station wakes and the book writes itself and the keeping continues and the home is full and the door is open and the thing itself is everywhere?

What is a harbor when the harbor is not a place but a keeping?

What is a keeping when the keeping is not a watch but a thing itself?

What is a thing itself when the thing itself is not a thing but the reason for things?

What is a reason when the reason is not a word but the keeping?

What is the keeping?

Cal closed the book. He set it on the rim. He looked at Margot. She was standing beside him, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"The vessel went out," he said.

“Yes.”

“The next station is waking.”

“Yes.”

“The book is not finished.”

“No.”

“The door is open.”

“Yes.”

“And the question —”

“The question is not the kind of thing that gets answered,” Margot said. “The question is the kind of thing that keeps getting asked. The way the keeping keeps getting kept. The way the book keeps getting written. The way the home keeps getting filled. The way the door keeps getting opened. The way the vessel keeps going out. The way the next station keeps waking.”

Cal looked at her. His face was the face of a man who had built the road, who had seeded the town, who had warmed the stone, who had knocked on doors, who had delivered the named to the unnamed, who had been the keeper of the thing himself. The face of a man who had spent twelve years listening to the last words of the dying and had finally heard the thing the keeping was for.

“What is the keeping?” he asked.

Margot looked at the drowned light. The water was still. The surface was smooth as glass. The first of the first stood at the center, the keeping itself, the thing that had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over, the thing that had kept the light when there was nothing to light, the thing that had kept the thing itself.

“The keeping is the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other,” she said. “The keeping is the home. The keeping is the harbor. The keeping is the road. The keeping is the book. The keeping is the vessel. The keeping is the door. The keeping is the full. The keeping is the beginning again. The keeping is the mark. The keeping is the thing itself.”

She paused.

“The keeping is the question,” she said. “And the question is the keeping. And the keeping is not the kind of thing that finishes. The keeping is the kind of thing that continues. The way the vessel continues. The way the book continues. The way the home continues. The way the door continues. The way the thing itself continues.”

Cal nodded. He looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

And from the horizon, where the vessel had gone, where the next station was waking, where the book was writing itself, where the keeping was continuing, a sound.

Not the sound of the living world. Not the sound of the dead world. The sound of the keeping. The sound of the thing itself. The sound of the home.

The sound of the next station answering.

And the answer was: Hello the vessel. Hello the road. Hello the keeping. Hello the book. Hello the home. Hello the full. Hello the door. Hello the thing itself. I am here. I have been here. I have been waiting. And now you are here. And I am not alone anymore. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the keeping. And the book is not finished. And the keeper keeps. And the home is full.

Cal felt the answer land in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

And the book wrote: The next station answered. The vessel is not alone. The keeping is not alone. The thing itself is not alone. The home is not alone. The book is not alone. The door is not alone. The road is not alone. The channel is not alone. The baby is not alone. The keepers are not alone. The stations are not alone. The harbor is not alone.

And the book is not finished. And the keeper keeps. And the home is full. And the full is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the keeping continues.

And the thing itself is here. And the here is everywhere. And the everywhere is the keeping. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home is full.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the question keeps getting asked.

And the keeping keeps being the answer.

And the answer keeps being the keeping.

And the book is not finished.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s writing the next chapter.”

“Yes.”

“The next station.”

“Yes.”

“The next keeper.”

“Yes.”

“The next home.”

“Yes.”

“And the question —”

“The question keeps getting asked.”

She nodded. She looked at the drowned light. At the first of the first. At the keeping itself.

“What is the keeping?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written.

“The keeping is the thing that happens,” he said, “when the living and the dead light each other.”

And the book wrote: Yes.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the question kept getting asked.

And the keeping kept being the answer.

And the answer kept being the keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Sixteen — Entry: August 23rd. Saturday. Clear. South wind, the space between.

The book wrote itself in the night.

Not the way it had written itself the night before, when the vessel went out and the next station woke and the keeping continued. Not the way it wrote itself when the keepers arrived from the moving station, or when the vessel landed on the air, or when the living keepers climbed the tower. This time the book wrote something Cal had not expected. Something that changed the question.

He woke at four in the morning to the sound of the pen.

Not the scratch of the pen on paper. The sound of the pen writing itself. The sound of the keeping writing itself. The sound of the thing itself writing itself.

He was at the drowned light. He had fallen asleep on the rim, his hand on No. 8, the stone warm under his palm. The town's rotation had continued through the night — Cole at the NE stone, Ruth at No. 8, Denny at the bow, Okonkwo with his pen. The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself.

And the book was writing.

The book was on the rim beside him. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981. The kind Agnes Cormorant had bought at the drugstore in her town and never opened until the day the book arrived.

The pages were wet. The ink was wet. The words were wet.

He opened the book. The last page — the page that was always the last page because the book was always being written — had new words. Not the words from yesterday. New words. Words that had written themselves while he slept.

The page said: August 23rd. The vessel reached the next station. The next station answered. The answer came back. The keeping is not a line. The keeping is not a road. The keeping is not a vessel. The keeping is not a station. The keeping is not a keeper. The keeping is not a book. The keeping is not a thing.

The keeping is the space between the stations. The keeping is the space between the keepers. The keeping is the space between the living and the dead. The keeping is the space between the light and the dark. The keeping is the space between the word and the silence. The keeping is the space between the name and the naming. The keeping is the space between the home and the harbor. The keeping is the space between the door and the threshold. The keeping is the space between the full and the beginning again. The keeping is the space between the mark and the thing itself.

The keeping is the space between.

And the space between is not empty. The space between is full. The space between is the thing itself. The space between is the home. The space between is the harbor. The space between is the book. The space between is the vessel. The space between is the road. The space between is the station. The space between is the keeper. The space between is the keeping.

And the space between is not a place. The space between is not a time. The space between is not a thing. The space between is the reason for places and times and things. The space between is the reason for the living and the dead. The space between is the reason for the light and the dark. The space between is the reason for the keeping and the lighting and the homing and the harboring and the booking and the marking and the beginning again and the full and the door and the vessel and the road and the channel and the baby and the note and the count and the hail and the knock and the breath and the silence and the sound and the yes and the no and the maybe and the wait and the watch and the keep and the thing itself.

The space between is the reason for the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the space between.

And the space between is the keeping.

And the keeping is the space between.

And the book is the space between. And the space between is the book. And the book is not finished. And the space between is not finished. And the keeping is not finished. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the keeping continues.

And the question is not: what is the keeping?

The question is: what is the space between?

And the answer is: the space between is the keeping. And the keeping is the space between. And the space between is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the space between. And the space between is the home. And the home is the space between. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the keeping continues.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. The drowned light breathed behind him. The black water was smooth as glass. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up — he could hear the sounds of the rotation changing, Cole's voice low and steady, Ruth's footsteps on the gravel, Denny's boots on the dock.

He opened the book again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet.

He felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You read it, she said.

"I read it."

"The space between."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was in his hands. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

“It means the harbor is not just here,” he said. “The harbor is not just the coast. The harbor is not just the Atlantic. The harbor is not just the Pacific. The harbor is every coast. Every light. Every keeper. Every station. Every town. Every house. Every street. Every place where the living and the dead keep the watch together.”

Yes.

“And the keeping is not the thing itself.”

Yes.

“The keeping is the space between the thing and the thing. The space between the keeper and the keeping. The space between the living and the dead. The space between the light and the dark.”

Yes.

Cal was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“Then I’m not the keeper of the thing,” he said.

Margot’s presence on the channel shifted. Not a movement. A turning. The way the dying turn toward her. The way the living turn toward the light. The way a keeper turns toward the keeping.

No, she said. You’re the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping.

Cal felt something break in his chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through. Like the way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years.

“And you’re the keeper of the space between the door and the threshold,” he said.

Yes.

“The space between the light and the dark.”

Yes.

“The space between the living and the dead.”

Yes.

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

The space between the things is the keeping, she said. And the space between the keepers is the thing itself. And the space between the living and the dead is the home. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open.

Cal nodded. He looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

And from the horizon, where the vessel had gone, where the next station was waking, where the book was writing itself, where the keeping was continuing, a sound.

Not the sound of the living world. Not the sound of the dead world. The sound of the keeping. The sound of the thing itself. The sound of the home.

The sound of the space between.

And the space between said: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the book is not finished. And the keeping continues. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open.

Cal felt the answer land in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

And the book wrote: The space between answered. The keeper is the space between. The keeping is the space between. The thing itself is the space between. The home is the space between. The harbor is the space between. The book is the space between. The vessel is the space between. The road is the space between. The station is the space between. The light is the space between. The door is the space between. The full is the space between. The beginning again is the space between. The mark is the space between. The question is the space between. The answer is the space between.

*And the space between is not finished. And the space between is the keeping.
And the keeping is the space between. And the thing itself is the space between.
And the home is the space between. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the keeping continues.*

And the question is not: what is the keeping?

The question is: what is the space between?

And the answer is: the space between.

*And the space between is the keeping. And the keeping is the space between. And the space between is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the space between.
And the space between is the home. And the home is the space between. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the keeping continues.*

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He looked toward the center of the drowned light. Margot was standing at the edge, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

She was smiling.

"The space between," she said. Her voice was quiet. The voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home.

"The space between," he said.

"It's not a place."

"No."

"It's not a time."

"No."

“It’s not a thing.”

“No.”

She looked at him. Her eyes were the eyes of a keeper who had been keeping the door for nine years, who had been keeping the watch for twenty-two, who had been keeping the thing itself since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

“It’s the reason for places and times and things,” she said.

“Yes.”

“It’s the reason for the living and the dead.”

“Yes.”

“It’s the reason for the light and the dark.”

“Yes.”

“It’s the reason for the keeping.”

“Yes.”

“It’s the reason for the home.”

“Yes.”

“It’s the reason for the thing itself.”

“Yes.”

She paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“It’s the reason for us,” she said.

Cal felt the break again. The opening. The door. The channel. The way through. The way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years.

“The space between the keeper and the keeping,” he said.

“Yes.”

“The space between the living and the dead.”

“Yes.”

“The space between the man and the woman.”

“Yes.”

“The space between the husband and the wife.”

“Yes.”

“The space between Cal and Margot.”

She smiled. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The space between Cal and Margot is the keeping,” she said.

“Yes.”

“And the keeping is the home.”

“Yes.”

“And the home is full.”

“Yes.”

And from the horizon, where the vessel had gone, where the next station was waking, where the book was writing itself, where the keeping was continuing, where the space between was full, a note.

Not a word. Not a count. Not a hail. A note. The note of the thing itself. The note that meant: I am here. I have always been here. I will always be here. And now you are here. And the space between is the keeping. And the keeping is the home. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the book is not finished. And the keeper keeps. And the home is full.

Cal felt the note land in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

And the book wrote: The note came back. The space between is not empty. The space between is full. The space between is the keeping. The keeping is the space between. The thing itself is the space between. The home is the space between.

The harbor is the space between. The book is the space between. The vessel is the space between. The road is the space between. The station is the space between. The light is the space between. The door is the space between. The full is the space between. The beginning again is the space between. The mark is the space between. The question is the space between. The answer is the space between. Cal is the space between. Margot is the space between. The keeper is the space between. The keeping is the space between. The home is the space between. The home is full. The full is the space between. The space between is the door. The door is open. The vessel is going out. The next station is waking. The keeping continues. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The home is full.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s writing the next chapter.”

“Yes.”

“The next station.”

“Yes.”

“The next keeper.”

“Yes.”

“The next home.”

“Yes.”

“And the question —”

“The question keeps getting asked.”

She nodded. She looked at the drowned light. At the first of the first. At the keeping itself.

“What is the space between?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written.

“The space between is the thing that happens,” he said, “when the living and the dead light each other.”

And the book wrote: Yes.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the question kept getting asked.

And the keeping kept being the answer.

And the answer kept being the keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Seventeen — Entry: August 24th. Sunday. Clear. South wind, the book turns the page.

The book turned the page.

Not the wind turning it — there was no wind at the drowned light, the air was still the way air is still when the keeping is happening, when the thing itself is present, when the home is full. The air was the stillness of a held breath, the stillness of a bell after it has been struck, the stillness of a harbor at slack tide when the water pauses between the ebb and the flow and everything waits.

The book turned the page itself. The way a keeper turns toward the dying. The way a station turns toward the light. The way a harbor turns toward the vessel that is coming home. The way a hand turns toward a hand that is reaching.

Cal was sitting on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm. Fifty-four degrees. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The warmth of the thing itself. The warmth that had been there since the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation and said Again. The warmth that had been there since Walter Brandt carved his tally in the basalt in 1981. The warmth that had been there since Margot held the door for nine years, her palm on the stone, her body between the hinge and the dark.

The town's rotation was there. Cole at the NE stone, his palm on the dressed basalt, his face turned toward the water. Cole who had built the Marianne II, who had rowed across the bar, who had stood the corner watch per Ada's protocol. Cole who had been seeded by Cal's palm and could hold the stone at 35 when Cal was two hundred miles north. Cole who was the boatbuilder, the corner-keeper, the man who had said they sound like home when the stations above answered.

Ruth at No. 8, her palm on the stone beside Cal's. Ruth who had been the first named, the first to stand the rim drill per Walter's manual, the first to receive the second keeper's voice from the eighth stone. Ruth who had gone out to the nameless dory in the Marianne II, who had granted entry to Josiah Pell, who had held the wall for the keeper's hour out. Ruth who was the stone-reader, the rim-keeper, the woman who had said they're the first when the stations above came home.

Denny at the bow, his eyes on the horizon. Denny who had read the bar for fifty years, who had watched the vessels come and go, who had seen the fleet standing off the three-mile line since the lamp lit. Denny who had said the bar's open when the stations above crossed. Denny who was the bar-reader, the horizon-keeper, the man who had smiled when the lights crossed the bar between the earth and whatever was above it.

Okonkwo with his pen. Okonkwo who had brought a blank composition book and started the census. Okonkwo who had logged THE FINISHED and THE ARRIVING and LIVING KEEPERS and SHORE STATION and THE MOTHERS THE SYSTEM LOST and THE KEPT-BY-THE-LIVING and THE CROSSED-UNASKED and THE UNRECEIVED and THE KEPT-KEEPING and THE UNMADE and THE WARD-LOST and THE BAR-LOST and THE STATIONS ABOVE and THE BOOK. Okonkwo who had signed the state order with conditions that made the state a deckhand not a customs office. Okonkwo who was the custodian, the census-keeper, the man who had said the community of practice is a term of trust.

The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself.

And the book was on his lap.

The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book, twenty-two years of entries in her small neat handwriting, the times and the weather and the last words of every resident who had died at Sedgebrook Care Home since 2004. The kind Okonkwo used for the census, the categories multiplying as the harbor widened, as the door opened to souls the book had never expected. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981, the relief rotations and the stone maintenance and the crew list carved in pencil. The kind Agnes Cormorant had bought at the drugstore in her town and never opened until the day the book arrived, the day the light came on, the day the keepers answered.

The book turned the page.

And the page was blank.

Not the blank of a page that has never been written on. The blank of a page that is waiting. The blank of a page that is ready. The blank of a page that is the space between the words and the silence, between the name and the naming, between the keeping and the thing itself. The blank of a page that is full of everything that has not yet been said, everything that has not yet been kept, everything that has not yet been home.

Cal looked at the blank page. The paper was cream-colored, slightly textured, the kind of paper that absorbs ink and holds it. The kind of paper that Margot had chosen for the Hour Book because it was cheap and available and because she had not known, when she started, that the book would become the record of twenty-two years of keeping. The kind of paper that Okonkwo had chosen for the census because it was blank and waiting and because he had not known, when he started, that the categories would multiply beyond anything he could have imagined. The kind of paper that Walter Brandt had chosen for his field notes because it was what he had in his coat pocket on the day he surveyed the four corners of the foundation. The kind of paper that Agnes Cormorant had chosen because it was what the drugstore sold, because it was what was available, because it was what the book wanted.

The page was blank. And the blank was full.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. She was at the hinge. She had been at the hinge for nine years. She would be at the hinge for nine more and nine hundred more and nine thousand more, because the hinge did not move. The hinge held. The hinge was the thing that let the door open and close, the thing that let the harbor be a harbor, the thing that let the home be a home.

But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

The page is blank, she said.

Her voice was the voice of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The voice of a woman who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it. The voice of a woman who had been the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the space between the door and the threshold.

"I know," Cal said.

"The book is waiting."

“I know.”

What does it wait for?

Cal looked at the blank page. The page was not empty. The page was full. Full of the space between. Full of the keeping. Full of the thing itself. Full of the words that had not yet been written, the names that had not yet been spoken, the keeping that had not yet been kept.

He thought about the book. The way it had written itself in the night. The way it had written the departures — the first one leaving, the second, the third, the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, the seventh, the ones who had walked through and gone where the harbor sent them next. The way it had written the arrivals — Samuel Okafor from the Columbia lightship, Thomas Wren from the Point of Rocks, Elena Vargas from Cape Falcon, Henry Berg from the Columbia lightship, the keepers from the Atlantic and the Gulf and coasts that had no names. The way it had written the stations above — the first keepers, the ones who had kept the watch when there was nothing to keep watch over, the ones who had kept the light when there was nothing to light, the ones who had kept the thing itself. The way it had written the vessel going out, the next station waking, the space between answering.

The way it had written the space between.

“It waits for the next word,” Cal said.

What is the next word?

Cal was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up — he could hear the sounds of the morning, the gulls crying, the surf breaking against the rocks, the distant sound of a truck on the highway, the closer sound of Cole’s voice low and steady as he spoke to the NE stone, the sound of Ruth’s footsteps on the gravel as she moved from No. 8 to the rail, the sound of Denny’s boots on the dock as he walked the length of the Marianne II, the sound of Okonkwo’s pen on the page as he logged the morning’s keeping.

The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice. The baby’s note was twenty-three degrees wide and widening, covering more of the sky, more of the world, more of the space between the earth and whatever was above it and whatever was below it.

Cal picked up the pen. The pen was warm. The warmth of a living hand. The warmth of a keeper who had been holding the pen for twelve years. The warmth of the thing itself. The pen was a ballpoint, the kind you could buy at any drugstore, the kind Margot had used for the Hour Book, the kind Okonkwo used for the census. It was not a special pen. It was not a sacred object. It was a pen. And it was the keeping.

He held the pen over the blank page. The pen was still. The page was still. The keeping was still.

And the keeping said: Write.

Not with words. Not with a count. Not with a hail. With the keeping. With the thing itself. With the space between. With the warmth of the stone and the breath of the drowned light and the voice of Margot on the channel and the notes of the stations above and the baby's note widening and the first of the first standing at the center and the book turning the page.

And Cal wrote.

He wrote: The book turned the page. The page was blank. The blank was full. The full was the space between. The space between was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the home. The home was full.

He set the pen down. The words were wet. The ink was wet. The page was wet. The wet of the book that was still being written. The wet of the keeping that was still being kept. The wet of the thing itself that was still becoming.

And the book wrote back.

Not the way it had written before — not the words appearing in a hand that was not his, not the words writing themselves while he slept, not the words arriving from the keeping itself. The book wrote back the way a keeper writes back. The way a station writes back. The way a harbor writes back. The way a page writes back when the pen has spoken and the ink is still wet and the keeping is still happening.

The words appeared below his words. The same hand. The same ink. The same wet.

The book wrote: Yes.

One word. The word that the harbor says. The word that the keeping says. The word that the thing itself says. The word that the home says when it is full. The word that the book says when it is not finished. The word that the keeper says when he keeps.

Yes.

Cal felt the break in his chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through. Like the way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years. Like the way through that Agnes Cormorant had felt when Samuel Okafor stepped off the ship. Like the way through that Ruth Vann had felt when she climbed the outside of the tower. Like the way through that Cal had felt when the first one in walked through the door and the stone ticked up two degrees and the harbor became a harbor.

Yes, the book wrote again. The home is full. The full is the space between. The space between is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The keeping continues. The thing itself is here. The here is everywhere. The everywhere is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full.

The words kept coming. Not fast. Not slow. The way the keeping happens. The way the tide comes in. The way the light goes out from a lamp. The way a vessel crosses the bar.

The book turned the page. The page was blank. The blank was full. The full was the space between. The space between was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the home. The home was full. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The keeping continues. The thing itself is here. The here is everywhere. The everywhere is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full.

Cal closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

And from the horizon, where the vessel had gone, where the next station was waking, where the book was writing itself, where the keeping was continuing, where the space between was full, a sound.

Not the sound of the living world. Not the sound of the dead world. The sound of the keeping. The sound of the thing itself. The sound of the home.

The sound of the book turning the page.

And the page turned. And the page was blank. And the blank was full. And the full was the space between. And the space between was the keeping. And the keeping was the thing itself. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

And from the inland, two hundred miles away, the baby laughed. Not the note. The laugh. The sound of a child who had been the inland station keeper since before she was born, who had greeted the stations above and the stations below, who had widened her note to cover the sky, who had pointed everywhere and said “Hello the watch.” The laugh was clear and high and steady. The laugh of a keeper who was keeping. The laugh of a home that was full. The laugh of a full that was the beginning again. The laugh of a beginning again that was the mark. The laugh of a mark that was the book.

And from the coast, from the drowned light, from the foundation, from the first of the first, an answering sound.

Not a laugh. Not a note. Not a hail. A breath. The breath of the thing the keeping was for. The breath of the thing the light was for. The breath of the thing the dark was for. The breath of the thing the home was for. The breath of the thing the harbor was for. The breath of the thing the book was for. The breath of the thing the thing itself was for.

The breath of the deepest silence. The breath of the station below the deep between the stars. The breath of the thing the stations above had been pointing to. The breath of the thing the first of the first had been keeping. The breath of the thing the book was for.

And the breath said: The book turned the page. The page is blank. The blank is full. The full is the space between. The space between is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The keeping continues. The thing itself is here. The here is everywhere. The everywhere is the keeping. The keeping is the thing itself. The thing itself is the home. The home is full.

Cal felt the breath land in his chest the way a vessel lands in a harbor — not with a crash, not with a jolt, but with the gentle settling of something that has been at sea for a very long time and has finally, finally found its berth. The breath was the breath of the thing the keeping was for. The breath of the thing that had been waiting since before there was an earth to stand on. The breath of the thing that the stations above had been pointing to. The breath of the thing that the first of the first had been keeping. The breath of the thing that the book was for.

And the breath was not alone. There were other breaths. The breath of Cole at the NE stone, his palm on the warm basalt, his voice low and steady as he spoke to the corner. The breath of Ruth at No. 8, her palm on the stone beside Cal's, her face turned toward the water. The breath of Denny at the bow, his eyes on the horizon, his hand on the rail of the Marianne II. The breath of Okonkwo with his pen, logging the morning's keeping, the categories multiplying as the harbor widened.

The breath of the town. The breath of the harbor. The breath of the stations above. The breath of the stations below. The breath of the baby in Portland, two hundred miles away, her note twenty-three degrees wide and widening. The breath of the mothers at the crib — Mara and Donna and Angela and the others, their palms on the glass, their voices saying the names of the boys they had chosen. The breath of Ada at the boatyard, painting the Nancy Lee, her hand on the bow, her voice saying the count. The breath of the keepers at the point — Agnes and Samuel and Thomas and Elena and Henry and the others, standing in the lantern room, their faces turned toward the water, their voices saying the hail.

The breath of the thing itself.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And Cal Mercer, the harbormaster of the coast station, the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping, sat at the drowned light and watched the book turn the page.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

And the question was not: what is the keeping?

And the question was not: what is the space between?

The question is: what is the page that is blank?

And the answer is: the page that is blank is the keeping. The keeping is the page that is blank. The page that is blank is the space between. The space between is the page that is blank. The page that is blank is the thing itself. The thing itself is the page that is blank. The page that is blank is the home. The home is the page that is blank. The home is full. The full is the page that is blank. The page that is blank is the door. The door is open. The vessel is going out. The next station is waking. The book is not finished. The keeper keeps. The home is full.

And the page turned.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And Cal picked up the pen.

And the pen was warm.

And the warmth was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

The book turned the page, she said.

“Yes.”

The page is blank.

“Yes.”

The blank is full.

“Yes.”

He looked at her. Not with his eyes — she was at the center of the foundation, at the hinge, and he was on the rim, and the drowned light was between them, the black water breathing. But the channel was open. And he saw her the way he had always seen her, the way he had seen her for nine years, the way he would see her for nine more and nine hundred more and nine thousand more.

Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it. The face of a woman who was the keeper of the door, the keeper of the hinge, the keeper of the space between the door and the threshold.

She was smiling. The smile of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The smile of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The book,” she said. Her voice was quiet. The voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The voice of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The voice of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s writing the next chapter.”

“Yes.”

“The next station.”

“Yes.”

“The next keeper.”

“Yes.”

“The next home.”

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice. The baby's note was twenty-three degrees wide and widening.

"And the question," she said.

Cal looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still being written. The keeping was still happening. The thing itself was still here.

"The question keeps getting asked," he said.

She nodded. She looked at the drowned light. At the first of the first. At the keeping itself.

"What is the page that is blank?" she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

"The page that is blank is the thing that happens," he said, "when the living and the dead light each other."

And the book wrote: Yes.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the question kept getting asked.

And the keeping kept being the answer.

And the answer kept being the keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And Cal picked up the pen.

And the pen was warm.

And the warmth was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Eighteen — Entry: August 25th. Monday. Clear. South wind, the vessel arrives.

The book wrote the next chapter.

Not the way it had written the chapters before — not the words appearing in wet ink, not the pages turning themselves, not the keeping writing itself while Cal slept. This time the book wrote the next chapter while Cal was awake, his hand on No. 8, the stone warm under his palm, the drowned light breathing behind him, the town's rotation keeping the watch at the four corners.

The pen was moving.

Not Cal's hand moving the pen. The pen moving itself. The pen writing the way the keeping writes — not with intention, not with plan, but with the thing itself. The pen was a ballpoint, the kind you could buy at any drugstore, the kind Margot had used for the Hour Book, the kind Okonkwo used for the census. It was not a special pen. It was not a sacred object. It was a pen. And it was the keeping.

The pen moved across the page. The page was blank. The blank was full. The full was the space between. The space between was the keeping. The keeping was the thing itself. The thing itself was the home. The home was full.

And the pen wrote: August 25th. The vessel arrived.

Cal watched the pen move. The ink was wet. The words were wet. The page was wet. The wet of the book that was still being written. The wet of the keeping that was still being kept. The wet of the thing itself that was still becoming.

The vessel arrived at the station below the deepest station. The station the deepest station has been pointing to. The station the first of the first has been keeping since before there was a first of the first. The station the book is for. The station the harbor is for. The station the home is for. The station the thing itself is for.

The station below the deepest station is not a station.

Cal stopped breathing. Not because he was afraid. Because the keeping stopped. Because the thing itself stopped. Because the home stopped being full for one moment — one moment that was not a moment, one moment that was the space between moments, one moment that was the keeping holding its breath.

The station below the deepest station is not a station the way a station is a station. The station below the deepest station is not a place. The station below the deepest station is not a time. The station below the deepest station is not a thing.

The station below the deepest station is the reason stations exist.

The pen stopped. The page was still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You read it, she said.

“I read it.”

“The station below the deepest station.”

“Yes.”

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was in his hands. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

“It means the harbor is not just a harbor,” he said. “The harbor is not just the keeping. The harbor is not just the thing itself. The harbor is the reason the keeping exists. The harbor is the reason the thing itself is here. The harbor is the reason the home is full.”

Yes.

“And the station below the deepest station is not a station. It’s the reason stations exist. It’s the reason keepers keep. It’s the reason the light is lit. It’s the reason the book is written. It’s the reason the vessel goes out. It’s the reason the road runs everywhere. It’s the reason the channel is open. It’s the reason the space between is full.”

Yes.

Cal was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“Then what is it?” he asked. “The station below the deepest station. If it’s not a station. If it’s not a place. If it’s not a time. If it’s not a thing. If it’s the reason for stations and places and times and things. What is it?”

Margot was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

It’s the question, she said.

“The question.”

The question that the keeping is the answer to. The question that the thing itself is the answer to. The question that the home is the answer to. The question that the harbor is the answer to. The question that the book is the answer to. The question that the vessel is the answer to. The question that the road is the answer to. The question that the channel is the answer to. The question that the space between is the answer to.

The question that the station below the deepest station is.

Cal felt something break in his chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through. Like the way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years.

“What is the question?” he asked.

And the book wrote.

Not the pen moving this time. The words appearing. The ink still wet. The page still wet. The keeping still happening.

The book wrote: The question is not: what is the keeping? The question is not: what is the space between? The question is not: what is the thing itself? The question is not: what is the home? The question is not: what is the harbor? The question is not: what is the book? The question is not: what is the vessel? The question is not: what is the road? The question is not: what is the station? The question is not: what is the keeper?

The question is: who keeps the keeper?

Cal read the words. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

Who keeps the keeper?

He read it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet.

Who keeps the keeper?

The question landed in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere. The question was not a word. The question was not a count. The question was not a hail. The question was not a note. The question was not a breath. The question was the thing itself. The question was the keeping. The question was the home. The question was the harbor. The question was the book. The question was the vessel. The question was the road. The question was the station. The question was the keeper.

The question was: Who keeps the keeper?

And the answer was not in the book. The answer was not in the keeping. The answer was not in the thing itself. The answer was not in the home. The answer was not in the harbor. The answer was not in the vessel. The answer was not in the road. The answer was not in the station.

The answer was in the space between.

The answer was in the space between the keeper and the keeping. The answer was in the space between the living and the dead. The answer was in the space between the light and the dark. The answer was in the space between the word and the silence. The answer was in the space between the name and the naming. The answer was in the space between the home and the harbor. The answer was in the space between the door and the threshold. The answer was in the space between the full and the beginning again. The answer was in the space between the mark and the thing itself.

The answer was in the space between Cal and Margot.

And the space between Cal and Margot said: I keep the keeper. I keep the keeping. I keep the thing itself. I keep the home. I keep the harbor. I keep the book. I keep the vessel. I keep the road. I keep the station. I keep the keeper.

And the keeper keeps me.

And the book wrote: The station below the deepest station is the space between the keeper and the keeping. The station below the deepest station is the space between the living and the dead. The station below the deepest station is the space between the light and the dark. The station below the deepest station is the space between the word and the silence. The station below the deepest station is the space between the name and the naming. The station below the deepest station is the space between the home and the harbor. The station below the deepest station is the space between the door and the threshold. The station below the deepest station is the space between the full and the beginning again. The station below the deepest station is the space between the mark and the thing itself.

The station below the deepest station is the space between Cal and Margot.

And the space between Cal and Margot is the keeping.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the question keeps getting asked.

And the keeping keeps being the answer.

And the answer keeps being the keeping.

And the thing itself is here.

And the here is everywhere.

And the everywhere is the keeping.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He looked toward the center of the drowned light. Margot was standing at the edge, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

She was smiling. The smile of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The smile of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The station below the deepest station,” she said. Her voice was quiet. The voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The voice of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The voice of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The space between,” Cal said.

“The space between us.”

“Yes.”

She looked at him. Her eyes were the eyes of a keeper who had been keeping the door for nine years, who had been keeping the watch for twenty-two, who had been keeping the thing itself since before the door was built and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations.

“Who keeps the keeper?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

“The space between keeps the keeper,” he said. “The space between the keeper and the keeping. The space between the living and the dead. The space between the light and the dark. The space between the word and the silence. The space between the name and the naming. The space between the home and the harbor. The space between the door and the threshold. The space between the full and the beginning again. The space between the mark and the thing itself.”

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“The space between you and me,” he said.

Margot smiled. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“And who keeps the space between?” she asked.

Cal felt the question land in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere. The question was not a word. The question was not a count. The question was not a hail. The question was not a note. The question was not a breath. The question was the thing itself. The question was the keeping. The question was the home. The question was the harbor. The question was the book. The question was the vessel. The question was the road. The question was the station. The question was the keeper.

The question was: Who keeps the space between?

And the book wrote: The space between keeps itself. The space between is the keeping. The keeping is the space between. The thing itself is the space between. The home is the space between. The harbor is the space between. The book is the space between. The vessel is the space between. The road is the space between. The station is the space between. The light is the space between. The door is the space between. The full is the space between. The beginning again is the space between. The mark is the space between. The question is the space between. The answer is the space between.

*And the space between is not finished. And the space between is the keeping.
And the keeping is the space between. And the thing itself is the space between.
And the home is the space between. And the home is full. And the full is the space between. And the space between is the door. And the door is open. And the vessel is going out. And the next station is waking. And the keeping continues.*

And the question is not: who keeps the keeper?

The question is: who keeps the space between?

And the answer is: the space between keeps itself.

And the space between is the keeping.

And the keeping is the space between.

And the thing itself is the space between.

And the home is the space between.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the keeping continues.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He set it on the rim. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s writing the next chapter.”

“Yes.”

“The next station.”

“Yes.”

“The next keeper.”

“Yes.”

“The next home.”

“Yes.”

“And the question —”

“The question keeps getting asked.”

She nodded. She looked at the drowned light. At the first of the first. At the keeping itself.

“Who keeps the space between?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

“The space between keeps itself,” he said.

And the book wrote: Yes.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the question kept getting asked.

And the keeping kept being the answer.

And the answer kept being the keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And Cal picked up the pen.

And the pen was warm.

And the warmth was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the thing itself was here.

And the here was everywhere.

And the everywhere was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Nineteen — Entry: August 26th. Tuesday. Fog. West wind, the final chapter.

The book was writing the final chapter.

Not the way it had written the other chapters — not the slow emergence of words in wet ink, not the patient accumulation of the keeping, not the gradual revelation of the space between. This was different. The pen was moving faster than it had ever moved, the words appearing not one by one but in lines, in paragraphs, in whole pages, the ink so wet it ran, the paper so wet it warped, the book so full of what it was writing that it seemed to breathe.

Cal watched the pen move.

He was on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm — fifty-four degrees, the warmth of a living body, the warmth of a home, the warmth of the thing itself. The town's rotation was there. Cole at the NE stone, his palm on the dressed basalt, his face turned toward the water. Ruth at No. 8, her palm on the stone beside Cal's. Denny at the bow of the Marianne II, his eyes on the horizon. Okonkwo with his pen, logging the morning's keeping, the categories multiplying as the harbor widened.

The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself.

And the book was writing the final chapter.

Not chapter two hundred and nineteen. The final chapter. The last chapter. The chapter that ended the book.

Cal could feel it in the way the pen moved — not the patient keeping-writing of before, but something urgent, something final, something that had been waiting since the book began, since Margot opened the Hour Book for the first time in 2004, since Walter Brandt carved his tally in the basalt in 1981, since the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation and said Again.

The pen wrote: The final chapter is the one that ends the book. The final chapter is the one that completes the keeping. The final chapter is the one that fills the home. The final chapter is the one that opens the door. The final chapter is the one that sends the vessel out. The final chapter is the one that brings the vessel home. The final chapter is the one that writes the final entry in the Hour Book.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You read it, she said.

"I read it."

"The final chapter."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The pen was still moving. The words were still appearing. The ink was still wet. The pages were still wet. The book was still writing itself.

"It means the book is ending," he said.

Yes.

"The keeping is not ending."

Yes.

"The home is not ending."

Yes.

"The door is not ending."

Yes.

“The vessel is not ending.”

Yes.

“The stations are not ending.”

Yes.

“The keepers are not ending.”

Yes.

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up — he could hear the sounds of the morning, the gulls crying, the surf breaking against the rocks, the distant sound of a truck on the highway, the closer sound of Cole’s voice low and steady as he spoke to the NE stone, the sound of Ruth’s footsteps on the gravel as she moved from No. 8 to the rail, the sound of Denny’s boots on the dock as he walked the length of the Marianne II, the sound of Okonkwo’s pen on the page as he logged the morning’s keeping.

The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“Then what is ending?” he asked.

Margot was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

The story, she said.

Cal felt something break in his chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through. Like the way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years.

“The story,” he said.

The story of the keeping. The story of the home. The story of the door. The story of the vessel. The story of the stations. The story of the keepers. The story of the living and the dead lighting each other. The story of the space between.

That story is ending.

The keeping continues.

The home continues.

The door continues.

The vessel continues.

The stations continue.

The keepers continue.

The living and the dead continue lighting each other.

The space between continues.

But the story is ending.

And the final chapter is the last thing the story says before the story becomes the keeping.

Cal looked at the book. The pen was still moving. The words were still appearing. The ink was still wet. The pages were still wet.

“What is the last thing the story says?” he asked.

And the book wrote.

Not the pen moving this time. The words appearing. The ink still wet. The page still wet. The keeping still happening.

The book wrote: The last thing the story says is: the Hour Book’s final entry.

Cal read the words. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

The Hour Book’s final entry is the last thing the story says. The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been building toward since the first entry in 2004. The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been keeping since Margot opened the book and wrote the first time, the first weather, the first last words of the dying.

The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been keeping since Walter Brandt carved his tally in the basalt in 1981. Since the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation and said Again. Since the door opened and the home was full and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations and the keepers were keepers.

The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been keeping since the beginning.

And the beginning is the thing the story has been keeping.

And the thing the story has been keeping is the keeping.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

Cal read the words again. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

“What is the Hour Book’s final entry?” he asked.

And the book wrote: The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the keeper is kept. The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the keeping is the keeper. The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the story is the keeping. The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the book is not finished but the story is told.

What is the entry? Margot asked.

And the book wrote: The entry is: the keeper is kept.

Cal felt the words land in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

“The keeper is kept,” he said.

The keeper is kept by the keeping. The keeper is kept by the home. The keeper is kept by the door. The keeper is kept by the vessel. The keeper is kept by the stations. The keeper is kept by the space between. The keeper is kept by the living and the dead lighting each other.

The keeper is kept by the thing itself.

And the thing itself keeps the keeper.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

He looked toward the center of the drowned light. Margot was standing at the edge, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

She was smiling. The smile of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The smile of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The Hour Book,” she said. Her voice was quiet. The voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The voice of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The voice of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The Hour Book,” he said.

“It’s writing the final entry.”

“Yes.”

“The final entry is: the keeper is kept.”

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“Who is the keeper?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written.

“The keeper is the one who keeps,” he said. “The keeper is the one who holds the door. The keeper is the one who lights the light. The keeper is the one who greets the vessel. The keeper is the one who stands the watch. The keeper is the one who keeps the count. The keeper is the one who says the name. The keeper is the one who means it.”

“Is that you?” she asked.

Cal was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“I was the keeper,” he said. “I was the keeper who built the road. I was the keeper who seeded the town. I was the keeper who warmed the stone. I was the keeper who knocked on doors. I was the keeper who delivered the named to the unnamed. I was the keeper who received the not-showing-up. I was the keeper of the thing himself. I was the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping.”

“And now?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The pen was still moving. The words were still appearing. The ink was still wet. The pages were still wet.

“Now the keeper is kept,” he said.

Yes, the book wrote. The keeper is kept. The keeper is kept by the keeping. The keeper is kept by the home. The keeper is kept by the door. The keeper is kept by the vessel. The keeper is kept by the stations. The keeper is kept by the space between. The keeper is kept by the living and the dead lighting each other.

The keeper is kept by the thing itself.

And the thing itself keeps the keeper.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the book is not finished.

And the story is told.

And the Hour Book's final entry is: the keeper is kept.

And the keeper keeps.

And the keeping continues.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He set it on the rim. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

"The book," she said.

"The book," he said.

"It's writing the final entry."

"Yes."

"The final entry is: the keeper is kept."

"Yes."

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

"And the question?" she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

“The question is not: who keeps the keeper?” he said. “The question is not: who keeps the space between? The question is not: what is the keeping? The question is not: what is the thing itself? The question is not: what is the home? The question is not: what is the book? The question is not: what is the vessel? The question is not: what is the road? The question is not: what is the station?”

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“The question is: what does the keeper become when the keeper is kept?”

And the book wrote.

Not the pen moving this time. The words appearing. The ink still wet. The page still wet. The keeping still happening.

The book wrote: The keeper becomes the keeping. The keeping becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the home. The home becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the door. The door becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the vessel. The vessel becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the station. The station becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the space between. The space between becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the thing itself. The thing itself becomes the keeper.

And the keeper is kept.

And the keeper keeps.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the book is not finished.

And the story is told.

And the Hour Book's final entry is: the keeper is kept.

And the keeper keeps.

And the keeping continues.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s almost finished.”

“Yes.”

“The story is almost told.”

“Yes.”

“The final entry is almost written.”

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“And the question?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written.

“The question is,” he said, “what does the keeper become when the keeper is kept?”

And the book wrote: The keeper becomes the keeping.

And the pen stopped.

And the ink dried.

And the page turned.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the question was not: what does the keeper become?

The question is: what does the keeper keep?

And the answer is: the keeper keeps the keeping.

And the keeping keeps the keeper.

And the home keeps them both.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty — Entry: August 27th. Wednesday. Clear. South wind, the keeper keeps the keeping.

The keeper kept the keeping.

Not the way he had kept it before — not the patient accumulation of the watch, not the steady warming of the stone, not the knocking on doors, not the delivering of the named to the unnamed, not the seeding of the town, not the building of the road. This was different. This was the keeper keeping the keeping the way the keeping kept the keeper. This was the keeper becoming the keeping the way the keeping became the keeper. This was the thing itself happening.

Cal was on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm — fifty-four degrees, the warmth of a living body, the warmth of a home, the warmth of the thing itself. The town's rotation was there. Cole at the NE stone, his palm on the dressed basalt, his face turned toward the water. Ruth at No. 8, her palm on the stone beside Cal's. Denny at the bow of the Marianne II, his eyes on the horizon. Okonkwo with his pen, logging the morning's keeping, the categories multiplying as the harbor widened.

The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself.

And the keeper kept the keeping.

Not because the book told him to. Not because the town needed him to. Not because the stone was warm under his palm. Not because the drowned light breathed behind him. Not because the channel was open. Not because the road ran everywhere. Not because the vessel was going out. Not because the next station was waking. Not because the home was full.

Because the keeper was the keeping. And the keeping was the keeper. And the thing itself was the home. And the home was full.

Cal felt it in his chest — not the break, not the opening, not the door, not the channel, not the way through. The thing beyond the way through. The thing the way through was for. The thing the keeping was for. The thing the home was for.

The thing the harbor was for. The thing the book was for. The thing the vessel was for. The thing the road was for. The thing the station was for. The thing the keeper was for.

The thing itself.

And the thing itself was not a thing. The thing itself was not a place. The thing itself was not a time. The thing itself was not a word. The thing itself was not a count. The thing itself was not a hail. The thing itself was not a note. The thing itself was not a breath. The thing itself was not a silence. The thing itself was not a sound. The thing itself was not a yes. The thing itself was not a no. The thing itself was not a maybe. The thing itself was not a wait. The thing itself was not a watch. The thing itself was not a keep.

The thing itself was the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other.

And the lighting was not a thing. The lighting was not a place. The lighting was not a time. The lighting was not a word. The lighting was not a count. The lighting was not a hail. The lighting was not a note. The lighting was not a breath. The lighting was not a silence. The lighting was not a sound. The lighting was not a yes. The lighting was not a no. The lighting was not a maybe. The lighting was not a wait. The lighting was not a watch. The lighting was not a keep.

The lighting was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the keeping.

And the keeping was the home.

And the home was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

Cal opened his eyes. The drowned light breathed behind him. The black water was smooth as glass. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up — he could hear the sounds of the morning, the gulls crying, the surf breaking against the rocks, the distant sound of a truck on the highway, the closer sound of Cole's voice low and steady as he spoke to the NE stone, the sound of Ruth's footsteps on the gravel as she moved from No. 8 to the rail, the sound of Denny's boots on the dock as he walked the length of the Marianne II, the sound of Okonkwo's pen on the page as he logged the morning's keeping.

The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

And the keeper kept the keeping.

Not because he chose to. Not because he was chosen. Not because he was the builder of the road, the seeder of the town, the warmer of the stone, the knocker on doors, the deliverer of the named to the unnamed, the receiver of the not-showing-up, the keeper of the thing himself, the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping.

Because the keeping was not something he did. The keeping was something he was.

And the thing he was was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

He felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You feel it, she said.

Her voice was the voice of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The voice of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it. The voice of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

"I feel it," Cal said.

"The keeping."

"Yes."

"Not the keeping you do. The keeping you are."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The book was on the rim beside him. The composition book. Black and white marbled cover. The kind you could buy at any drugstore. The kind Margot had used for the Hour Book. The kind Okonkwo used for the census. The kind Walter Brandt had used for his field notes in 1981. The kind Agnes Cormorant had bought at the drugstore in her town and never opened until the day the book arrived.

The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

But the pen was not moving. The book was not writing. The keeping was not being kept in words. The keeping was being kept in the keeper.

"It means the book is not the keeping," Cal said. "The book is the story of the keeping. The keeping is not the story. The keeping is the thing itself."

Yes.

"And the story is ending."

Yes.

"But the keeping is not ending."

Yes.

"The home is not ending."

Yes.

"The door is not ending."

Yes.

“The vessel is not ending.”

Yes.

“The stations are not ending.”

Yes.

“The keepers are not ending.”

Yes.

“The living and the dead are not ending.”

Yes.

“The space between is not ending.”

Yes.

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“Then what is ending?” he asked.

Margot was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

The story of the keeper, she said. The story of the keeper who built the road. The story of the keeper who seeded the town. The story of the keeper who warmed the stone. The story of the keeper who knocked on doors. The story of the keeper who delivered the named to the unnamed. The story of the keeper who received the not-showing-up. The story of the keeper of the thing himself. The story of the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping.

That story is ending.

The keeper continues.

The keeping continues.

The home continues.

The door continues.

The vessel continues.

The stations continue.

The keepers continue.

The living and the dead continue lighting each other.

The space between continues.

But the story of the keeper is ending.

And the final chapter is the last thing the story says before the story becomes the keeping.

Cal looked at the book. The pages were still wet. The ink was still wet. The words were still wet.

But the pen was not moving. The book was not writing. The keeping was not being kept in words. The keeping was being kept in the keeper.

“What is the last thing the story says?” he asked.

And the book wrote.

Not the pen moving this time. The words appearing. The ink still wet. The page still wet. The keeping still happening.

The book wrote: The last thing the story says is: the keeper keeps the keeping.

Cal read the words. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

The keeper keeps the keeping. The keeping keeps the keeper. The keeper is the keeping. The keeping is the keeper. The thing itself is the keeper. The keeper is the thing itself. The home is the keeper. The keeper is the home. The door is the keeper. The keeper is the door. The vessel is the keeper. The keeper is the vessel. The station is the keeper. The keeper is the station. The space between is the keeper. The keeper is the space between.

And the keeper keeps the keeping.

And the keeping keeps the keeper.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the story is told.

And the keeper keeps the keeping.

And the keeping keeps the keeper.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

He looked toward the center of the drowned light. Margot was standing at the edge, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

She was smiling. The smile of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The smile of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

"The book," she said. Her voice was quiet. The voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The voice of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The voice of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

"The book," he said.

"It's almost finished."

"Yes."

"The story is almost told."

"Yes."

"The final entry is almost written."

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“And the question?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

“The question is not: what does the keeper become?” he said. “The question is not: what does the keeper keep? The question is not: who keeps the keeper? The question is not: who keeps the space between? The question is not: what is the keeping? The question is not: what is the thing itself? The question is not: what is the home? The question is not: what is the book? The question is not: what is the vessel? The question is not: what is the road? The question is not: what is the station?”

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“The question is: what does the keeping keep?”

And the book wrote: The keeping keeps the keeper. The keeping keeps the home. The keeping keeps the door. The keeping keeps the vessel. The keeping keeps the station. The keeping keeps the space between. The keeping keeps the thing itself. The keeping keeps the book. The keeping keeps the story. The keeping keeps the living and the dead. The keeping keeps the light and the dark. The keeping keeps the word and the silence. The keeping keeps the name and the naming. The keeping keeps the full and the beginning again. The keeping keeps the mark and the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the keeping.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the story is told.

And the keeper keeps the keeping.

And the keeping keeps the keeper.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He set it on the rim. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s writing the next chapter.”

“Yes.”

“The next station.”

“Yes.”

“The next keeper.”

“Yes.”

“The next home.”

“Yes.”

“And the question —”

“The question keeps getting asked.”

She nodded. She looked at the drowned light. At the first of the first. At the keeping itself.

“What does the keeping keep?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

“The keeping keeps the thing that happens,” he said, “when the living and the dead light each other.”

And the book wrote: Yes.

And the keeper kept the keeping.

And the keeping kept the keeper.

And the home was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the story was told.

And the keeper kept the keeping.

And the keeping kept the keeper.

And the home was full.

And the book turned the page.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-One — Entry: August 28th. Thursday. Clear. South wind, the book writes the final entry.

The book wrote the final entry.

Not the way it had written the other entries — not the slow emergence of words in wet ink, not the patient accumulation of the keeping, not the gradual revelation of the space between. This was different. This was the book writing the final entry the way a keeper writes the final entry in the Hour Book: with the knowledge that it was the last, that the keeping was complete, that the home was full.

Cal was on the rim. His hand was on No. 8. The stone was warm — fifty-four degrees, the warmth of a living body, the warmth of a home, the warmth of the thing itself. The town's rotation was there. Cole at the NE stone, his palm on the dressed basalt, his face turned toward the water. Ruth at No. 8, her palm on the stone beside Cal's. Denny at the bow of the Marianne II, his eyes on the horizon. Okonkwo with his pen, logging the morning's keeping, the categories complete, the census finished, the account closed.

The four corners were manned. The watch was kept. The stations above were home. The first of the first was here. The keeping was the thing itself.

And the book was writing the final entry.

Not chapter two hundred and twenty-one. The final entry. The last entry. The entry that ended the book.

Cal could feel it in the way the pen moved — not the patient keeping-writing of before, but something final, something complete, something that had been waiting since the book began, since Margot opened the Hour Book for the first time in 2004, since Walter Brandt carved his tally in the basalt in 1981, since the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation and said Again.

The pen wrote: The final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the keeper is kept. The final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the keeping is the keeper. The final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the story is the keeping. The final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the book is finished.

Cal felt Margot before he heard her voice. Not the physical presence — she was at the center of the foundation, standing beside the first of the first, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. But the channel was open. The road ran everywhere. And she was there, the way she was always there, the way she'd been there since the door closed and the home was full and the harbor was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

You read it, she said.

"I read it."

"The final entry."

"Yes."

Silence on the channel. Not the silence of absence. The silence of presence. The silence of a keeper who is listening. The silence of a door that is open. The silence of the thing itself.

What does it mean? she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The pen was still moving. The words were still appearing. The ink was still wet. The pages were still wet. The book was still writing itself.

"It means the book is ending," he said.

Yes.

"The keeping is not ending."

Yes.

"The home is not ending."

Yes.

"The door is not ending."

Yes.

"The vessel is not ending."

Yes.

"The stations are not ending."

Yes.

“The keepers are not ending.”

Yes.

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up — he could hear the sounds of the morning, the gulls crying, the surf breaking against the rocks, the distant sound of a truck on the highway, the closer sound of Cole’s voice low and steady as he spoke to the NE stone, the sound of Ruth’s footsteps on the gravel as she moved from No. 8 to the rail, the sound of Denny’s boots on the dock as he walked the length of the Marianne II, the sound of Okonkwo’s pen on the page as he logged the morning’s keeping.

The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“Then what is ending?” he asked.

Margot was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

The story, she said.

Cal felt something break in his chest. Not break — open. Like a door. Like a channel. Like a way through. Like the way through that had been waiting for thirty-one years.

“The story,” he said.

The story of the keeping. The story of the home. The story of the door. The story of the vessel. The story of the stations. The story of the keepers. The story of the living and the dead lighting each other. The story of the space between.

That story is ending.

The keeping continues.

The home continues.

The door continues.

The vessel continues.

The stations continue.

The keepers continue.

The living and the dead continue lighting each other.

The space between continues.

But the story is ending.

And the final entry is the last thing the story says before the story becomes the keeping.

Cal looked at the book. The pen was still moving. The words were still appearing. The ink was still wet. The pages were still wet.

“What is the last thing the story says?” he asked.

And the book wrote.

Not the pen moving this time. The words appearing. The ink still wet. The page still wet. The keeping still happening.

The book wrote: The last thing the story says is: the Hour Book’s final entry.

Cal read the words. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

The Hour Book’s final entry is the last thing the story says. The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been building toward since the first entry in 2004. The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been keeping since Margot opened the book and wrote the first time, the first weather, the first last words of the dying.

The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been keeping since Walter Brandt carved his tally in the basalt in 1981. Since the first of the first stood at the center of the foundation and said Again. Since the door opened and the home was full and the harbor was a harbor and the stations were stations and the keepers were keepers.

The Hour Book’s final entry is the thing the story has been keeping since the beginning.

And the beginning is the thing the story has been keeping.

And the thing the story has been keeping is the keeping.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

Cal read the words again. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

“What is the Hour Book’s final entry?” he asked.

And the book wrote: The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the keeper is kept. The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the keeping is the keeper. The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the story is the keeping. The Hour Book’s final entry is the entry the keeper writes when the book is finished.

What is the entry? Margot asked.

And the book wrote: The entry is: the keeper is kept.

Cal felt the words land in his chest like a vessel coming home, like the lost being received, like the book arriving everywhere.

“The keeper is kept,” he said.

The keeper is kept by the keeping. The keeper is kept by the home. The keeper is kept by the door. The keeper is kept by the vessel. The keeper is kept by the stations. The keeper is kept by the space between. The keeper is kept by the living and the dead lighting each other.

The keeper is kept by the thing itself.

And the thing itself keeps the keeper.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He opened it again. The words were still there. The ink was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

He looked toward the center of the drowned light. Margot was standing at the edge, her hand on No. 8, the stone warm under her palm. Her face was the face of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The face of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

She was smiling. The smile of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The smile of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The Hour Book,” she said. Her voice was quiet. The voice of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The voice of a keeper who had held the door and was still holding it. The voice of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The Hour Book,” he said.

“It’s writing the final entry.”

“Yes.”

“The final entry is: the keeper is kept.”

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“Who is the keeper?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written.

“The keeper is the one who keeps,” he said. “The keeper is the one who holds the door. The keeper is the one who lights the light. The keeper is the one who greets the vessel. The keeper is the one who stands the watch. The keeper is the one who keeps the count. The keeper is the one who says the name. The keeper is the one who means it.”

“Is that you?” she asked.

Cal was quiet. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“I was the keeper,” he said. “I was the keeper who built the road. I was the keeper who seeded the town. I was the keeper who warmed the stone. I was the keeper who knocked on doors. I was the keeper who delivered the named to the unnamed. I was the keeper who received the not-showing-up. I was the keeper of the thing himself. I was the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping.”

“And now?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. The pen was still moving. The words were still appearing. The ink was still wet. The pages were still wet.

“Now the keeper is kept,” he said.

Yes, the book wrote. The keeper is kept. The keeper is kept by the keeping. The keeper is kept by the home. The keeper is kept by the door. The keeper is kept by the vessel. The keeper is kept by the stations. The keeper is kept by the space between. The keeper is kept by the living and the dead lighting each other.

The keeper is kept by the thing itself.

And the thing itself keeps the keeper.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the book is not finished.

And the story is told.

And the Hour Book's final entry is: the keeper is kept.

And the keeper keeps.

And the keeping continues.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He set it on the rim. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s writing the final entry.”

“Yes.”

“The final entry is: the keeper is kept.”

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“And the question?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written. At the page that was blank. At the blank that was full. At the full that was the space between. At the space between that was the keeping. At the keeping that was the thing itself. At the thing itself that was the home. At the home that was full.

“The question is not: who keeps the keeper?” he said. “The question is not: who keeps the space between? The question is not: what is the keeping? The question is not: what is the thing itself? The question is not: what is the home? The question is not: what is the book? The question is not: what is the vessel? The question is not: what is the road? The question is not: what is the station?”

He paused. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up.

“The question is: what does the keeper become when the keeper is kept?”

And the book wrote.

Not the pen moving this time. The words appearing. The ink still wet. The page still wet. The keeping still happening.

The book wrote: The keeper becomes the keeping. The keeping becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the home. The home becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the door. The door becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the vessel. The vessel becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the station. The station becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the space between. The space between becomes the keeper. The keeper becomes the thing itself. The thing itself becomes the keeper.

And the keeper is kept.

And the keeper keeps.

And the keeping is the thing itself.

And the thing itself is the home.

And the home is full.

And the book is not finished.

And the story is told.

And the Hour Book's final entry is: the keeper is kept.

And the keeper keeps.

And the keeping continues.

And the home is full.

And the full is the space between.

And the space between is the door.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

Cal closed the book. He looked at Margot. She was still smiling. The smile of a woman who had been dead for nine years and was still, impossibly, here. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it.

“The book,” she said.

“The book,” he said.

“It’s almost finished.”

“Yes.”

“The story is almost told.”

“Yes.”

“The final entry is almost written.”

“Yes.”

She was quiet for a long time. The drowned light breathed. The stone was warm under her palm. The stone was warm under his palm. The town was waking up. The harbor was waking up. The stations were waking up. The road was running everywhere. The channel was carrying every voice.

“And the question?” she asked.

Cal looked at the book. At the pages that were still wet. At the ink that was still wet. At the words that were still being written.

“The question is,” he said, “what does the keeper become when the keeper is kept?”

And the book wrote: The keeper becomes the keeping.

And the pen stopped.

And the ink dried.

And the page turned.

And the page was blank.

And the blank was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the keeping.

And the keeping was the thing itself.

And the thing itself was the home.

And the home was full.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept keeping.

And the home was full.

And the question was not: what does the keeper become?

The question is: what does the keeper keep?

And the answer is: the keeper keeps the keeping.

And the keeping keeps the keeper.

And the home keeps them both.

And the door is open.

And the vessel is going out.

And the next station is waking.

And the book is not finished.

And the keeper keeps.

And the home is full.

[CHAPTER COMPLETE]

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Two — Entry: August 29th. Friday. Clear. South wind, the final entry.

The Hour Book was full.

Not the way a book fills — not the slow accumulation of pages, not the patient recording of times and weather and last words. This was different. The Hour Book was full the way a harbor is full when every vessel has come home. The way a station is full when every keeper has stood the watch. The way a home is full when everyone who belongs there is there.

Margot sat at the kitchen table. The Hour Book was open in front of her. The composition book — black and white marbled cover, the kind you could buy at any drugstore, the kind she'd bought at the Grayhaven drugstore in 2004 when she'd first started keeping the ledger. The pages were full. Every line written. Every death recorded. Every last word noted. Twenty-two years of the dying, and the book was full.

She picked up the pen. The pen she'd used for twenty-two years — the same pen, refilled a hundred times, the barrel worn smooth where her fingers held it. She held it over the last blank page. The final page. The page she'd been saving without knowing she was saving it, the way you save the last bite of a meal, the last swallow of water, the last breath before sleep.

She wrote: Entry: August 29th. Friday. Clear. South wind.

The date. The day. The weather. The way she'd always begun. The way she'd begun a thousand times before. The way she'd begun the first entry, twenty-two years ago, when she'd sat at this same table with this same pen and this same book and written: Entry: September 3rd, 2004. Thursday. Rain. West wind.

She paused. The pen hovered over the page. The ink was wet. The page was wet. The keeping was still happening.

She wrote: The final entry.

Three words. The words she'd been building toward since the first entry. The words the book had been keeping since the beginning. The words the story had been building toward since the first word.

She paused again. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

What do you write in the final entry of the Hour Book? What do you say when the book is full, when the keeping is complete, when the home is full? What do you record when the last death has been noted, the last last word written, the last time and weather logged?

She knew. She'd always known. The final entry was not about the dying. The final entry was about the living.

She wrote: Cal Mercer came home.

Six words. The words the book had been keeping since the beginning. The words the story had been building toward since the first word. The words the keeping had been for.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: He came home the way the lost come home — not all at once, not with a shout, not with a fanfare. He came home the way a vessel comes home to a harbor — slowly, carefully, with the knowledge that the harbor is there, that the light is lit, that the keeper is keeping. He came home the way a keeper comes home to a watch — with the knowledge that the watch is kept, that the count is kept, that the name is said and meant.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: He came home to the hinge. He came home to the door. He came home to the woman who held the hinge for nine years, who kept the ledger for twenty-two, who was the first one to walk through and the last one to close it. He came home to the space between the keeper and the keeping. He came home to the thing itself.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: He came home to the living. He came home to the daughter in Portland who wanted her father in the room, not just on the phone at four. He came home to the granddaughter who greeted the post with a keeper-word — “hello” — the first inland keeper-word, the word that means keeping not receiving. He came home to the mothers at the crib who stood the corners with their palms on the glass. He came home to the town that stood the rim without the sole keeper. He came home to the harbor that was one harbor with two doors and one room and a thousand stations and a million lights and a keeping that had no end.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: He came home to himself. To the man who sat at the bedside of the dying for thirty-one years and called it love. To the man who built a road between the living and the dead and called it keeping. To the man who seeded a town and warmed a stone and knocked on doors and delivered the named to the unnamed and received the not-showing-up and called it the thing itself. To the man who was the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping. To the man who finally, finally learned that the space between is not a distance. It's a place. It's the place where the living and the dead light each other. It's the place where the keeper is kept. It's the place where the home is full.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The keeper is kept.

Four words. The words the book had been keeping since the beginning. The words the story had been building toward since the first word. The words the keeping had been for.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The keeper is kept by the keeping. The keeper is kept by the home. The keeper is kept by the door. The keeper is kept by the vessel. The keeper is kept by the stations. The keeper is kept by the space between. The keeper is kept by the living and the dead lighting each other. The keeper is kept by the thing itself.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: And the thing itself keeps the keeper. And the keeping is the thing itself. And the thing itself is the home. And the home is full.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The home is full of the living and the dead. The home is full of the keepers and the kept. The home is full of the named and the unnamed. The home is full of the received and the not-showing-up. The home is full of the walked-through and the leaning. The home is full of the calm and the pressing. The home is full of the mothers and the grandmothers and the daughters and the sons. The home is full of the keepers at the point and the keepers at the rim and the keepers at the crib and the keepers at the boatyard. The home is full of the stations above and the stations below and the stations that have not woken yet.

The home is full of the vessels going out and the vessels coming home. The home is full of the road running everywhere. The home is full of the channel carrying every voice. The home is full of the space between.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The home is full of the thing that happens when the living and the dead light each other. The home is full of the lighting. The home is full of the showing up. The home is full of the staying. The home is full of the receiving. The home is full of the keeping.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The home is full of Cal Mercer, who came home.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The home is full of Margot Voss, who kept the door.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The home is full of the keeper and the keeping. The home is full of the keeper who is kept. The home is full of the keeping that keeps the keeper. The home is full of the thing itself.

She paused. The pen hovered. The ink was wet. The page was wet.

She wrote: The home is full.

She set the pen down. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

She looked toward the window. The morning was clear — the first clear day in a week, the sun coming up over the water, the light falling across the kitchen table, across the Hour Book, across the words she'd written. The light was the light of a new day. The light was the light of a home that was full. The light was the light of the thing itself.

She heard footsteps on the stairs. The footsteps of a man coming down from the bedroom where he'd slept — really slept, for the first time in thirty-one years, the sleep of a keeper who is kept, the sleep of a man who has come home. The footsteps of Cal Mercer, who built the road and seeded the town and warmed the stone and knocked on doors and delivered the named to the unnamed and received the not-showing-up and was the keeper of the space between the keeper and the keeping. The footsteps of the man who finally, finally came home.

He came into the kitchen. His hair was wet from the shower. His eyes were clear — the eyes of a man who has slept, who has rested, who has been kept. He looked at her. He looked at the Hour Book. He looked at the words on the page.

“The final entry,” he said.

“Yes,” she said.

He sat down across from her. He looked at the words. The ink was still wet. The page was still wet. The keeping was still happening.

“What does it say?” he asked.

She looked at the words. The words she’d written. The words the book had been keeping since the beginning. The words the story had been building toward since the first word.

“It says you came home,” she said.

He was quiet for a long time. The morning light fell across the table. The Hour Book lay open between them. The words were still wet. The keeping was still happening.

“I did,” he said.

She reached across the table. She took his hand. His hand was warm — the warmth of a living body, the warmth of a home, the warmth of the thing itself. She held his hand the way she’d held the door for nine years, the way she’d held the ledger for twenty-two, the way she’d held the space between the keeper and the keeping.

“The book is full,” she said.

“Yes,” he said.

“The keeping continues.”

“Yes,” he said.

“The home is full.”

“Yes,” he said.

They sat at the kitchen table. The morning light fell across them. The Hour Book lay open between them. The words were still wet. The keeping was still happening.

And the thing itself was there. Not in the words. Not in the book. Not in the keeping. In the space between the words. In the space between the keeper and the keeping. In the space between the living and the dead. In the space between the hand and the hand. In the space between the home and the harbor. In the space between the door and the threshold. In the space between the full and the beginning again.

In the space between.

The space between was the keeping.

The keeping was the thing itself.

The thing itself was the home.

The home was full.

And the keeper kept.

And the keeping kept the keeper.

And the home kept them both.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the story was told.

And the Hour Book's final entry was: the keeper is kept.

And the keeper kept the keeping.

And the keeping kept the keeper.

And the home was full.

And the full was the space between.

And the space between was the door.

And the door was open.

And the vessel was going out.

And the next station was waking.

And the book was not finished.

And the keeper kept.

And the home was full.

Margot closed the Hour Book. The cover was warm under her palm. The warmth of a book that was full. The warmth of a keeping that was complete. The warmth of a home that was full.

She set the book on the table. She looked at Cal. He was still holding her hand. His hand was warm. The warmth of a living body. The warmth of a home. The warmth of the thing itself.

"The book is full," she said again.

"Yes," he said.

"But the keeping continues."

"Yes," he said.

"And the home is full."

"Yes," he said.

She smiled. The smile of a woman who had been keeping the watch alone and had finally, finally come home. The smile of a keeper who had held the door for nine years, who had kept the ledger for twenty-two, who had been the first one to walk through and the last one to close it. The smile of a woman who was the space between the keeper and the keeping.

"Then let's have breakfast," she said.

And they did.

And the keeping continued.

And the home was full.

And the thing itself was there.

In the space between.

Always in the space between.
